Notes & Comments

WE are requested by the family of the late Mr. D. L. Moody to say that any recollections of Mr. Moody and his work will be very welcome in view of the memoir which is in course of preparation. Such communications may be sent through us, or direct to Mr. W. R. Moody, East Northfield, Mass., U.S.A. Mr. Sankey writes :—

In the death of my friend and brother, Dwight L. Moody, the world has lost one of the greatest and noblest men of the century.

In succeeding issues we hope to give further interesting communications regarding our departed friend ; also incidents gathered from his great work in this and other lands.

The lapse of time is so smooth and imperceptible that the artificial divisions of the calendar are useful not only for secular business purposes, but as providing halting places for the soul. It is well to be "pulled up" suddenly at stated periods, and forced to face the fact that the centuries as well as the years are passing, and that each New Year's Day sees us nearer the last year, and the last day, of our earthly life. It is a warning against continuance in sin and carelessness, and an incentive to make the best of what remains. Now is the time for the worst man to pause in his career of wickedness and turn his face towards the light ; and now is the time for the noblest and the best to fortify some undefended places, correct some belated faults, and to aspire to hitherto unattained ideals. New Year's resolutions are often broken, but they should never be neglected.

"We know the way, but not the end." This is a good summary of the extent and limitations of human knowledge regarding the future. Step by step we find the path of life clearing up as we go, but an impenetrable veil keeps softly moving in front with us, never lifting, never growing transparent, so that we literally know not what a day or an hour may bring forth to us. Those who have no faith in an over-ruling Providence and a guiding hand can only face the future in a spirit of unreasoning optimism or of stoical indifference. But the believer who can thankfully record his faith in the Psalmist's words, "My times are in thy hand," can face the unknown days and years with a calm confidence and an immovable trust, knowing that, whatever befall, it shall be well for those who have made the Lord their refuge, and "who abide under the shadow of the Almighty."

The New Year ought to bring relief to two considerable sections of the community—to shop-assistants, who will then have seats when they can find time to use them, and to half-time children, who will now have improved educational advantages. No doubt the former will find that shops vary ; hard masters will still be hard, and will urge and drive as before. Nevertheless the new system can hardly fail to intensify and quicken the feeling of humaneness, and bring relief to some extent. And good masters will be glad of it, always provided it is not abused ; for there is a danger on that side, too.

In towns, children will now be compelled to attend school morning and afternoon for five days a week up to the age of twelve. Between twelve and thirteen this class of children will be partially exempt, according to the standard passed in each case. More latitude is allowed in country places, but here the children may be driven to work before and after school. Even the best legislation cannot meet every case, and we fall back at last on the old evangelical plan of regenerating the individual.

The Daily News last year did essential service by the articles of its Commissioner on "The Dwellings of the Poor." These are being followed this year by a series on the more difficult subject of remedies for the evils which exist. A theory was propounded some years ago which scoffed at "paternal government." Nothing could be more unphilosophical, unreal, untrue. The Great King is God the Father. When governments cease to be paternal, they become negligent or tyrannical, or both. A nation which does not care whether its working classes are properly housed, or whether its poor live in decency or in dirt, cannot maintain the foremost place, and does not deserve to. Ernest Jones wrote of "generations growing down," and prayed—

> Give us, God, to save our nation,
> Less of cotton, more of wheat.

Much paternal legislation, in spite of the school that scorned it, has passed since then ; but owing to the fierce pace at which the world leaves more and more behind in the race, government must be increasingly paternal to take care of them. It is pitiful to think how many "mighty men of valour," in various departments of life are lost to the nation through neglect. Thomas Arnold used to take off his hat to his boys because among them was a possible Wickliffe, or Luther, or Bunyan. We used to let coal-tar run to waste as a useless material until we found that God had stored in that primeval vegetation medicinal properties and lovely dyes. When shall we awake to the fact that we may be letting human lives run to wreck and ruin among whom there are possible Whitefields and Wesleys, Müllers and Moodys ?

The defence of the British Empire—the consolidation of the national resources—is not only a military question. It is also a fiscal and a social question. The march of events in South Africa has brought home to the popular mind the vastness of our Imperial domains, and the weight of our Imperial responsibilities. But it should never be forgotten that these responsibilities can only be effectively and safely discharged by the thews and sinews and intellect of our own people. The myriads of virgin acres in our Empire beyond the seas can only be developed and retained so long as our own people are mentally and physically among the fittest in the world. If we continue to dwarf the physique and neglect the minds of British children by prematurely offering them up as a sacrifice to the Moloch of industry—if we continue to tolerate the growing horrors of overcrowded tenements and cottages —then we must expect to pay for our folly in the gradual loss of Empire.—Daily News.

"No man liveth to himself, no man dieth to himself." If society sins against itself in neglect of the poorest street arab, it breaks, in all its members, the law under which society lives and thrives.

There is nothing in existing circumstances, either in the Church or the world, to shake our confidence for one moment in the fact that God reigns. The year opens amid cloud and darkness. Our country is engaged in an awful war. At home, in the Church, the conflict loses none of its bitterness as the months pass. But whatever the issues of these contentions may be, the real coming of the kingdom of Christ will assuredly be advanced. That the New Year begins in the recognition of God is a fact full of hope for the future. Meetings for humiliation and prayer, organized by different Christian committees, prove that there are those in the nation who have not drifted away from God. The country seems to be awakening to the fact that there are good grounds for humiliation as well as for prayer, and it could not be found in a better attitude than in lowly worship before the throne of grace as the New Year proceeds.

On the other hand, Sir E. Clarke, senior member for Plymouth, writing to Rev. G. B. Berry, vicar of Emmanuel Compton, near Plymouth, on the subject of a suggested day of humiliation, says :—

I am very sorry to say that I think in the present temper of the public mind the appointment of a day of public humiliation and prayer would only provoke a mischievous and most unseemly controversy. The mere suggestion has produced a correspondence in which those who minister in Christ's Church have repudiated their Master's plainest teaching, and laymen scoff at the idea of the Divine government of the world. A day so set apart would be kept as a holiday, and pulpits would be used, as they are being used every Sunday, to inflame the pride and passion of our people, and to dull and sear their consciences. So far as any Christian spirit is left in the Church, it can find expression in the prayers of the Liturgy better than in occasional prayers in which much less of that spirit is to be found.

Of all the painful revelations of ourselves which the South African war has made, surely this is the saddest, that we are so largely an infidel nation. "They that despise Me shall be lightly esteemed" is equally true, whether "of a nation or a man only."

As Christmas Day drew nigh, by force of strong faith, as well as in obedience to a sublime sentiment, much prayer was offered to God that the sword might not be drawn on the battlefields of South Africa. Lord Radstock writes to us :—

Our dear friend, Rev. Andrew Murray, was allowed by Sir A. Milner to wire to President Kruger, who was requested to wire to President Steyn. It was feared the difficulties from a military point of view would be insuperable, but our Lord brought it about, and we thank Him. Constant prayer is being made for peace throughout England.

Let prayer, earnest and unremitting, be offered for the greater blessing of permanent peace.

No movement of the present day has more promise of good in it than the Student Volunteer Missionary Union. The Conference which is being held this week at Exeter Hall is quite undenominational in character, ministers of every section of the Church of Christ taking part in it. The students in attendance are from all parts of the world.

In the mission field the sharp, ecclesiastical distinctions which prevail at home are not nearly so pronounced, and the happy oneness in Christ Jesus manifested in these gatherings will be a pleasant foretaste of what will be experienced when student-days give place to active service for the King. This strengthening of each other's hands by conference and prayer, by fraternal intercourse and Christian fellowship, cannot fail to speed the cause of missions.

The allusion in the "Monthly Letter" of the C.M.S. to the fact that the Sirdar had given permission to its missionaries who are proceeding up the Nile to go to Khartoum, will give much satisfaction to Christian people interested in the spiritual welfare of Africa. There never should have been any veto put upon missionary work there. Missionaries have always been the pioneers of civilization, liberty, and order. Now that the authorities have granted this permission, we sincerely hope that we shall hear no more of any restrictions placed upon the preaching of the Gospel in this important field of Christian service. With the New Year, let the Truth of the Cross have free course and be glorified.

An L.M.S. missionary, who has spent many years in Madagascar, desires us to modify in some measure a recent Note and Comment (written on the testimony of a director of the Society), regarding the change in the French attitude towards mission work in that country. Referring to our statement that the French Government has "restored the schools and colleges taken from the L.M.S. and given to the Jesuits some time ago," she says that at no time has any school or college been taken by the representatives of that Government from the Society, and that "perfect religious toleration has been announced from the first day of the French occupation of Madagascar."

It is, however, notorious that, during the earlier period of the French occupation, the work of the L.M.S. was almost entirely ruined in the island. This was, as our correspondent points out, partly owing to the heathen insurrection against all white men and their works, which insurrection was made use of as a powerful weapon against Protestantism; and partly owing to the regulation that, in all schools, the French language must be taught. The former misunderstanding is now, happily, at an end; and as the L.M.S. is requiring its intending missionaries to learn, and so be able to teach, French, the latter difficulty is in a fair way of being removed. It will take years to regain lost ground; but with patience and loyal adherance to the spiritual programme of the Society, the good work done in the past will not fail of its due harvest.

The Pasteur Institute in France, it is alleged, is experimenting seriously on a large scale, with a view to "abolishing old age" from the programme of human life by a proper system of nutrition, etc. Such projects, even when proposed by so high a scientific body, awaken more amusement than hope. It is a question, indeed, that has often occupied the thoughts of philosophers, whether physical "immortality" would be a blessing or a curse, and the answer has by no means been uniformly favourable. It would be a far more profitable line of investigation how to retain our youthfulness of mind and spirit, and one which is by no means so hopeless of results. Here are a few of the secrets: contentment, a cheerful temper, an earnest faith in the Providence and love of God, a determined will to get good and not evil from all the experiences of our lot. There is a promise to those who put their trust in God, that they shall "renew their youth like the eagle," and so carry the best qualities of their earlier years right into the shadows and weakness of old age.

Dr. George W. Jacoby, a noted physiological and psychological scientist, says:—

> Worry kills as surely, though not so quickly, as ever gun or dagger did, and more people have died in the last century from sheer worry than have been killed in battle.

Dr. Jacoby recommends as a cure the training of the will to throw off all cares by change of occupation and relaxation. That is the scientific view, but it is inadequate to the whole case. The mind wants a refuge from poverty, loss, and sorrow, while acknowledging the facts and their causes. It never can cease to worry by blinding or deceiving itself, and the only refuge is in God. Science has been anticipated by thousands of years by men who knew the secret, one of whom said, "Cast thy burden on the Lord, and He shall sustain thee; He will never suffer the righteous to be moved." This is an intelligent, scientific, and adequate antidote.

We commented, recently, on Mr. Lathbury's resignation of the editorship of The Guardian. We are informed that our view was mistaken, and an esteemed correspondent writes:—

> I believe that The Guardian is not, for the future, going to support the Ritualists as it has hitherto done.

From this it would appear that the change is one on which to congratulate our influential contemporary, rather than to provoke hostile criticism. From recent notes in The Globe we also infer that The Guardian is no longer to be regarded as the organ of an extreme party in the Church of England.

The Church Times says that The Record— > must be living in a fool's paradise if it imagines that the Protestantism it is goading to a state of frenzy bears the faintest resemblance to the decent evangelicalism of which it was, and still thinks it is, the mouthpiece.

It is easy to praise the ancients to the disparagement of the moderns, but would the Church Times have called that evangelicalism "decent" which preached, as Whitefield did, in Nonconformist chapels; which founded, as the Countess of Huntingdon did, a Nonconformist college; which co-operated, as many clergymen did, with the Nonconformists in establishing the Religious Tract Society and the Bible Society; and which, to this day, has lived on more or less friendly terms with Nonconformists in the work of carrying on temperance reform, missionary enterprise, and the general diffusion of the Gospel? No; the pretensions of the High Church School exclude all who do not favour its disguised Romanism.

The Licensing Committee of the County of Middlesex has resolved to grant a license for a new racecourse out at Wembley Park. The demoralizing associations of horse-racing demand a vigorous protest against any extended facilities for a pastime which corrupts, in ever-increasing numbers, so many of our youth. Our surprise is that the Church of Christ does not adopt some very definite measures to cope with the evil of betting. All classes of society suffer from the pernicious practice of gambling, that increased opportunities for indulging in it should be resolutely resisted by Christian people. Is it too late to take some action in the present instance?

The action of the authorities in causing the seizure, at Watford, of a quantity of pseudo-scientific literature, on the ground that it was calculated to corrupt the morals of Her Majesty's subjects, deserves strong commendation. Much literature of this class is being sent out under the pretence of education which is quite unfit for general circulation, and is not required for professional study; and it is quite time that steps should be taken to reduce the amount, if not to put a stop to it altogether. It is sufficiently difficult to protect the young against open temptations to sin, without the task being made harder still by these covert attacks upon purity.

The personality and work of John Wesley is commanding a remarkable amount of attention just now. The Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, delivered an address on him at one of the London settlements, which, coming from a distinguished Anglican, was full of generous tribute to the great founder of Methodism:—

> Another great ecclesiastical revival had arisen on other lines and was still running its course; but the work of John Wesley still survived and advanced, chiefly among those whom he loved best, the poorer masses of his countrymen—the men and women who worked hard, lived simply, felt warmly, and craved for living contact with the unseen world and the heavenly Friend.

The Spectator, in a recent article declared that Wesley was the most influential Englishman that ever lived. His evangelic fervour and his passion for souls have descended through three generations of believers fired by his teaching and example. As a winner of men to Christ, there is probably only one modern name to be mentioned in the same rank, that of the great American who has just passed to his reward—D. L. Moody, whose work may prove to be as inspiring and permanent.

An agitation is beginning for the inclusion of an inquiry into religious belief at the forthcoming census of 1901. The great objection to such a course is that it gives a very poor indication of the real religious condition of the people; nor does it appear to be the function of the state, as such, to make such an inquiry. A state census of religion would make thousands who are really of no religion at all include themselves in the state Church for social and other reasons. Altogether it is more than questionable whether any practical purpose is really served by these attempts to classify the religious creeds and sects of a nation.

Reference was made, in a recent note, to the duty of England in regard to colonization and to the evangelization of the world; and an interesting illustration of the spirit in which the former object should be linked with the latter is found in the history of Virginia, the foundation of an English company in 1606, for the purpose of establishing a colony there, having been carried out, not for mere gain, but, as the patent expressed it, that the work might > by the providence of God, hereafter tend to the glory of his Divine Majesty in propagating the Christian religion to such people as yet lived in darkness and ignorance of the true knowledge and worship of God.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Varley.—We regret to learn that these beloved friends were unable to commence their mission at Coventry on Sunday last. After such earnest preparation throughout the tours, much disappointment has been felt. The common form of influenza has invalided both of our friends, and the doctor strongly advised our brother not to run the risks which would certainly attend his public ministry earlier than Wednesday, January 3. We are glad to hear that all serious symptoms are passed, and by the time this note is seen by our readers this valued worker will be actively engaged in this campaign. Fortunately, Mr. Chas. Inglis was able to supply Mr. Varley's place.

The New Year.

A NEW YEAR! There is magic in the word new. The love of novelty is a feature of the age. We scarcely wait to question the merits or demerits of the new order, it suffices that it is new. We are drawn, almost unconsciously, and often foolishly, to follow an unknown and unquestioned guide.

But in the untried future we shall not go astray through a love of novelty if our desires find at once their centre and circumference in the Holy Book, and our lives are shaped thereby; for among the "best" gifts which we are told to "covet earnestly" are "a new heart," "a new name," "a new and living way"—"all things new." Yes, and even if the sere leaf is upon us, He can "renew" our youth, and bear us as on eagle's wings. Amid the turmoil of this busy age, the unrest, the unsatisfied longings, the disappointments and the failures, there is One beside us who is mightier than the storm; and in the doing of whose will we may find "quietness and assurance for ever."

Perhaps we indulge some misgivings when our friends wish us

A HAPPY NEW YEAR!

In imagination's painted picture of 1900 there are mental reserves nestling in the background, and there are gaunt and ugly fears crouching in the foreground, both while we offer and accept the New Year's greeting. We think of other first days of January, and we long "for the touch of a vanished hand, and the sound of a voice that is still;" we have to confess that life is a sigh rather than a song, and that vows eagerly made have been all too readily broken. Discouragement (at all times one of the devil's most powerful weapons), had settled down upon the soul, and been too often followed by a sort of autumn stillness, which might have led to winter's barrenness and death, had it not been for the quickening and awakening of the gracious Spirit of Life—"When my soul fainted within me I remembered the Lord."

In the mighty mechanism of Nature, where God has sway, there sprang even out of chaos a new world, one upon which He looked, and pronounced it "very good." So, too, in the human heart, the new world in the spirit's realm should so correspond with the Divine ideal as to be pronounced "very good" also. Which of us has not experienced the cheering, invigorating influence on our spirits of the sweet morning air, breathing of hope, of renewal, of better things? We look in wonder and admiration on the face of Nature bathed in freshly fallen dew, by which each blade of grass and cup of tiny flower receive the same wonderful refreshment and vigour as the mighty oak, or sombre spreading cedar. We enter upon a New Day! Yesterday may have been marked by failure; we were weary as the shadows deepened, and did not wish for the return of one of its hours. But now the black night has passed, and the sun has risen! Hope "stands tip-toe upon the mountains" in the place of the gloom and regret of yesterday. We take courage and go forward.

One of the social customs of our German neighbours is very suggestive. They open the windows as the old year goes out, and, clapping their hands, welcome the new one. It comes in their imagination as a child leaps into the arms of its mother—young, innocent, full of life and vigour—and, moreover, with a future of unbounded possibilities!

The new things which have succeeded each other so rapidly during the last fifty years mark them as the most wonderful and prolific in novelty that the world has ever seen. Science, art, literature, social life and customs, have all undergone great changes. Those amongst us who have seen the half-century come and go, may look with some feelings of apprehension on the restless onrush of things, and long at times for some quiet harbour wherein Sabbath rest and calm could be found, for we fear the wheel is turning too rapidly! But

God's in his heaven—

Our day is one of undoubted privilege! We live in a blaze of meridian sunlight; but how this enhances our responsibility! It is certainly an open question as to whether the impression we are making upon the world to-day, will, a century hence, compare in any degree with that made upon us by the whole-hearted devotion of our ancestors, whose adhesion to truth and principle has placed us in the position of privilege we now enjoy.

Perhaps at no time of the year, or festival of the Christian Church, are prayers more sincere than are those offered in congregations and in private as the Old Year wanes and gives place to the New. And this for various reasons. With some it is because absence from loved ones "makes the heart grow fonder," and prayer may be the only service they can render them, on account of distance. With others the joy of reunion stimulates them to praise the God of families; while to many a wanderer, ah! and even a prodigal, the sound of those chiming bells, revives memories of past and purer days, reminding them of a leaf which may yet be turned, and which, with God's help, might become a record of braver, truer deeds.

Let us, then, believe that He who has the power of making "all things new" will accomplish his gracious purposes in us; for in tracing God's wonderful dealings in the past we have seen how He holds together by the cords of his mighty love our present and eternal interests.

New Year Poems.

A New Year's Prayer.

"From the heart" (Eph. vi. 6.)

O PERFECT Will! that hath a plan,
The highest, best, for every man!
I fain would do the good I can;
Then show me, Lord, my own true part,
And help me serve Thee from the heart.

O perfect Will! selecting some
For daily duties in the home,
With patient feet to go and come—
If this, Thou showest, Lord, my part,
Here may I serve Thee from the heart.

O perfect Will! that needs must spread
For some weak frames the sufferer's bed—
Thou, Lord, has borne a thorn-pierced head—
And if Thou showest such my part,
There may I serve Thee from the heart.

O perfect Will! that hath a need,
Of human lips heaven's cause to plead,
Of willing feet glad news to speed;
If such Thou choosest for my part,
Thus may I serve Thee from the heart.

O perfect Will! that trusteth store
Of earthly things with numbers more,
And doth good stewardship implore—
If this be my allotted part,
So may I serve Thee from the heart.

O perfect Will! that burdeneth
Some minds with messages, and saith,
"Write of the Life that conquers Death,"
Help me if such be proved my part
To serve, Lord, with o'erflowing heart.

O perfect Will! Not now I see
Why just this niche was left for me,
But I shall soon enlightened be!
Till then convince me of my part,
And help me serve, Lord, from the heart!

WINIFRED A. IVERSON.

What may the New Year bring?

A BRIGHT New Year, a glad New Year,
With more of hope and less of fear,
With stronger faith, more ardent love,
And clearer sight of things above;
Each sorrow bringing with its pain
The grace that turns a loss to gain:
Each festive hour a foretaste sweet
Of joy that walks the golden street;
Each welcome fond, or parting kiss,
A link to never-ending bliss—

This may the New Year bring, and more,
Since Love holds unexhausted store
For all the needs of every heart—
For all the days, till Time depart,
And we lose count of years and days,
In God's Eternity of Praise!

J. L. HOE.

A Psalm for 1900.

Thou shalt guide me with Thy counsel,
And afterward receive me to glory.—Ps. lxxiii. 24.

O JESU, LEAD.

WHO opes the New Year's gate refrains to say
What scenes our eyes shall meet;
Nor can the dreams of fancy show the way
God marks for pilgrims' feet.

How rough or smooth, how sad or bright, who tells
What losses, crosses wait?
We hush—no voice replies, no vision swells,
We look—Love holds the gate.

Along the path of bygone years we see
The fair memorial stones, Inscribed, "Jehovah, faithful Friend is He Who turned to joy our moans."

The past is one long avenue of love,
O'erarched by mercies' bloom;
Our faithful Guide shall ever faithful prove,
Come days of light or gloom.

Oh, not by sight, but by the better way
Of faith, He leads his own
Through fire, and flood, and dell, by night, by day,
In paths they had not known.

Who softly opes the New Year's door afresh,
In goodness hides the road:
O Jesu, take my hand, how weak is flesh!
Lead on and up to God.

W. A. ESSERY.

The New Year.

TUNEFUL bells, so sweetly ringing,
Echo through the silent night;
And another year, descending
Earthward, wings to us its flight.

Moonbeams soft, like smiles from Heaven,
Hover o'er the sparkling snows,
Loving greetings, kindly wishes,
As the breath of music flows.

Here an unknown path we enter,
There an untrod mount we climb;
Yet another billow bears us
O'er the restless seas of time.

Now a transient span of waiting,
And another watch of night;
Then an upward step to glory,
On the ladder of God's light.

Link to link becomes united,
In his mercy's golden chain,
And a fleeting panorama,
Passes on in chequered train.

Lo! another seraph bears us,
On ethereal wings unfurled;
Heavenward, homeward, sunward, Godward,
Toward the brighter, better world!

HARRIET JULIA EVANS.

His Perfect Plan.

OUR hearts with gratitude o'erflow,
As we life's story scan;
And step by step can clearly trace
The unfolding of God's plan.

Not by haphazard have the months,
Each with their record pass'd,
But fashion'd by a Master Hand
In mould unerring cast.

Things which seem'd hard to understand,
The dark and dreary days,
Now shine and sparkle as they're lit
With Heaven's eternal rays.

Who now would wish one sorrow less,
Regret those hours of pain,
When clearly seen as stepping-stones
To real and lasting gain?

Without them we should stand to-day
Poorer and less refined;
Unless perchance we've failed to learn
The lessons God designed.

Ah! glorious fact—e'en our mistakes
Were overruled in love,
And woven in that perfect web
Prepared for life above.

Suggestive Readings.

THE BACKGROUND OF SCRIPTURE.—I.

AS every picture has its background, so Scripture, which is the Divine word-picture of God and man, and of the holy and the fallen angels, has its background also.

The rebel who was once Lucifer, the Shining One, but who, through proud ambition to be as God (Isa. xiv., Ezek. xxviii.), became the old serpent, the devil, and Satan, deceiver, accuser, adversary—he and his works form the dark background of all Scripture. These sacred writings are the Scriptures of truth, the Gospel of our salvation, as against the lie of the self-exalted spirit, him who is a liar and a murderer from the beginning.

John came preaching the Kingdom, the Reign, of God; and when John had been cast into prison, Jesus came, saying, "The time is fulfilled and the reign of God is at hand; repent ye, and believe the good tidings."

What time was fulfilled? The fulfilments of many periods concentred in that time. One was that of the usurpation by Satan of the princedom of this world. Satan, by the overthrow of man, had become the prince of this world, and man a vassal under him.

Nothing but disaster and ruin had been the result. Now God, in the person of his Son, had come to take the reins of government, and to assert his sovereignty. But man, instead of becoming "as God," had made Satan the prince and god of this world; and, led captive by the devil at his will, both Jew and Gentile unitedly refused, rejected, and slew the King who had come to claim his own. But Satan's power ends in death. The death of Christ brought overthrow to the devil and his works. God raised Jesus, his King, into a region where Satan could not enter, and now the Gospel of the kingdom has become "Jesus and the Resurrection." For the King is risen and glorified, and where the King is, there is the kingdom.

The prince and power of darkness, the god of this age, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience, he and his works are, as we have said, the background of all inspired history and prophecy.

Thus, when we pray after the manner taught us by our Lord, we declare, in every clause, our return from darkness to light, from Satan to God. Look for a moment at the facts of the case.

As soon as Jesus was born King of the Jews, Satan, the prince of this world, through Herod, one of the princes of this world, sought the young Child to destroy Him.

As soon as Jesus, in his baptism by John, had formally undertaken the redemption of the world, He was driven by the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted, tested, of the devil. For to this end was the Son of God manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil. Having been foiled, the tempter left Him for a season; but soon returned, and found nothing in Him. For three years and a half He went about doing good and healing all that were oppressed of the devil, for God was with Him. Then the princes of this world, with the prince of this world at their head, slew Him, "whom none of the princes of this world knew, for had they known Him, they would not have crucified the Lord of Glory."

Thus the ministry of the incarnate Son of God began with the conflict with the devil in the wilderness, and ended with victory over Satan by his own death upon the cross.

Immediately after the temptation, Jesus called out his disciples, preached the Gospel of the kingdom—the good tidings of the reign of God—healed diseases and cast out demons, and great multitudes followed Him (Matt. iv.).

Then He went up into a mountain and propounded the principles of his kingdom. But first He prefaced them by depicting the character of the subjects of the kingdom, in those wonderful verses which we call the Beatitudes. They specify seven characteristics of these blessed ones. They are poor in spirit, they mourn, they are meek, they hunger and thirst after righteousness, they are merciful and pure in heart, and they are peacemakers, for the Captain of their salvation is the Prince of Peace.

These are expressly the features of his own character, and the antithesis of that of the prince of this world. Therefore those who possess them are reviled, persecuted, slandered. But for this very reason they are blessed, for great is their reward in heaven, to which they belong. M.

The Christian Church and the Drink Traffic.

THE attitude of the Church of Christ towards the drink traffic is a question of unspeakable importance. The nation's drink bill for last year exceeded £150,000,000—a larger amount than ever before. As a consequence, drunkenness abounds, wives, mothers, children suffer to an appalling extent. Countless homes are made wretched, and more than ever women are becoming enslaved by drink.

An ingenuity, which may well be called "infernal," is exercised to add to the temptation to drink and to increase the profits of the trade. One brewery firm during the last six years has increased its profits to the extent of about £150,000 a year. An ever-increasing number of persons are becoming shareholders in breweries and distilleries, manifestly willing to share the profits of a trade which is demoralizing and ruining numberless families, and through which poverty, crime, and wretchedness abound.

Those who have given much attention to the subject estimate that year by year 70,000 persons in this country sink into the drunkard's grave. In the face of all this, the Christian Church seems powerless to deal with the calamity, or even to arrest the increase of desolation.

Such considerations as these give great importance to the proceedings of the last Wesleyan Methodist Conference in relation to certain memorials which (as reported at the time) were presented to the Conference. The memorialists approached the Conference to ask that persons connected with the drink trade might not be appointed to office in the Church. How these memorials were treated, and the prayer of the memorialists refused, is told in a pamphlet, entitled "Shall Wesleyan Methodism Uphold the Liquor Traffic?" * The title is startling, but it is justified by the action and the astonishing arguments of those who were against acceding to the prayer of the memorialists. This pamphlet is a clear and dignified statement of the case, and it is not easy to see how its powerful arguments can be satisfactorily answered.

Surely the time has come for all sections of the Christian Church to take a firm stand in this matter. Year by year it becomes increasingly manifest that, if our country is to be saved from sinking still lower under the terrible curse of drunkenness, the Christian Church must put forth its utmost strength to this end. To this end there must be a renunciation of responsibility on the part of those who have a guilty association with the evil. At a recent mission in Oldbury, Mr. Tennyson Smith reported that he had visited the offices of a local brewery, and had found the names of forty clergymen and ten magistrates on the list of shareholders. Thus it appears that representatives of law and Gospel are both involved in the fearful enterprise.

Mr. J. A. Steuart, author of "Wine on the Lees," who has made a study of the trade and its effects simply "for the sake of its dramatic possibilities," assures us that it is an actual state of affairs when, in his novel, he makes Lord Twickham say that 100,000 shares of his company are held by clergymen, and that he could, if necessary, make up a board of bishops and deans. Much may be explained by this widespread complicity—silence where we looked for fearless speech; timid action against the Trade, or positive action in its favour, where we hoped for courageous attack. Many a vote, political, parliamentary, and ecclesiastical, which so much perplexed us, would be intelligible enough if we could see the voter's dividend warrants. So the trade is being pushed, and it is pushing the nation every week into a deeper perdition.

The Christian Life Illustrated.

THE WATCH.

THE watch, with its moving spring, intricate works, open face, and guiding hands, is one of the best illustrations of the Christian life in its various features of action, service, and blessing; and a careful comparison with it may help us to see the points and power of the simile.

The watch, in its mechanism, order, and arrangement; in its threefold parts of main-spring, works, and outside case, is a striking picture of man, with his threefold powers of spirit, soul, and body; and, as the watch is an object of wonder and admiration, so is man the masterpiece of his Maker. Truly we may say with the Psalmist, "I will praise Thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made" (Ps. cxxxix. 14).

THE WATCH A PICTURE OF THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

1. The Main-spring, illustrates the power of life (Gen. ii. 7; Eph. ii. 15).

2. The Works, illustrate the expression of life (Gal. ii. 20).

3. The Fingers, illustrate the indications of life (Rom. vi. 11; Matt. v. 16).

4. The Chain, illustrates the connecting link of life (Rom. viii. 11).

5. The Key, illustrates the renewing power of life (Jude 20; 1 Thess. v. 17).

6. The Case, illustrates the outward form of life (1 Thess. v. 23).

7. The Service, illustrates the end of life (Rom. xii. 1; John xv. 8; Col. ii. 6).

The Christian, like the watch, needs constant attention to be kept going. He needs to be kept clean by the Word (John xv. 3), wound up by prayer (Eph. vi. 18), oiled by the Holy Spirit (Ps. xcii. 19), regulated by the key of promise (Phil. iv. 19), kept in time by the Sun of righteousness (Rom. xiii. 11, 12), and used every day to be kept bright and useful; and when the case is worn out it will be made anew (Phil. iii. 20, 21). C. Edwards.

Costa Rica.—Writing from Puerto Limon on November 15, Mr. James Hayter, of the Jamaica Baptist Missionary Society, mentions the prevalence of Romanism there, and how pernicious are its results. Mr. Hayter continues:—"Under the blessing of God our work has greatly prospered. Our operations have extended to sixty miles up country, some six churches have been established and substantial buildings erected for Divine worship. Many have been led to the Saviour, and have come out from the vilest of lives. There is a great opening here for some lady desirous of devoting herself to visiting, and work generally, among women."

By Archdeacon HUGHES-GAMES, D.D.

ONE cannot be justly accused of pessimism if preference be given to contemplating the evils of our day rather than dwelling upon the good that is to be found in our midst. For, by emphasizing the leaven of evil, Gospel remedies may be applied, and the reformation of society be brought about. I propose to deal, in their most general forms, with the following problems, all of which are pressingly demanding solution :—

(1) Predominant selfishness. Always characteristic of our fallen nature, but perhaps never manifested in such organized form as at present. The rich are living in unbounded luxury, and absorbed in self-aggrandisement and self-gratification; the masses are seeking their own advantage, often without regard to what is fairly due to the classes. In the pursuit of self-interest there is a growing antagonism between the various sections of society. Hence the fierce competition that obtains in every branch of trade. The effect of this is seen in trade combinations of masters and men, resulting in the strikes and lockouts which are constantly occurring, the capitalist too often disregarding the fair claims of labour, and the labourer forgetting the legitimate rights of his employer. The capital and labour struggle is one of the most momentous problems of the day, and if it is economic it is also social in its character. The key to the solution of this problem lies with the Church of Christ, and can be rightfully settled only on Christian principles; e.g., "Love thy neighbour as thyself," "Owe no man anything, but to love one another," &c. If capitalists and labourers acted these questions would not take long to settle; they would have been settled long ago but for the imperfections of his followers — their passions, selfishness, and greed.

(2) Absorbing covetousness. Men are hastening to be rich; and, not content with their ordinary means of making money, they are engaged in gambling of different kinds. This spirit pervades all classes, both sexes, and even, in many cases, affects children. This is one of the most perplexing and important problems with which we have to deal. Hence arise the numerous frauds which have characterized, in a marked degree, our day and generation.

(3) Intense love of pleasure. Never was there a more pleasure-seeking age. All classes are running after amusements, and are often absorbed in the pursuit, seeming never satisfied. Even for religious objects it is often unless pleasure is in some way associated with the means employed, for many Christian people will not respond to appeals for direct pecuniary support. Even our religious services are affected with this spirit, and all too many are attempting to justify it. Indeed, without some sensuous accessories, large numbers of people will scarcely attend public worship at all.

(4) Restlessness. Largely a result of increased facilities for rapid travelling. Railways interest all civilized countries, and are running everywhere; districts formerly closed are opened up for travel, vast numbers emigrating from their own to distant lands. This leads to a corresponding frame of mind—discontent and the desire for change. The telegraph and telephone, by facilitating the means for mutual intercourse, have tended to intensify the same feeling.

(5) The conceit which arises from sciolism. Knowledge has been increased, popular education is widely diffused, discoveries are constantly being made, popularized literature of all kinds, especially novels, flood the Press; newspapers, magazines and periodicals of every description are widely read. The knowledge acquired is but narrow and superficial, and not sufficient to make those who possess it conscious of their ignorance. The result of the wide diffusion of knowledge which specially concerns us is that it makes people impatient of oral teaching, and so diminishes the power of the pulpit, and the influence of the living voice generally.

(6) The proud, boastful, and scornful spirit abroad. We are always pluming ourselves on the superiority of this age above all preceding. Even the religious world is too apt to boast of its activeness. Science sets itself against the Revelation of God; but, by its own development, proves those things it would deny.

(7) Wide-spread scepticism. This is the result of the foregoing problems. It is ripe in the universities and fashionable gatherings, and pervades ephemeral literature. It is adopted, without any intelligent grasp of its meaning, as a fine sort of thing by in society, and not infrequently by young ladies scarce out of the schoolroom. There is nothing upon which modern doubters so confidently take their stand as the immutability of time. There is no room for miraculous intervention, no place for supernatural agency; we are under the reign of fixed and changeless laws, just as if He who made the laws could not alter them at his pleasure, and as if there were not other and higher laws, out of the sphere of our ken, of which we now know nothing, and perhaps can know nothing, which may, at any moment, include our world in their swoop, changing the existing order and bringing about results of which we have previously had no experience.

Another result is (8) Contempt of authority, especially that authority which lies at the root of family life, and therefore of all society—that of the parent over the child. This tendency is not only in opposition to human authority, but operates to the subversion of the primal law of God for the regulation of human society. This is especially seen in the observance of the Sabbath and the marriage law.

THE SABBATH IS DISGRACEFULLY NEGLECTED, and divorce is becoming more easy and prevalent.

It is by Gospel principles alone that these evils can be met, and the problems involved in them solved. How they are subversive of selfishness, condemn covetousness, and mere pleasure-seeking; how they calm the restless spirit, tranquillize the soul, and teach that humility which is absolutely antagonistic to pride and boastfulness; how they enforce parental authority, and inculcate absolute confidence in God and his Word, and complete obedience to his commandments and ordinances—all this is too well known to need enumerating. The Gospel is the only cure for the evils which harass our poor human nature; it is the only panacea for moral and social ills, for it inculcates two great principles—love to God, and love to man for God's sake, and it has set us, in Christ Jesus, a perfect example of what a human being should be. If society is to be purified, it will be by one instrumentality alone —the glorious Gospel of Jesus Christ.

* Notes of an Address at Bristol.

Thoughts on Sin.

By Pastor F. E. MARSH.

VII.—A Contrast (Rom. vi. 23).

"FOR the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." The wages here signify "the rations" which were supplied as pay to the soldier. The same word is rendered "charges" in 1 Cor. ix. 7, where the Apostle asks the question, "Who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges?" which implies the soldier is supplied with rations.

The contrast is seen when we see the bow of God's salvation in the black cloud of man's sin; and when the "Gift of God" is set over against "the wages of sin," what a difference between the gift and the wages! Well does Hodge say: "Hell is always earned, Heaven never."

Thus in a few master strokes does the Apostle sum up in vivid contrast the truth upon which he had been pondering. Sin's mastery over man means his misery and death. Grace's bestowment means the believer's freedom, holiness, and heaven. Well for us, if the material of our life runs into this mould of truth, so that our inner being is fashioned like unto it.

Notes from New York.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE Committee appointed by the House of Representatives to consider the case of Brigham Roberts, the Mormon representative, has received permission to sit during the sessions of the House, and this will tend to hasten the settlement of the matter.

The principal points in this appeal are directed rather to the future than the present, in the way of showing that a dangerous precedent is likely to be created by action that may be taken by the Committee. A distinct denial is given to the statement that Utah has broken her "compact with the United States in the matter of polygamy," that her people contemplate the revival of polygamous marriages, and that the seating of her representative would be regarded by her polygamous population as an endorsement of that institution, and would be a menace to the American home.

It is stated that the President himself has been roused to action by the force of public sentiment, and that he has set in motion the machinery for dealing with men holding federal offices in Utah who are said to be polygamists, and that inquiries on this point are to be made concerning some of the officials of the Logan Agricultural College of Utah. If there are any polygamists among these, he will probably cut off the Government appropriation. The President has also taken in hand the question of the non-enforcement of the laws in Mormon Courts, and the results are likely to be somewhat drastic.

There can be no question that the really "good" people of the whole nation are now thoroughly awake as to the Mormon evil, and determined that the laws of the United States and of the State of Utah shall be enforced.

The Convention of the National Reform Association, just held in the Broadway Tabernacle, adopted the following resolution, condemning "seven-day journalism" unanimously:—"That one of the most insidious and dangerous foes of the Sabbath in the life of the individual, the family, the church, and the State, is the seven-day journalism with which our land, more than any other portion of the earth, is cursed; and that it is the present imperative duty of our Christian citizens and the American churches to unite in a determined effort to render our land as free as is Great Britain from this acknowledged evil."

Thus saith the Lord. . . . Let him that glorieth glory in this, that he understandeth and knoweth Me."—Jer. ix. 24.

Earth's noblest spirits in submission bow,
O Christ, to Thee;
As, lifted from the earth, 'tis thine to draw,
With loving plea,
The great and noble: 'tis a joy divine
To know earth's mightiest intellects are thine.

What though there are who still refuse thy claims,
Thou Christ of God,
There are the bright, the amaranthine names
Which speak aloud
Of soaring minds, and highest gifts of soul,
In meekness bowing 'neath thy sweet control.

Blinded, alas! are they, still held by earth
And reason's wiles,
Whose soul from contemplating heavenly worth
With pride recoils.
Infinite folly! for Thyself to know
Is man's supreme and highest bliss below.

How poor that knowledge is, wreathed round by time
And earth's sad gloom!
Immortal souls need studies more sublime,
With amplier room
For soul expansion. They alone are wise
Whose vision penetrates beyond the skies.

When time shall cease; this knowledge shall endure,
And bloom for aye;
Still heavenly wisdom shall the soul allure
In bliss alway—
There, through unending ages to explore,
In God's own light, heaven's mysteries evermore!

Moslem and Druse Girls.

THE work known as Miss Taylor's Orphanage for Moslem and Druse Girls is closing its thirty-third year. There are over sixty children in the Home, and they are being trained for earth and heaven. In connection with the work of the Home is a large and flourishing day school in another part of Beyrout, which is doing good work. The writer, who has known Miss Taylor and her work for the past ten years, visited the Home recently, and was greatly pleased with the progress of the work, and to see the children looking so bright and happy.

The girls know much about the Bible, which is their principal lesson-book. They can recite by heart whole chapters and psalms, the prophecies in the Old Testament concerning the coming of Christ, and the parts of the New Testament showing the fulfilment of the same. They have the Old and New Testament history at their finger-ends in a manner which would surprise many grown-up Bible students. Hundreds of these dear girls have been won for Christ during the past years. Miss Taylor is a soul-winner, and lives and works for this purpose. The respect and reverence which the Moslem community show for her, is an evidence of her unique influence and devoted life.

While the principal work of the Home is the teaching and training of the sixty children, the place is quite

A CENTRE OF ACTIVITY.

There is a Medical Mission for the poor and needy ones in the district. In nearly all cases the patients are too poor to pay anything even for their medicines. The sufferings relieved and the benefits conferred in this department have called down many a blessing on Miss Taylor's head from the sufferers. At the Mothers' Meetings, women representing many Moslem homes are taught to provide their children's garments, &c. While the women are working, Miss Taylor or her assistants talk, and many a useful hint about domestic responsibilities is given. The mothers are pointed to Jesus, who "taketh away the sin of the world." The Bible is read and explained to them after the time for sewing has expired, so that they may carry away with them the words of Him who spake as never man spake.

Evangelistic meetings are carried on weekly at outside posts. Miss Taylor's house is ever open to the young people of Beyrout, and her Sunday evening meetings have been the means of blessing to hundreds of young men, who always speak of her as their

"BEYROUT MOTHER."

This dear servant of God is in her seventy-third year, but her heart and sympathies are as young and tender as when she was twenty.

At the present time, I understand, Miss Taylor is passing through a time of testing and trial as to supplies. This, therefore, is a call to God's stewards, and the many friends who know her good work, to do their duty. And I am sure this only requires to be known to be remedied. Dr. Ferguson, of Kinmundy, near Mintlaw, N.B.—so well known to the Christian world for his Christian work and interest in the mission field—is hon. secretary and treasurer for the work.

Ladies Wanted.

THE need of further reinforcements in the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission is great. A letter has just been received from the secretary for the North-West Provinces of India with reference to no fewer than seven vacancies in the stations there, for which no one is at present available. Ladies are required for zenana visiting, educational work, evangelistic effort in the hospitals, and a thoroughly trained lady-nurse and volunteers for work in the villages. Readers are asked to make these needs known, and join in prayer that God will send forth earnest devoted missionaries in increasing numbers. There is much new ground to be occupied as soon as the workers are available. The address of the mission is 2, Adelphi Terrace, Strand.

International S.S. Lessons.

January 14, 1900.

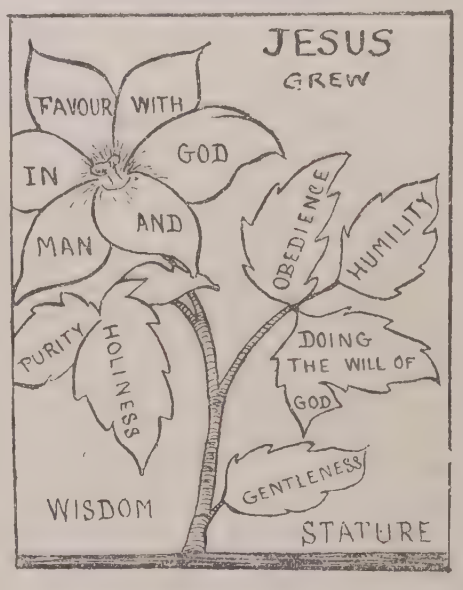
LUKE ii. 41-52.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man" (Luke ii. 52).

INTRODUCTION.

LAST week we learnt about the little Babe born at Bethlehem. Who He was, why He came to our earth, and how we can see in Him the Saviour of the world. To-day we look at another scene in his life, the time when He had grown into boyhood and how He still grew.

PLAN FOR BLACKBOARD.



Key to the Diagram.—Jesus Christ grew from boyhood to manhood like a beautiful plant. He grew in stature as all boys grow; He grew in wisdom, bringing forth in his character holiness, purity, gentleness, etc., as a plant puts forth its leaves. He also grew in favour with God and man, showing that He had in his life the flower of being loved, because He did what was right.

THE SUBJECT OF THE LESSON.

The subject that gives us this scene in the life of Christ was the Passover yearly feast (41, 42). It was one of the three great feasts all Jews were expected to keep "after the custom" (42). Study Exodus xii. 1-28. How important! What memories! Little did the people know the real Passover Lamb was with them, even in their midst, in that quiet Jewish lad of twelve years of age, coming up to Jerusalem with Joseph and Mary (1 Cor. v. 7; John i. 29). The people travelled in companies, in caravans, for safety and for companionship (44).

THE PARENTS.

They lost their Boy (45).

SUPPOSED He was with the caravan (44).
SEARCHED among their friends (44).
SOUGHT Him at Jerusalem (45).
SORROWFUL at the loss (48).

It is ever the same in our day. Some suppose, they hope, they think, they have Jesus with them. It is no good; we must know (1 John v. 13). We must seek for Him earnestly, with all our hearts (Matt. vii. 7), and we shall find Him. To be without Jesus means sorrow; with Him means joy (John xvi. 22).

Joseph and Mary found Jesus in one of the many courts of the Temple, talking with the Rabbis (46, 47). In answer to the question, He gives a wonderful answer (49), so full of meaning (Mal. iii. 1), deeper than anyone there could fathom (50) (John i. 10).

THE BOY JESUS.

(1) GREW IN STATURE.

Verse 42. Only a few verses are given us to tell us of the early life of Jesus.

As a Babe (Luke ii. 16).
As a Child ,, (ii. 40).
As a Boy ,, (ii. 43, R.V.).

But these three all have different meanings in a Jewish boy's life (look up Customs of Jews). In our lesson to-day Jesus is twelve years of age, and begins the "grown-up" part. "Grew in stature" is "age" in margin (52). He was a real boy in every sense (Heb. iv. 15); "all points." His daily work was carpenter's work (Mark vi. 3). Verse 51. His home, Nazareth, a quiet little village.

(2) GREW IN CHARACTER (John i. 14).

Verse 51. Obedience. Found in Temple. Loved God's house. Did not go as a form (Psa. cxxii. 1; Luke iv. 16; Matt. xiii. 54).

Humility. The Son of God a boy? Yes. True humility (Phil. ii. 7).

Purity. Always - in thought, word, and deed (1 Peter ii. 22).

Gentleness. How gently He spoke to Mary (49). How obediently He went with her (1 Peter ii. 23).

Holiness. This always pleasing to God (Heb. vii. 26).

God's Will was always first—perfect submission (John iv. 34; Psa. xl. 8).

(3) GREW IN WISDOM (KNOWLEDGE).

See following references:—Matt. vii. 28; Mark i. 22; Luke iv. 22, iv. 32.

LESSONS TO LEARN.

All the subjects mentioned above we need to learn. Let us sum up all in this:—Jesus is our Example at every stage of our lives, for little children, for boys and girls, and for grown-up men and women (1 Peter ii. 21, John iii. 15, 1 John ii. 6).

Christian Endeavour.

TOPIC FOR JAN. 7.

PRAYER THAT OBTAINS.—Luke xi. 5-13, xviii. 2-5.

THERE are many conditions of true prayer, which will occur to any thoughtful student of the Bible; for instance, it must be earnest. There are times when we know we are on the line of God's purposes, when we may dare to be importunate. Our prayer must be offered in the Name of Christ: that is, it must be in harmony with the nature of Christ, which was devoted to the glory of God, and to the blessing of men. That Name will eliminate the ingredient of selfishness which will mar any prayer by whomsoever offered. Prayer must also be based on some promise of God, which is presented to Him as a cheque or note is presented to a bank.

But all these are but steps towards the faith which obtains. It is, after all, not prayer that obtains, but faith that obtains promises. That is why our Lord lays so much stress upon receiving, and much of our prayer fails because we forget that He said, Everyone that asketh, receiveth; and again, All things whatsoever ye ask for, believe that ye have received them (Mark xi. 24). And St. John tells us that whatever we ask according to his will, we are to know that we have the petition (1 John v. 13-15).

So far as one can describe the process, it seems something on this fashion. The soul reverently enters into the presence of God, glorifying and praising Him for his greatness and goodness. It is conscious of needing some very special gift which is promised. In the name of the Mediator it presents its request with the confidence of a little child. With earnestness of desire and speech it unfolds the reasons why the boon sought is so necessary. But it does not leave its prayer at this point to go away in uncertainty as to what the issue shall be. By an act of the spirit, the suppliant seems to receive definitely the spiritual gift, or even the temporal; and blessing God it realises that it has received, that the special grace has been imparted, to be discovered and used under stress of need; that the temporal gift has also been received, though it may be kept back until the precise moment when it can be delivered, in much the same fashion as a Christmas present may be purchased long before the hour arrives of handing it to its destined possessor. This is what Christ meant by "receiving."

It has a great effect upon prayer, because it makes it so much more definite. The soul comes into God's presence with a definite object, and realizes that it is transacting definite business.

It also is provocative of praise, because we are able to thank God for what we have received, even though it may not be actually in our hands.

A Christian man once said to me that if he adopted this principle his prayers would become so much shorter. He seemed to suggest that this shortening of prayer was an argument against the truth of the position which I had laid down. But I showed him that, whilst the supplicatory part of prayer might be somewhat shortened by being rendered more definite and direct, the thanksgiving side would be greatly multiplied, for the soul would be perpetually finding new reasons for grateful praise.

You must take as well as pray, do not be constantly sending cablegrams to the other Continent for consignments of goods, without visiting the wharf to unload the heavenly galleons when they arrive. Use the hand as well as the lip—this to take as that to ask. Such is the prayer that obtains.

The Imperial Protestant Federation and the Protestant Alliance.

(From The Protestant Observer.)

We have received, just as we are going to press, a copy of the January number of the Protestant Alliance Official Organ, containing an attack upon the Imperial Protestant Federation, for which, at present, we decline to hold the Managing Committee of the Protestant Alliance responsible, since it has never, in its official capacity, taken any action of an unfriendly character towards the Federation. On the contrary, it has, in the most friendly way, joined the Federation, and appointed its own representatives to sit upon its Imperial Council. It is still a part of the Federation, and we know that it has never given its sanction to an attack upon it which, if generally adopted, would lead to the overthrow of the first serious and successful attempt to unite the Protestant forces of the United Kingdom, and expose the Protestant party to the ridicule of the Romanists and Ritualists everywhere. In commenting on the article in the Official Organ, it must be understood that we are only acting in self-defence, which is a first law of nature, and the manifest right of every man and every organization also. We make no attack upon, nor do we in any way criticise, the Protestant Alliance. On the contrary, it has our heartiest good wishes; our only desire on its behalf is that its usefulness, income, and energy may be increased a hundredfold, and this notwithstanding the manifest desire of the Official Organ to make the Protestant Alliance into another Imperial Protestant Federation. "The main object of the Protestant Alliance," says the Official Organ, "is to combine, or to federate all Protestants and all Protestant Societies." The reply to this assertion is in the form of three very simple questions: Why did not the Alliance undertake this work of federating Protestant Societies before the Imperial Protestant Federation came into existence? And supposing, for argument's sake, that it had done such work before then, why did it afterwards officially join a new Federation to do the work it was itself already doing? And why should the Official Organ now wish the Alliance to do the work which its Managing Committee, when it joined the Imperial Protestant Federation, practically agreed to place in its hands?

The direct object of the article before us is manifestly to weaken, if not destroy, the Imperial Protestant Federation, for it says:—"We therefore urge our readers to give their entire support not to new and untried organizations, but to the old and the well-tried Protestant Alliance." In other words this really means, let the Federation die as quickly as possible through lack of nutrition. This exhortation will, we are sure, be received with regret and disapproval by all friends of Protestant unity, including the overwhelming majority of the best supporters of the Protestant Alliance. We believe that it will tend rather to increase the donations and subscriptions to the Federation.

And now we ask, What evil thing has the Imperial Protestant Federation done that it should be thus attacked by one in its own household? Is it that it is a useless organization, which is doing no work for Protestantism? On the contrary, the charge is not that it has done too little for Protestantism, but that it has done too much! It has issued Protestant Electoral Rolls, and that is all! It has even succeeded in issuing and obtaining signatures to nearly three times as many such rolls as the Protestant Alliance. And yet, strange as it may seem, perhaps the best defence of the action of the Federation is found in the very article of the Official Organ to which we are now replying. It says:—

"In anticipation of the next general election, the time for which is drawing near, much interest has been awakened in Protestant circles on the question of the registration of Protestant voters in the various constituencies of the country. This is a matter which the Protestant Alliance has kept steadily in view for many years. The Church Association also has bestirred itself in it to some purpose. These two Societies work together most cordially, though each has its own form of electoral roll. It is affirmed that, because the work of these two influential Societies is distinct, one is antagonistic to the other. Nothing can be further from the truth. There is no rivalry between them; or, if there be, it is only the friendly rivalry of striving to do most for the common cause. This constitutes united action in the best and most effective form."

Just so. The case is here well and wisely put. But why not extend the principle, and apply it to the Imperial Protestant Federation also? Why should not all three organizations "work together most cordially, though each has its own form of electoral roll"? "Where there is a will there is a way," is a good old proverb. Let there be between these three organizations, by all means, only "a friendly rivalry of striving to do most for the common cause," and let neither of them say to the other "Stand aside and do nothing," while there is work enough, and more than enough for all. We believe that every thoughtful Protestant will agree with us in the opinion that the Protestant cause and Protestant work come before the interests of any Protestant organization whatever. Now the work of securing, by means of Electoral Rolls, the return of Protestant Members of Parliament, is of such a gigantic and widespread a nature, and the time for doing it is so short, that neither the Church Association nor the Protestant Alliance can possibly cover all the ground, and therefore, any assistance in this direction, given by the Imperial Protestant Federation does NOT, as asserted by the Official Organ, "take up the work of a distinct and separate society;" it only supplements their efforts where additional help is sorely needed at the present crisis. It does not wish any Protestant society "to give up its own work." The very idea is absurd. As a matter of fact eleven Protestant societies, who are joined to the Imperial Protestant Federation, are at this moment circulating its Protestant Electoral Rolls. It is evident, therefore, that they do not think that the Federation is in any way interfering with their work, or "taking up the work of a distinct and Protestant Society." But the Official Organ further says:

"Some things have appeared in print which imply that all electoral work on the Protestant side should be in the hands of one central society, such as the Imperial Protestant Federation. This is absolutely impossible. Neither the Protestant Alliance nor the Church Association, which have done so much already, would be likely to agree to give up their own work. Indeed, the Protestant Alliance could not, in consistence with its principles, allow its action to be controlled in any degree by the members of other societies."

Now all this is assuming what cannot be proved, and insinuates charges against the Federation which have not the slightest foundation. We respectfully challenge the Official Organ to produce any published statement of the Federation to justify its assertions and insinuations. The Federation never has had any desire that "all electoral work on the Protestant side should be in the hands of one central society," or that they should be "controlled" by it in their proper individual work. It aims at controlling no society whatever, but, on the contrary, to strengthen the action of all, and to bring them together in brotherly love and concord, for a common purpose, and in this object it will, it believes, secure the hearty co-operation of the overwhelming majority of the supporters of the Protestant Alliance and other Protestant organizations, notwithstanding what the Official Organ may say to the contrary.

We understand that the real wish of a few officials of one or two Protestant societies is that the Imperial Protestant Federation shall not only give up for the future its widely successful efforts to obtain signatures to its Protestant Electoral Rolls, but actually to withdraw those already signed! In other words, that at the next General Election the Protestant Cause shall lose the help of tens of thousands of Protestant voters, anxious and willing to help, at the very moment when help is most sorely needed. Is not this putting Protestant Societies before the Protestant Religion? We ought, in the present great Crisis in the National Church, to welcome all help, and not grumble because we get too much. A dog-in-the-manger policy will not commend itself to the subscribers to our Protestant Societies, nor do we believe that they will tolerate it.

We have been compelled to deal with this subject in self-defence, as the organ of the Imperial Protestant Federation. We do so with deep and sincere regret at the lack of discretion which has made it necessary.

Mr. Edward H. Garbett is Secretary of the Federation; Mr. James W. Walsh is Assistant Secretary; and the Offices are at 3, Palmer Street, Queen Anne's Gate, London, S.W.

SUNDAY, January 7. Job v.

ELIPHAZ said some very beautiful things about the care and love of God. The Apostle quotes the 13th verse in 1 Cor. iii. 19. So we may find comfort in his assurances as to the character of God, "who doeth great things and unsearchable, marvellous things without number."

The greatest field of undiscovered knowledge is not astronomy, biology, chemistry, electricity, great as these fields are, but God. For evermore this field of unexplored knowledge will invite our research, always before us, however far we may go in our discoveries. Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, David, Daniel, Paul, John, Peter, were the men they were because they knew God. Every day God comes to us and says, I will be all this to thee. In view of the dark days that seem to lie before us, the assurances of this chapter are very precious.

Of course, there will be correction; but He binds where his rod has made sores, and makes whole where his hands have wounded. He delivers, redeems, hides. And when we are right with Him, He makes our enemies be at peace, and creation in league with us. We are happy, then, when He corrects. Because as soon as we have learnt the lesson He designs to teach, the chastisement is removed. "Then there came to him a hand, with some of the leaves of the tree of life, the which Christian took, and applied to the wounds which he had received, and was healed immediately. He also sat down in that place to eat bread, and to drink of the bottle that was given him a little before; so, being refreshed, he addressed himself to his journey."

Have you ever wished, like Job, to die, that the long entail of suffering might be broken, and that the bitter heart-ache might no longer gnaw? Others have felt this; but they have lived to see the day when joy came back on them, as the tide returns up the beach, and they reaped in joy where they had sown in tears. God does not prolong your life because He takes pleasure in your pain, but because He desires that the affliction, which is but for a moment, may work out for you a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. The dentist submits you to pain because a few moments of it will relieve you from hours of agonizing and sleepless suffering, and restore you the powers of digestion and health. Only dare to believe in the personal care of God, and that He is keenly interested. He will not suffer one moment of pain beyond what is absolutely needful. He will, in the meanwhile, give strength as the strength of stones, and make thy flesh as brass (12).

More bitter than physical suffering is our suffering when we are misunderstood or misrepresented by our friends, when they become as streams which are abundant in the winter but dried up in the heat of summer, so that there is least water when it is most wanted. We expect our friends to make allowances for our wild words, spoken in the extremity of agony and grief; to bear with our petulance; to be patient with us. It is a bitter disillusionment when we find we have counted on them in vain. Job found it so. But there is a love that never fails!

TUESDAY, January 9. Job. vii.

As the R.V. suggests there is a warfare for man on the earth. Life is one long combat against insidious and strongly-entrenched foes. We can never throw down our weapons, and fling ourselves in listless self-indulgence on the ground. When we are most self-confident, we are most exposed to danger. Life is, also, a day of toil, in which the slave longs for the coming of the shadow and his wage. It is, also, like a weaver's hut, where the shuttle shoots to and fro, for we are perpetually weaving the fabric of character on the looms of thought and action.

As Job meant them, vv. 17-21 are full of bitter reproach against God, as though He were in arms against his poor, suffering child, for purposes of selfish gratification. And herein some of my readers may have participated. When repeated trial has come, you have said, It is too bad, too unkind, too hard of God to treat you thus. The milk turns sour, the sweetness and love of the heart are as gall. At such times God is very near. The mother does not cast aside her child, because, in its passion, it beats its little hands against her breast. Tell out to God what you are feeling. The very saying, or the inability of saying, the hard things you feel, will be their corrective.

But there is a beautiful sense of these words. God does set his heart upon us in Jesus Christ; every morning He visits us, standing by our bedside to call us, and to instil into us sweet waking thoughts; every moment He is trying us, not as Satan does, that we may fall, but that we may rise to higher things. He is the watcher and preserver of men (20).

WEDNESDAY, January 10. Job viii.

From the heavy calamities that had befallen Job and his children, Bildad infers that they had been heinous sinners, and urges the patriarch to seek unto God betimes, and make his supplication to the Almighty, assuring him that He would awake for him and make his lot a prosperous and happy one. This reasoning rested on the false premiss that sin always precedes suffering. In the long process of eternity it is, of course, clear that all wrong-doing must be punished and avenged; but it is certainly not the case that the presence of suffering necessarily implies secret or overt sin. Jesus suffered, but we know that He did no sin. There are disciplinary sufferings; there are fire for the gold and a file for the jewel; there is the proof and test, as of Abraham's faith; there are misfortunes which are allowed to come, as in John ix. and xi., that there may be scope for God to work. Are you suffering? Ask the Holy Spirit to show you if He has any controversy with you. If not, bow under God's mighty Hand; He will exalt you in due time.

Bildad quotes a large amount of ancient lore, summed up and preserved in the proverbial expressions of the ancients. It is all to the same effect, that calamity is a proof of sin. Never accept this dictum, nor allow yourself to be discouraged by the insinuations of your advisers and friends. God is not punishing you, for all your stripes were laid on Jesus; but He may be testing and trying you. Cease from man, and turn to God. He will one day explain the mystery of pain to the patient heart. Dare to believe that ere long He will fill your mouth with laughter, and your lips with rejoicing.

Green pastures are before thee,
Which yet thou hast not seen,
Bright skies will soon be o'er thee
Where the dark clouds have been.
Thy hope thou canst not measure,
Thy path of life is free,
Thy Saviour has thy treasure,
And He will walk with thee.

THURSDAY, January 11. Job ix.

How great God is! O my soul, bethink thee of this! He can remove those mighty mountains, nay, He is removing them by the action of countless streams which bear them to the valleys, and will level them in an age of ages. He can shake the earth with convulsions, and veil the sun in eclipse. The stars are lit and trimmed by Him, and some day He will extinguish them. He built the sunny chambers of the south, where men never remark on the weather, because it is always fair. How great God is, but He is thine—thy Father; and thou art his, his child.

Since those words of Job's were written, Jesus has revealed the Father, and the Spirit has come into our hearts—speak to Him, therefore. Say to Him with all reverence, Father, what doest Thou? Make supplication to Him; dare to believe that He has hearkened to thy voice. He will not beat on thee with a tempest, nor multiply thy wounds without cause. He is strong, but his strength is thine. He is a holy judge, but He will set thee a time to plead. He does not laugh at thy trials, nor has He given the earth into the hand of the wicked. Thy hasting days, like the feet of the courier, or the passage of the swift ships, or the flight of the eagle, will bring thee home. Put off thy sad countenance, and brighten up (27). Wash in the fountain opened for sin and uncleanness; cleanse thy stains in the blood that cleanseth from all sin. There is a Mediator betwixt God and men, Jesus Christ, Himself man. That sweet Daysman can lay his hand upon thee and God. Thou canst say what Job could not, for thou hast sat in classrooms in the upper school, that he never reached.

It shall be
A face like my face that receives thee; a man like to me,
Thou shalt love and be loved by, for ever; a Hand like this hand
Shall throw open the gates of new life to thee! See the Christ stand!

FRIDAY, January 12. Job x.

The argument of this chapter is that God has made, and therefore He must bear. In vv. 8-13, there is a description of the origin and growth of the human frame, which is all attributed to God. Every clause rings with Thou, Thine, and Thee. And what Job says is true, not only of our physical life, but of our entire environment, our moral and spiritual life, so far as they are due to the inevitable influences among which God has placed us. He made us what we are, and located us in such a place, and at such a time. Nothing is left to chance, to malevolent Fate, or to the malice of others. Of course we may have neutralized and altered what He meant only for good Men may make whiskey out of corn-grain which God intended for food.

But since God is so deeply responsible for us, may we not trust Him? Will He not perfect that which concerneth us? Surely child desertion is as impossible to Him as to any loving parent.

God foresaw all your sinfulness, but He knew the virtue of the blood of Christ. He anticipated all the weakness of your soul and the strength of your foes, but He knew the love and grace of the Holy Spirit. He knew that your path would lie much through the valleys of conflict and of shadow, but He reckoned that his rod and staff would be sufficient. Sin is not a reason that He should turn from us, any more than smallpox is a reason why a mother should disown her babe. God comes to fight sin with us. And days of pain only appeal more powerfully to Him than days of summer sunshine. Do not wish for darkness; lo, the morning is speeding over the hills.

Zophar is very vehement, censuring Job's self-justification and refusal to acknowledge the guilt which his friends had attributed to him. There is, no doubt, truth in what he says. Many of us are filled with self-complacency, because we apply too low a standard to ourselves. We judge our best by the worst in others, or we lower the standard by calling infirmities things that God counts for sins. We excuse ourselves, and perhaps have a very inadequate conception of what God is and demands. When a man says that his doctrine is pure, and that he is clean; when we hear the Pharisee in the temple saying that he is not as others, because he has refrained from certain overt acts of crime; when men boast of not having sinned for so long a time, we wish that God might speak, and show his secrets.

What a magnificent conception that is which is contained in vv. 7-12: Canst thou reach the depth of God? Canst thou reach unto the perfection of the Almighty? The heights of heaven, what canst thou do? Deeper than Sheol, what canst thou know? Yet this God is our Father, and He is love.

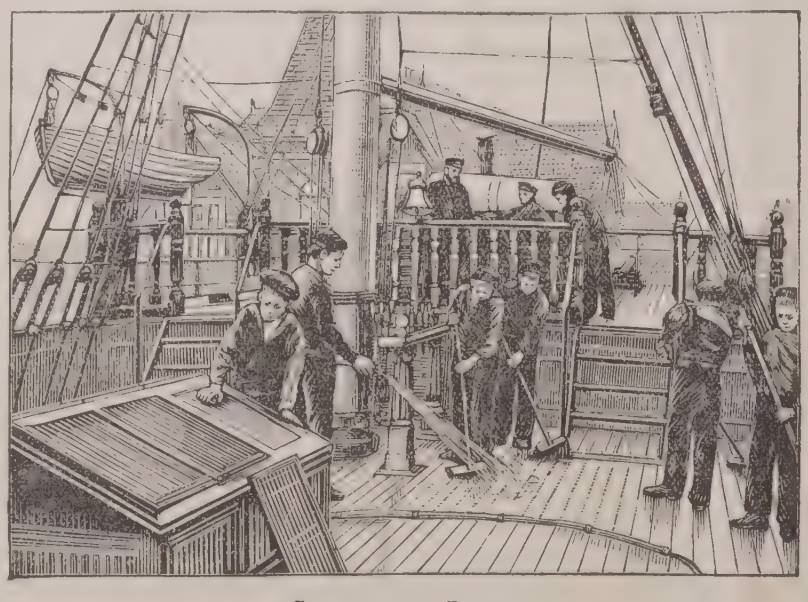
For the closing paragraph by all means turn to R.V. Job had said that he could not lift up his face (x. 15), but when sin is put away we can exchange glances with God without fear, and lift up our face without stain.

Visiting Scotland's Orphans.

Mr. Quarrier's Village, Bridge-of-Weir.

HAVING spent the early part of my life upon the Continent, I always associated, with inmates of orphan homes, short hair and an irritating sameness of frocks. A pleasant surprise awaited me at Mr. Quarrier's Home on the occasion of our recent visit to his orphan-colony. We had come up on a rainy Saturday afternoon, in company with Mr. Findlay, Pastor of the St. George's Cross Tabernacle, Glasgow. After luncheon, as we stood by the window talking, a group of little ones passed the house, their happy faces turning radiant at the sight of Mrs. Findlay, who threw hand-kisses to them, saying, "These are some of our infant orphans." "Why, you have no uniforms, then?" said I. "No, father does not believe in uniform dressing. It puts the stamp of pauperism upon the children whom we wish to save for society. We do not like them to think that they are different from others. Each child is dealt with individually, watched and observed, and when the time comes for choosing a trade or a profession, we know something of the proclivities of each."

Anxious that no individuality should be lost sight of, Mr. Quarrier avoids uniformity even in buildings. Of the fifty-seven Homes which form this "City of the Young," each presents the aspect of a residential villa, with distinct architectural features of its own, and a garden-plot adjoining it. Prizes are given to the Homes that have the best-kept gardens. This system was first objected to on the ground that it involved expenditure; but in the course of time the founder was able to show that taste and beauty, as well as variety, could be effected within the limits of a strict and true economy. For £12 a year, on an average, an orphan is noused, fed, and educated.



Cleaning the Deck.

The ten-roomed Homes are occupied by thirty inmates or less. Girls are under the supervision of a mother. A married couple has the charge of the boys, who, in their spare time, are taught a trade by the father.

As this was the usual half-holiday, we missed seeing the children at work in the Homes; but, being shown round, could easily imagine their beehive-life during the week. From James-Arthur, an iron brig of over 120ft in length, the generous gift of a widow lady in memory of her husband, we saw some of the juvenile crew playing football by the banks of the river Gryffe. They reside with their captain on board the brig, erected on a firm bed of concrete, and are taught navigation, as far as it can be taught, on dry land. Mr. Quarrier hopes thus to raise up some missionary seamen.

In passing some ruins we learned that, owing to the break-out of fire on October 19, all the workshops had been destroyed, including the laundry, bakery, joiner's, shoemaker's, printer's, and tailor's shops.

At the great store—where, as everywhere, cleanliness, neatness, and order are observed—forty-eight dozen loaves of bread pass over the counter every day, and the total per month is about eight tons of flour, two and a-half tons of meal, and one ton of sugar. Much of the wearing apparel is sent in by kind friends, but the largest part is manufactured on the premises. "The Lord will provide" is the motto carved in stone over the entrance to the building.

With Mr. Quarrier it was trusting in the Lord all the way through. Without ever applying directly to anybody, or asking help from bazaars or entertainments, he always had his needs provided in due season. Here is his testimony:—

"We passed through many a sore trial. We were often short of money, but never needed to stint food to our children for lack of provisions," said he, as we sat down by the fireside. "This work is a standing rebuke to those who deny a prayer-hearing and a prayer-answering God."

Yes, truth is stranger than fiction. There is much more romance in the life of a child of God than there is in the most exotic imagination of a novelist. Let us listen to him as he recalls the principal points in his career.

He knew what poverty was, and what it meant to lose a father in early life. Feeling keenly in his own experience the lot of others, he made, like Abraham Lincoln, only much earlier in life, a resolution which he never forgot: "Mother, when I am a big man I shall build a home for orphans just like me." This was said one day in the High Street of Glasgow fifty-eight years ago. Years rolled by, and the little boy was becoming a successful business man, when he took the first step towards the accomplishment of his childish desire, by establishing, in 1864, the Glasgow Shoeblack Brigade, which had for its object the gathering in and assisting of the little street arabs of Glasgow.

The work grew, and seven years later the Lord sent him, in answer to prayer, £2,000, which enabled him to open the first Orphans' Home in Renfrew Lane. It was an old workshop, where some thirty orphans were gathered in and cared for. "How many did you get in the first day?" asked my husband, at this juncture of the story. "Only one; and he was hesitating as to whether he should come or not. We had to coax him in. After giving him a bath and something to eat, we put him to bed, and then he said: 'Oh, that's grand, sir!'"

The City Home soon became too narrow for the many applicants. Mr. Quarrier, wishing to find a place for building a series of Homes—not farther than three miles out of Glasgow—made arrangemen s for the purchase of twenty acres, which were to cost £6,000; but something happened by which the negotiations were set aside. A friend mentioned the present site, but was met with the objection that it was too far out from Glasgow. Yet, on visiting it, he could see at once that it answered his own ideal of what was needed, far more than the other. He lifted up his heart and voice and said: "Lord, this will do. Thy will is far better than mine, and I accept it thankfully."

Mr. Quarrier's Homes, Bridge of Weir.

He purchased forty acres at a cost of £3,560 and the change to Bridge of Weir was made in 1876. In 1878 the first building in which were combined home, church, and school, was finished. The present area consists of 106 acres, and during the past year there were over 1,300 children at the Homes.

As the work became more and more known, people ceased to call Mr. Quarrier an Utopian. Friends were raised for his schemes, and contributions came in from all parts of the world, varying in amount from the widow's mite to the merchant prince's thousands. One day Mr. Quarrier found an old envelope containing bank-notes to the value of £1,700, with the anonymous request to build a home called Sagittarius. Another time he received a donation of £500 saved in pennies by a poor widow.

Then, again, one day a Glasgow washerwoman sent for him to tell him that she wished to give him her fortune. She had been a hard-working woman all her life, spending most of her time at the wash-tub. Of an economical turn of mind, she put penny to penny and shilling to shilling for a rainy day. Long years of saving and compound interest accumulated her earnings to the handsome sum of over £1,400. She was an unconverted woman. God moved her heart at the right time for the Homes to be provided with pure water by means of her money, and for her to receive the Water of Life through the instrumentality of Mr. Quarrier. She died a few days after the donation act, with the words trembling upon her lips, "Just as I am, without one plea."

These are only a few instances of the wonderful ways in which funds came in just at the very moment they were needed. If they were not coming in, the servant of God would understand that he was not called to do the work that lay on his heart. He never undertakes anything without the necessary amount in hand; consequently there is not a penny of debt upon any of the Homes.

Until recently Mr. Quarrier sent bands of boys to Canada; but, owing to an act passed by the Ontario Government, which came into force in September, 1897, the outlet to the Dominion has for the present been closed. This law prohibits children from being taken into the province without a descriptive licence, which is degrading to the children, as it reminds them and others of their antecedents. Under these circumstances Mr. Quarrier has resolved to make provision for a longer residence in the Homes, thus securing for them a more thorough training for trades and domestic service at home. This will require the erection of ten additional Homes, which will cost £2,000 each.

Since our visit the twenty-eighth annual meeting was held, on November 22, at the Christian Institute, Glasgow, under the presidency of the Hon. the Lord Provost, Mr. Samuel Chisholm, and attended by a large and influential company of friends. W. M.

Gospel Work in Ireland.

DEAR SIR,—I think it will interest all true friends of Ireland to hear of a very hopeful work going on near Portumna, a wild tract of country on the shores of Lough Derg. This district was the cockpit of Ireland during the land war which raged twelve years ago, and is on the notorious "Clanricarde" estate. Previous to this, there was scarcely a Protestant family in the neighbourhood; now there are between forty and fifty.

After the eviction of tenants who, under the direction of the Land League, refused to pay any rent, some were re-instated, but the majority left the country, and the farms were re-let, for the most part, to Protestants from the north, and there is now a flourishing colony. At first, the farmers were obliged to carry on their work under a guard of police, now, happily, this state of things no longer exists. Most of these families live far from any place of worship, and the Methodists have come to the rescue, and for more than a year an evangelist has been working amongst them, holding meetings in the different farmhouses. I was at a "home mission" meeting, recently, in one, and there were about sixty people crowded into the little sitting-room.

There is no place available large enough for the meetings, and the people are not rich enough to build one without help. If some Christians interested in Gospel work in Ireland would contribute towards a room, it would be a great help and encouragement to their work. Any sums sent to Rev. S. W. H. Nesbitt, The Manse, Borrisokane, co. Tipperary; or to me, would be thankfully acknowledged.

Evangelism in Limerick.

STRANGE as it may seem, yet i is no less true, that Limerick, the fourth city in Ireland, has no hall where evangelistic meetings can be held on common ground. During the visits of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, Major Whittle and Rev. John McNeill, it was necessary to secure from a Roman Catholic proprietor, at enormous cost, the Theatre, an old building altogether unsuited for such work. This has been in the past a great source of weakness to the evangelical section of the community, as united evangelistic work has consistently been boycotted by those who were in charge of the three halls in the city. From the point of view of those opposed to united evangelistic work, this course of action has succeeded admirably, as Limerick has almost always been left out in the cold when such missions have been planned.

This want is at last about to be remedied by the Limerick Young Men's Christian Association, as they are erecting a hall to seat 400 on a plot of ground in the rear of their newly acquired premises in George Street, the principal business street, with a side entrance in Hartstonge, one of the most suitable sites in the city. Here it is proposed to carry on evangelistic meetings and special missions.

The total cost of the premises and hall will be £1,200. Of this sum the young men themselves have generously given £250; and as no men of ample means are connected with the work, for the remainder an appeal is being made to the Christian public in the three kingdoms. Mr. Robert McCann, travelling secretary of the Irish Y.M.C.A.'s, Bangor, Ireland, or the treasurer, Mr. E. H. Wright, 5, Victoria Terrace, Limerick, will be glad to communicate with interested friends.

There are special reasons which cannot be detailed in public why ready and hearty support should be given to this effort, as it is mission work as needy and as deserving of support as in any foreign land. No better work can be done in Ireland than that of raising up a band of men who will live and preach Christ amongst their Roman Catholic fellow countrymen, a work to which no small amount of success has already been granted.

The Family Gathering.

"Unto Him shall the gathering of the people be."—(Gen. xlix. 10.)

Not here! Not here! Too many absent faces,
We lack the loved ones passed beyond our call.
Not here, but yonder in the heavenly places,
There shall we gather, and shall find them all.

Protestant Lectures. — Conjointly with the Council of the National Protestant Church Union, the Committee of the Central Y.M.C.A. have made arrangements for the delivery, at Exeter Hall, of a series of important lectures on Protestantism. A list of able speakers is announced, and the gatherings will, doubtless, prove profitably instructive. Programmes may be had from Mr. J. H. Putterill, Exeter Hall, Strand.

Our Fallen Sisters.

FEMALE GUARDIAN SOCIETY.

THE Female Guardian Society is a valuable auxiliary to the various Gospel missions, midnight meetings, and rescue societies in London and the provinces, inasmuch as its doors are ever open to welcome our fallen sisters, to whom the Gospel has been effectually brought, and who would, without such an asylum, be again drawn into the vortex of iniquity. It feeds, clothes, and trains in industrial work all, who are thus afforded an opportunity for a fresh start in life.

More than ten thousand young women have entered and been benefited by these homes. It is a sad fact that of this number one-third have been orphans, cast upon the world without a friend, many being mere children. The whole period during which the penitents may share the advantages of the institutions is two years; but they usually leave for domestic service at the end of eighteen months.

A perusal of the minutes of the Ladies' Committee would reveal evidence which would satisfy the most sceptical that by means of the help afforded a great amount of blessing has been bestowed, not only upon the fallen, but upon society generally. The Society shelters 100 cases, and has rescued from the streets many thousands of young women, many of whom have become true followers of the Lord Jesus Christ, and not a few faithful messengers of the Gospel.

The past year has been a difficult one, mainly due to the serious falling off in the revenue of the industrial department, the diminution being largely caused by competition arising out of the boom that has taken place of late in the floating of joint-stock steam laundries. The Society's invested funds are entirely exhausted, and it is earnestly hoped that some of the Lord's stewards may be induced to co-operate with a friend, who offers £100 on condition that four others will do the same. THE RESCUE SOCIETY.

At this time of national difficulty, public attention is diverted from the needs of many worthy philanthropic organizations. Prominent among those in need are a number of societies engaged in rescue work.

The secretary of the Rescue Society, for instance, writes: "The seven homes of the Society are in good working order, and loving hands and warm hearts are there ready to receive those who desire, as far as possible, to retrieve the past, and to welcome those who are in danger. The Society has more cases now under its care than it has had for several years; but no applicant will be refused while there is a vacant bed." Communications may be addressed to Mr. C. Stuart Thorpe, 79, Finsbury Pavement.

FRIENDLESS AND FALLEN.

In connection with the friendless and fallen work, a metropolitan magistrate recently said, in sending a donation in aid of the Home and Night Refuge, "Accept my warm thanks for the assistance you always so kindly give to the cases we send to you from this court." Within the last few days a poor young woman wrote to Mr. Taylor and said: "I am perfectly willing to do all in my power that is right to start a different life. I do so want to be good again. . . . I feel heart broken, and shall be glad to get into your Home. . . . Mr. —— has known me a different woman to what I have been lately, but with God's help I shall again be different." Arrangements were made for her to be received. The managers, in reviewing the goodness of the Almighty, and the blessing He has vouchsafed upon the work committed to them, will, as heretofore, authorize the admission of every suitable applicant during the New Year, even though there may be, from time to time, an exhausted treasury. All particulars of the work may be obtained from Mr. W. J. Taylor, 200, Euston Road, London, N.W.

The Welcome Home, Canning Town, E.—Miss Child writes that, at the "unloading of the Christmas boat" at the Welcome Home, a revival time was experienced. As many as six meetings were in progress at one time, and the work was well followed up by meetings on board the ships in the docks as well as in the mission room.

Home for the Homeless.—One of the most touching of the yearly records is the account of this work which is issued under the title of Stepping-Stones. Thousands of all classes, from the cultured academic to the outcast of the gutter, have cause to rise up and call Medland Hall blessed. These pages publish accounts of failures as well as successes. In these pages will be found information as to the general philanthropy of the Congregational Union—free meals for children, country holidays, &c. Copies may be had from Mr. E. W. Gates, Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, E.C.

D. L. Moody.

DURING the past ten days the Christian world, in East and Western hemispheres, has been mourning the loss of one who was great in many things, but above all listinguished as a preacher of the Gospel of the glory of the blessed God. In our last issue we intimated the fact of the home-going of Dwight Lyman Moody. The departure was as triumphant as the life was fruitful. Ready in service, the worker was ready to leave his earthly sphere; abundant in labour, he made glad departure to see the Lord of his life, the object of his heart's love and devotion.

The end came on Friday week. The cablegram to us was in the following terms:—

"Friday, Dec. 22.

"Mr. Moody had a triumphant entry into heaven at noon. As early as eight o'clock he said earth was receding and heaven opening—'God is calling me.' He was perfectly conscious to the last, and showed the same courage and faith, unselfishness and thought for wife and children and schools, as always. The doctor says it is a pure case of heart failure, due to absolute loss of bodily strength. In leaving, Mr. Moody gave an unflinching testimony to the truths he had preached."

The story of Mr. Moody's early life is well known. We tell it in few words. Born on February 5, 1837, at Northfield, Mass., he was left fatherless at the age of four. He was one of a large family, dependent upon the exertions of his mother, who belonged to the Unitarians of the old New England school. Not being fond of letters, the lad had but slight schooling, but he was naturally of a religious disposition. In 1854, that is, when seventeen years of age, he left home, entering a boot and shoe store kept by his uncle at Boston. Here he was under definite Christian influences; and he not only plunged into business life, but took an interest in Christian work. Now it was that the young man found the Saviour, or was found of Him, and accordingly joined a church of the Congregational order in Boston.

In the autumn of 1855, Mr. Moody went to Chicago, also on business. There he joined the Y.M.C.A., and started a Sunday School on the North Side of the city—a work from which the North Market Mission and Hall have resulted. He did a good work in saving poor girls from lives of shame, and in the midst of many engagements, religious and philanthropic, to devote all his time and energies to the service of God. In 1861, during the war of the "Great Rebellion," he ministered to the spiritual needs of the soldiers, and in the following year married Miss Emma C. Revell, of Chicago.

About this time he built, for the use of his Mission, a chapel costing 20,000 dollars. In 1865, he was elected president of the Y.M.C.A. in Chicago, and two years afterwards were built new premises at an outlay of 200,000 dollars. Six months later these premises were destroyed by fire. Thereupon Mr. Moody went to work to rebuild, and in a year or so success crowned his efforts, and "Farwell Hall" No. 2 became the centre of a great work. The great fire of 1871 consumed this structure also, with Mr. Moody's own home. Within a month of the conflagration, the North Side Tabernacle, a wooden building, was put up, and Christian operations advanced once more with rapid strides. Since those days Mr. Moody has been less and less the man of a city or state. The Gospel message claimed his tongue and the world was his field. He was the organiser of efforts on a gigantic scale for many classes in America, including the thousands of prison occupants. His educational establishments enjoy a world-wide fame, and everything he has done has been imitated in many lands. He preached the Gospel to rich and poor; he reproved and comforted, and was ever ready with a word of admonition and exhortation. The newspapers, in eulogising him, have praised one of the humblest of men. For time long to come his name will be held in loving remembrance for the honour put upon him by the Master whom he served with so much fidelity and diligence.

Mr. Moody first visited this country in 1867, and those who knew him then knew him as a prince and a great man in Israel, as now the whole world knows that a prince as a great man has fallen in Israel. His first text in London, was and his first work was the establishment of the noon prayer-meeting in the lecture-hall of the Y.M.C.A., 186, Aldersgate Street, the first meeting of which was held on May 13, 1867. Nearly a hundred were present, and it went on increasing until there was a daily attendance (not on Mondays only) of 200 to 300. We were then beginning to realize that the old country had been bound hand and foot with the grave-clothes of precedent and routine, and the accounts of Christian work in America from Mr. Moody and Mr. Payson Hammond were like a refreshing breeze from the prairie.

Mr. Moody received an inspiration from this country, and he returned it with interest. Speaking at the annual breakfast of the Y.M.C.A., in 1867, he said:

"It has been my privilege to be in your city two months, and I have thought you were exalted to heaven with privileges—privileges so numerous that I pity the man who goes down to the chambers of death and is lost, from the city of London. For years I have longed to visit this city. I have longed to see the founder of the Y.M.C.A. Far away in the western part of America I have often prayed for this Association, and my heart has been full this morning as I have sat hearing my friends, and looking you in the face. I love you; Christ binds us together. I don't know whether I shall ever have this privilege again. It is not likely I shall. Next month I return to my home, but I shall always remember this morning. Though you, perhaps, will not remember it, I shall. It is said that Napoleon, after his army had accomplished a great victory, ordered a medal to be struck with these words on it, 'I was there.' That is all there was. In after years, when I am far away in the western prairies of America, and when May comes, I shall think that, in 1867, 'I was there.' And as the ages, eternal ages, roll on, and if it shall be my privilege to meet in yonder City any that are here this morning, we may there sit down by the banks of that beautiful river of the Water of Life that flows from the throne of God, and talk of this morning. It will give us pleasure then to think that we were in the fight."

Then Mr. Moody went on to tell of new methods of work in America, especially in Chicago, which moved everyone now to laughter and now to tears. His own visits to the saloons and other haunts of sin developed an ingenuity and tactfulness which could only have been born of a deep and passionate love of souls.

Mr. Moody paid a brief visit to Paris, and attended the noon prayer-meeting in the Salle Evangélique. He read part of John xvi., and, in his brief remarks, introduced the following anecdote, related to him by an eminent minister in Dublin:

"A nobleman of the French Court, an infidel, had for some time exhibited great depression of spirits, and the Emperor sent him to an English physician, well known for his treatment of mental disorders. The physician questioned him as to the cause of his depression. Had he lost reputation, or position, or fortune? No, he possessed all these, but for two years past one thought had taken possession of his mind, the thought of and he could not get rid of it. The doctor opened his Bible, and read Isa. liii., explaining to his patient who it was who 'was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities.' Light broke into the mind of this poor rich man, and he said, 'I have no need of your prescription now.' He went away, and has since corresponded with the physician as a believer in Christ. How many Frenchmen of all classes," Mr. Moody added, "are probably in the condition of this nobleman seeking they know not what, unhappy for want of Christ; and, now that the door is open, how earnestly should Christians pray and work on their behalf."

On July 1, after a visit of three months, a farewell meeting was held, as Mr. and Mrs. Moody were leaving for Liverpool and home on the following day. We wrote at the time:—"Few men who have visited a foreign shore have endeared themselves to so many hearts in so short a time, or, with an unknown name and without letters of commendation, won their way so deeply into the affections of a multitude of Christian brethren who had never heard of him before, but who, having talked with him or heard him speak of Jesus, asked for no other warrant to yield him a large measure of their love."

During the meeting Mr. Palmer, of Boston, U.S., came forward and bore testimony to the universal esteem in which Mr. Moody was held in America. He said: "I knew this brother when quite a lad in the Sunday school. He came in, scarcely knowing what a Sunday school or a prayer-meeting was; but he devoted himself to the study of the Word of God, and very gradually was brought to the knowledge of the Truth. It is remarkable that he should be looking so much for immediate conversion when he was brought so gradually himself. He was a modest, quiet youth. We scarcely heard his voice among us. When he left our church in Boston we gave him a letter of introduction to the churches in the West, and the next we heard of him was that he was at work for the Master week-day and Sunday; and especially during and since the war, by which a wonderful door was opened for Christian work. When I came over to this country I went to the May Meetings at Exeter Hall, and at one of them, to my astonishment, heard my brother Moody announced among the speakers, and I have not seen him since until to-night."

Mr. Moody, taking the old deacon by the hand, said: "I don't know when anything has impressed me as this has. It was this hand that first welcomed me to the Sabbath school, and I am glad to meet this elder here to-night."

From PREBENDARY WEBB-PEPLOE.

Bearing in mind the high esteem in which Mr. Moody held Prebendary Webb-Peploe, we naturally solicited a statement from the busy vicar of St. Paul's, Onslow Square. In sending us a paper specially contributed by himself to The Outlook, of New York, in 1896, after his visit to Northfield, he said:

"My heart is very sad about Mr. Moody. The loss to earth is immeasurable, and in our eyes irreparable in many ways. I would have wished to express at some length my sense of the splendid service which the Lord has permitted his honoured servant to carry on for the last quarter of a century in so many lands; of the beautifully simple yet noble character of the man which compelled and the Godless to acknowledge that while they saw little or nothing in so many Christians to make them envious or to excite them to admiration, "D. L." as they called Mr. Moody, was always straight; and of the remarkable way in which he was honoured in his own township of Northfield, a rare testimony to the man's uprightness and beauty of life. On all this, and on the power of his work, as studied during nearly a month's sojourn at Northfield, I greatly desire to enlarge, but am compelled to forego this privilege and honour by the pressure of work.

"I would only say that I have never known any man more genuinely true and upright in all his ways; more humbly devout and simple in his faith towards God; and more naturally gifted with the power of sympathy, than Mr. D. L. Moody; and that I am very sure that the world is indescribably poorer for his death, which has robbed Northfield of its central figure, and left a heavy burden on those who are called to take up Mr. Moody's work."

We make a few extracts from Mr. Webb-Peploe's article in The Outlook:—

"All work must be initiated by an individual man, but all works do not prove to be really great, nor do they stand the test of time; while of the individuals who initiate works in this world, few indeed live long enough to allow of their works being tested by the crucial test of time, and fewer still of those who survive to see the works they initiated, become effective and powerful, have that real greatness of soul which will enable them to let the works be spoken of as 'great,' while they themselves remain 'small,' and are content to remain exactly what they were at the beginning, viz., mere instruments whom God is pleased to adopt and employ, and who never think of claiming either credit or glory for themselves. Wherever the instrument has been exalted, even in the smallest degree, then, and to that extent, the work has proportionately suffered. This is acknowledged, theoretically, by all, and yet, whither shall we turn to discover more than one in a thousand who can see great results from their works without claiming greatness for themselves? This seems to be the touchstone of human effort upon earth; and, judged by this standard of excellence, few indeed can bear the scrutiny even of their faulty comrades in the struggle.

"The first thing which strikes the observant visitor to Northfield, East Massachusetts, is that the whole place is governed by one dominant mind, and exists as a township for one definite purpose.

Northfield stands out pre-eminently among the townships of America as one of the

Mr. Moody's Birthplace.

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL SPOTS

in the 'Home' States of the East. The Connecticut River, flowing between Northfield and Mount Hermon, gives both grace and beauty of a remarkable kind to the whole valley. The magnificent avenue which runs for one mile and a half through the township gives one of the finest drives that can be seen in any land. The long line of villas lying on either side of the avenue makes the place an ideal residence for the wealthy and the weary.

Yet of all this the visitor hears and thinks little, until he finds how it enhances the delights of his visit. But what he does hear and think of is, that Northfield, with its neighbouring settlement of Mount Hermon on the west bank of the Connecticut, is, in its present condition, practically the creation of one man, and a place where everything, spiritual, social, and material, is literally made to subserve the one end for which that man —viz., the glory of God in the saving of souls, by bringing them to accept Jesus Christ as their Saviour. To this one single law of life there is hardly an exception, for, while there are both a Unitarian Church and a Roman Catholic Church in Northfield, and some of the inhabitants are, of course, busily occupied with agriculture and trade, there is one man who confessedly dominates the place by his purposes; and while Unitarians and Roman Catholics are, of course, engaged in their own works, and seeking to advance their own principles, so completely has D. L. Moody won his way into the hearts of his own townspeople that, instead of bitter opposition to his institutions and to his work, the stranger hears of nothing but love and good will, even from those who do not agree with him doctrinally and theologically.

LIVES AND WORKS WITHOUT CEASING

Mr. Moody's Residence.

"Of Mr. Moody's work as an evangelist in every part of the world, or of his grand educational establishments at Northfield and Mount Hermon, it is not the writer's province to speak in detail. The incidents and the statistics connected with these are the common property of all English-speaking people both in America and in Europe. We would call attention to first, that Mr. Moody is more highly esteemed in his own native town than in any other part of the world (if this be possible); secondly, that the wonderful monuments of his shrewdness and determination which greet the stranger in Northfield and Mount Hermon, and which represent an enormous capital in money, with a magnificent display of wisdom in their location and arrangement, are the work of a man who neither professes to have had an education preparing him for such results, nor claims at the present moment to enjoy wisdom or learning qualifying him to build and order such enormous establishments; and, thirdly, that while the whole township would seem to be subject to Mr. Moody's dictation and arrangement, everything is so ordered as to be for the general welfare of the inhabitants, and no one would even dare to suggest that all is not done for the common weal. This one man is the fons et origo of the whole: of the social, the moral, and the spiritual prosperity of the place, which are sufficiently marked to provoke the admiration and wonder of any thoughtful visitor to Northfield.

"The educational establishments for some 700 young ladies and gentlemen, which have already sent forth their thousands of devoted Christian labourers to engage in the Master's work in all parts of the world, are in themselves courage, and generosity. The striking methods adopted, both in the education of the students and for the obtaining of money for those who lack means (by utilizing their services during the vacations, when Northfield is filled with visitors for the conventions), are a constant theme of admiration to all who visit the place; while the moral and spiritual force displayed at all points, in the seminaries, in the boarding-houses, in the hotel life, and in the township, is such as not only to compel the admiration of the onlookers, but to evoke the declaration of those who study it most closely: 'This counsel and this work must be of God and not of men.' And yet, one man, D. L. Moody, is evidently the moving spirit of the whole, and he rules 'with an iron hand well covered with velvet. . . .'

"There is no uncertainty about D. L. Moody's evangelism; and, while Mr. Sankey and others should never be forgotten, but honoured and rejoiced over as God's power in song; and while multitudes owe to the sweet singers a debt of infinite gratitude, it is quite certain that the rock upon which all the educational and evangelistic results of these brethren have been based is that solid rock of the Atonement, or the Gospel of substitution, so freely announced by Mr. Moody and his co-workers, whether as preachers or as singers of the Gospel. . . . In this man, to a most remarkable degree, has been exemplified the words of the Apostle to the Corinthians, 'God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are, that no flesh should glory in his presence.'"

FROM REV. F. B. MEYER.

To have known D. L. Moody, and come within the range of his strong personality, has been to many men one of the most influential factors in their character and life-work; and it is not easy for such to imagine a world from which the inspiration of his presence has been withdrawn. It is still less easy, under the immediate sorrow of such a bereavement, to characterize this natural prince and leader of men.

He had a marvellous power over others. You cannot read the biographies of Dr. Andrew Bonar, of Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Professor Drummond, or of Dr. Dale, men as far as possible removed from each other in many respects, without encountering the same tribute to the spell which this nature exerted over them. There was something magnetic about him. Whoever was speaking at the Northfield Convention, it was the fact that Moody was present—though only as a listener, sitting, probably, off the platform, under the deep gallery on the right—which gave the session importance, and the speaker's words weight. Even when men have not agreed with him, and have seriously antagonized his positions, they have acknowledged the absolute sincerity and nobility of his character.

I met him first in York in 1873, on his arrival with Mrs. Moody and his two eldest children. Accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Sankey, they had come to our country, as it appeared, by a Divine prompting, and had just landed at Liverpool. Some time before, the secretary of the Y.M.C.A. had impressed on him the two words, "Bennett, York;" and not knowing where else to turn, two of his friends having suddenly died, Moody telegraphed to Mr. Bennett, saying, "I will be in York to-night." This was Saturday. On the following day he preached at the chapel, built for Rev. James Parsons, and then occupied by Rev. John Hunter (now of Glasgow). During the following week he held evening services in the old Lendal Chapel, and noon prayer meetings at the Y.M.C.A. After two or three more days with the Wesleyans, he came to the Baptist chapel, of which I was minister, and conducted meetings there for about a fortnight, with ever-increasing numbers and marvellous results. He and Mr. Sankey have often spoken of that little vestry, where we three spent much time in prayer, little weening that the earnestness of our desires and intercessions were the travail pangs of so great a spiritual movement as followed.

These were the days when the "Sacred Songs and Solos" had not been compiled, and we had a number of Hymn-and-Tune papers. But the most lines of Moody's memories and best-loved hymns. He said to me once, alluding to academic honours, "I want to be D. L. Moody, O.O." And we [illegible] asking him what the letters stood for, he said: "Why, of course, Out-and-Out."

He liked nothing better than to get a Bible student alone, and get him with questions as to what he knew of the Bible, or any truth [illegible] had recently received. He was always collecting [illegible], illustrations, notes and other helps, which he stored in large envelopes, on which were written

THE KEY-WORDS OF SERMONS

A portion of [illegible]. He was not so familiar with the Old Testament as he became afterwards, but was diligent, having come to the conclusion that [illegible] he must be [illegible]. He hastened away suddenly to cross to the other side of York, to the house of Dr. Kitchen, with whom he was staying, to get the notes of his address on "Heaven."

The first all-day meeting he held in England was arranged by us as we walked up and down Coney Street, and it was at my [illegible] that the evangelists went on to Rev. A. A. Bonar's, at Kelso, that had visited the communities, which became so widely known, and indeed, carried Scotland, notwithstanding the prejudice against the solo singer, and his "kist o' whistles," that "Mr. Moody would speak, and Mr. Sankey sing, the Gospel."

This was, of course, not his first introduction to [illegible] or to wide and remunerative work. He had first made his mark in Chicago, in an old shanty lighted by [illegible] candles, which had been abandoned by a saloon-keeper, though his own education was then so imperfect that he is said to have been obliged to [illegible] longer words as he read the Bible to his children. His brushes with the saloon-keepers; his efforts for all outcast and neglected souls; his indefatigable labours in connection with the Y.M.C.A. at Farwell Hall; his herculean exertions for the soldiers in camp and in the field of battle, as a delegate of the Christian Commission, during the Civil War; his journeyings in all parts for Sunday-school conventions had given him an amount of experience, and created a wealth of resource, which were only waiting for the open sphere and conspicuous platform that opened before his labours in England.

His two previous visits to our country had been for the purpose of observation, and of coming in contact with leading Christian men. He always spoke with gratitude of the impulse he had received in the direction of [illegible] from a Missionary Conference, and described as one of the most important and decisive of his career, a sentence which he overheard from the lips of an eminent servant of God, in the course of a conversation with a friend. "The secret has got to leave what God can do by a man wholly devoted to Him."

All who have heard him will recall the power of his voice when he told some pathetic story, portage work; the colleges at Chicago, and Northfield, and Mount Hermon; his books—these will be the works that will follow him. He discovered men, knew how to bring the best qualities out of them, found them spheres, and gave them back to themselves. Men like Mr. Mott and Mr. Speer, of the Student Volunteers; like Mr. Baer, of the Christian Endeavour; like Dr. Wilbur Chapman, the well-known evangelist; to say nothing of hundreds besides, who have passed through his colleges or been influenced by his missions, will perpetuate in the coming generation something of the influence and power he wielded in this,

THROUGH THE GRACE OF GOD.

He never wavered in his attachment to the great fundamentals of the Gospel. His sermons on the Blood, the Holy Spirit, the Love of God in Jesus Christ, were great testimonies to the mighty truths which have been the theme of every revival of evangelical religion. There was no uncertain sound in the Gospel as he preached it, and it was the Power of God unto salvation to tens of thousands.

What a welcome he must have received as he entered heaven! Surely an abundant, a choral, entrance must have been ministered unto him by myriads who are there, because of the message uttered in burning accents by his lips. May God comfort his noble wife, the confidant of his secrets, the partner of his anxieties and toils; and grant that his children may be enabled to maintain the work which he has left them as a sacred legacy and charge.

BY DR. BARNARDO.

"Death of D. L. Moody." The tidings, boldly written as the head of a paragraph, came to me with a shock of a great personal sorrow. Beloved Moody dead! I had not even heard that our dear friend was ill. Now I understand that some notices to that effect had appeared in THE CHRISTIAN, and in various other organs of the Press, but I seemed to have overlooked them. The thought that our beloved friend is really gone, that we shall see him and hear him on earth no more, that all the mighty influences which emanated from him and centred round him are at rest, is almost too much to believe, so large was the space he filled in the minds and hearts of those who knew him! Can anyone who ever had to do with our friend forget him? His commanding and energetic personality made a deep and permanent impression upon all who had ever been favoured with his friendship, or who knew him even less intimately.

Only in June or July last I had received a pressing invitation from him to spend the month of August at Northfield, to address certain audiences of Christian men upon social topics. It was with great regret that I found myself, owing to public engagements previously formed, unable to leave England, and therefore compelled to decline (only for the present, as I hoped) his invitation. But now, alas! dear Moody has "gone before." Will the assemblies at Northfield, should they be continued, ever be quite what they were without the dear friend who called into existence the series of institutions there, and all their varied and manifold activities?

It is not easy just now to speak of D. L. Moody; one's heart is too full of poignant grief over what seems to be an irreparable loss, to permit of the cool survey which alone can give an accurate and discriminating outline. So much in Moody was unique that I can only of a truly great man. For he was great in everything: there was nothing little about Moody, nothing small, nothing mean! He was built on a great scale, and, as the years roll on, I am convinced that his character and career will loom out even more impressively to those who love the Lord Jesus. His big-hearted and wise-headed grasp of a situation which puzzled lesser, even if more cultivated, minds; his straightforwardness; his absolute disinterestedness; his keen and clear-sighted discernment; and his uncommon endowment of common sense, which enabled him to steer the bark of his evangelistic mission on its very difficult course amid the rocks and shoals which awaited him in England, were alike remarkable. In Scotland it was comparatively easy to carry on an evangelical mission such as his. The whole heart of Scotland was with him. There were no such church differences or divisions as in England. Here our ecclesiastical partitions are higher; they run everywhere, and they all have broken glass or iron spikes on the top of the walls. Surely Divine wisdom was given him, and God's grace was glorified in this man's success!

What a faithful friend Moody was, too—faithful even to the telling you of your faults, but even more conspicuously faithful in keeping silence concerning the same to all others but yourself. With all his outspokenness, he was wonderfully discreet in speech, knowing when to speak and when to be silent.

A GENERAL TO COMMAND, but such a general as won the hearts of all who were under his sway, so that he was obeyed as much from love as from the obvious necessity to obedience by everyone who saw the wisdom and rightness of his commands.

Moody loved little children. It was a beautiful side of his character to see how absolutely he unbent among them. He revelled in rollicking games with young folks, and how they trusted him and loved him in return, those who were fellow-guests under the same roof with him will call to mind.

I notice that some of the Press comments speak of him as a man without eloquence; they probably mean without rhetoric, and all that he truly despised. But eloquent he undoubtedly was, if by eloquence we mean the "outpouring of a full soul and an earnest mind, in heart-stirring and convincing speech." Of course, his diction and pronunciation were essentially American. Therein lay not a little of his charm and a great deal of his influence, for, in the first place, it proved that he was always simply himself; he sought neither to fashion his speech, nor to change the garb or colour of it, to suit the audiences among whom he came. He spake, as he had always done, and of his sincerity no one could ever have a doubt. Thus the vivid forms of speech common in America became a very powerful means of arresting the attention of men and women sated and jaded with religious conventionality.

Here was a man who called a spade a spade and not an "instrument of wood and iron designed to penetrate the earth when wielded at an angle of forty-five degrees by a skilful agricultural labourer!" In things religious, men are always apt to be something other than they are in daily business life, and this not unfrequently awakens distrust among a vast section of the non-religious public. But here was a man who never had a "Sunday Soul," who lived, not two lives but one; who was the same in tone of voice, in speech, in manner, whatever might be his topic, except only that his face and eyes were full of love, and his voice trembled at times with genuine pathos when touching themes which went to the root of things. Here lay the secret of his marvellous influence, especially over men and women of rank. The world of the "great" longs for reality. Society is wearied of its own inaneness—that is why it spends itself in the chase of pleasure; even East-end slumming is to it but another form of pleasurable excitement. But, however artificial or unreal the conventions of society may be, its human heart

ACHES FOR REALITY.

When Moody appeared, he carried with him an atmosphere so patently intense, and sincere, and real, in regard to things Divine, that men said at once, "Here is what we want—a genuine man"; and while attention was thus excited and arrested by the central personality of the worker, the Spirit of God blessed his gracious message to hearts that were being slowly and almost unknowingly "opened to receive the Word."

How generous, too, was D. L. Moody! His hand was always an open hand. I do not believe a man ever lived in public more disinterestedly, or was more absolutely unselfish than he! Moody would give away everything—the very coat off his back, the shoes off his feet—to supply the want of another, and then he would pass on brightly and briskly to the next thing, as if he had done nothing worthy of a moment's notice, but had only performed one of the natural functions of life. How indignant it makes those who knew him to read in the obituary notice in The Times that this man of God "took up collections of 10,000 dols. at his services" for his own purposes. That The Times should write of him in such an unjust and ungenerous fashion is, perhaps, not to be wondered at, although I cannot but think that the leading article which appeared in its columns the following day, comparing the aims and results of Moody's life with those of the late Duke of Westminster, may have been of the writer of the first article, as if he had begun to realise how feebly he had conceived of the character of the "common" man who "spoke of the King."

Have any of us seen the like of D. L. Moody in this generation? I can think of none other of the same similitude. Shall we ever see his like again? God knoweth. Yet it is not often that He repeats the patterns of his greatest workers! Surely, however, never was man better adapted and equipped for a life-work than was this devoted servant of Christ. Let us then give thanks for a gracious, powerful, and fruitful personality, full of beauty and sweet odours, "All his garments smelling of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia out of the ivory palaces." Our brother has left us, and the world and the Church are the poorer for his loss. But the example of his beautiful life, of his powerful ministry, of his unselfish career, may well supply to all of us who knew him, stimuli that cannot fail, by God's grace, to make us better men.

Public Utterances.

REV. JOHN McNEILL'S TRIBUTE.

SPEAKING in St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, on Sunday week, Rev. John McNeill said:—

"We are met to-night under the shadow of a great loss. God has taken home to Himself our beloved brother, Mr. Moody. The great evangelist's death has created a profound impression on all our hearts, and I received the news with the shock that comes of a personal loss. The moment I read it in the newspaper the words leapt to my mouth, 'My father! my father! the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof." We feel, I feel, as if the Wellington of the Evangelistic Army had been taken from our head. When one begins to speak about Mr. Moody, one hardly knows where to strike in, and once he has broken in he does not know where to stop. On all sides of him he was a great man; he was a great man in all his measurements. He was GREAT AS A PREACHER.

"I have sometimes heard people say that they could not account for his success, because they did not see wherein he differed from other men as a preacher. I could not subscribe to that opinion. To me D. L. Moody was an immensely interesting preacher. He was no end of a preacher in resourcefulness, in what you might call tactics; that is, he always kept his audience at his finger-ends, and yet was ever pressing with all his force for the one great mark to capture them for a waiting present Saviour.

"I think he was not merely a preacher; he was an eloquent preacher. I did not hear him during his first visit to this country, when he and Mr. Sankey burst upon Scotland and carried it captive; and they have held it in their grip ever since. It was at Mr. Moody's second visit that I heard him, and yet some folks observed to me, 'You should have heard him during his first visit. Then you would have heard him at his best.' Well, I do not know what his best must have been. I remember hearing him when I was a student, a city missionary. It was in this very hall on a weekday afternoon that I sat to the left there. That plain, simple American rose up, there being nothing about him that suggested oratory in the academic sense; ah, but I shall ne'er forget that first address of his. It was about Paul. Paul's motto was—

'ONE THING I DO.'

How he made Paul live before us! With what consummate skill he ran through Paul's history! He brought in Paul's persecutions, pointed to the time when they stoned him, and left him for dead; and after they thought that they had wreaked their worst upon him, Paul recovered and pulled himself together. His friends came round him and said: 'Now, Paul, you'll have some sense; you'll give up preaching whilst these fierce Jews are abroad.' And then he brought in with tremendous effect his great text—'This one thing I do! Show me the road to the next town; I must preach Jesus Christ and Him crucified.' The thrilling effect on one hearer of that sermon can never be forgotten.

"Oh! Moody was a great preacher. Although he was untrained, uneducated in our professional, theological, academic sense, in another sense he was educated. He was well described in that picture of the Apostles Peter and John. We are told that when the people saw they were unlearned and ignorant in the academical sense, they took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus. But if the mark of great preaching be great success and gathering of great crowds, and bringing men to an intelligent decision for Christ, then Moody was one of the greatest preachers who ever lived. Then

HE WAS A GREAT ORGANIZER.

If he had never become a preacher, he would have been at the head of some of those tremendous businesses in the United States, the facts and figures of which we read over here with wonder and almost incredulity. You remember that he was a clerk in a boot and shoe store when he was converted. He started to preach, and by and by he gave up his worldly employment and took to preaching. If Moody had stuck to selling boots and shoes, he would, at length, have been at the head of some gigantic boot and shoe combine that would have dominated the trade on both sides of the Atlantic. He was a tremendous organizer, a man of restless activity, a man of tremendous brain power, and of great insight and foresight.

"Mr. Moody was a great man every way you took him, and if Jesus Christ had not captured him, and claimed him, and used him for his service, he would have been great in the world's work. And then as a man, how unique, how true, how thorough! I admired his genius and power in organizing, He also honoured me with his friendship. I mourn his loss. It was impossible to know him and not to love him.

HE WAS A HOLY MAN, A GODLY MAN,

a saintly man. And when you think of Moody's saintliness, it did not suggest a recluse or a man who lives far from the madding crowds' ignoble strife. Oh! how human he was! When his life is written, I hope those who undertake the task will give us the man Moody as he was. I hope they will give a faithful delineation of him in the human sense, how he lived a hearty life. I have seen him roll on his couch with laughter in the fair happiness and gleefulness of body and soul when a good story would be told during that memorable campaign at the World's Fair in Chicago.

"I said that no man was more saintly, more devoted, no man had a greater passion for doing his work well than he. How human he was in the human side! Even through my tears I smile as I recollect him as a man, as playful to his latest day as a boy. Get Moody amongst children, and he was the biggest romp in the crowd. An hour later that man was a flaming herald of the Cross, lifted up for Jesus Christ in the midst of 10,000 people.

"He is gone! One thinks of him entering heaven. One thinks of the multitudes who would be there to meet him, and of the multitudes who are to follow after him. I feel weaker; all of us on the evangelistic field feel weaker. Scotland to-day feels somewhat emptier. He bulked so large, he was so mighty for Christ. Alas! he is gone! May the Lord bring a great blessing to us out of this removal of his servant! May we creep closer to the Lord Himself; may we cry more mightily unto Him.

"We thank God that we were privileged to know and work with D. L. Moody. His labours are over. What can one say? His end, I should think, was just as he would have wished it. He had gone to Kansas City, where he had spoken in a hall to 12,000 people. Suddenly his strength gave way; his call had come, but God in his mercy gave him time to go home and to have all his family gathered quietly about him; and then his sun set for this world to rise in the next."

He sets as sets the morning star
That goes not down behind the darkened west,
Nor hides obscured amidst the tempest of the sky,
But melts away into the light of heaven.
Servant of God, well done;
Praise be thy new employ,
And while eternal ages run,
Rest in thy Master's joy.

REV. ALFRED ROWLAND.

In the course of a Christmas sermon, in Park Chapel, Crouch End, on "God's Holy Child Jesus" Rev. Alfred Rowland said:—

"Jesus Himself retained the child-heart to the very last; and after his ascension was called by his disciples 'the Holy Child.' He had often declared that unless men became as little children they could not enter his Kingdom, and that none could attain high position in it except as they maintained the mind and heart of childhood. Was not this the secret of the greatness which belonged to Dwight L. Moody, the inspired American evangelist? His death, announced yesterday, will bring sorrow to many hearts, for 'he was a good man and full of the Holy Ghost.'

"His departure to a higher sphere of service is a serious loss to American Congregationalism, and to evangelistic work all over the world.

"I heard him first in the Agricultural Hall over twenty-four years ago, when I visited London with a view to the pastorate of this church, and was moved to tears and holy resolve by his earnest appeals. I heard him last two or three months ago, when he preached in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, where Henry Ward Beecher, the greatest pulpit orator of the century, exercised his ministry. After service, I had a long talk with Mr. Moody, and, at his request drew up a resolution on the Dreyfus case, which we British delegates signed, and the preacher carried by a unanimous vote of his congregation in the evening.

"He was not a great orator, nor an original thinker, nor an accurate scholar. His language was plain and sometimes rough; his theology was crude; but his was the simple faith of a child, the evangelistic fervour of an early apostle, and multitudes will eternally bless God for the messages they received through him. As I recall what I have known him to be, I thank God for his influence, and rejoice that I can better understand the words—'Whosoever shall humble himself as this little child, the same is greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven.'"

MOODY.

Sagacity, heart, will, and mind,
All in one sturdy form combined
To save the wreckage of mankind.

He stood foursquare to every blast,
Tides ebbed and flowed, his soul stood fast,
Men found him where they found him last.

Thousands of sinners round him wept,
Thousands of saints arose that slept—
Arose to serve, God-called, God-kept.

That rock gave forth life streams so well
Nations and continents could tell
The magic of that homely spell.

Beside that rock a singing bird
Made music—angel-strains were heard
Blending with thunders of the Word.

We ne'er shall see his like again—
A child in heart, a man with men,
A prince with God, soul-conqueror then—
Foremost apostle of his time,
He fought with demons, drink and crime,
And routed hell long ere his prime.

A warrior every inch, he lay
His sword at Jesus' feet each day,
Awaiting orders for the way.

Sabbaths were his best fighting days,
He spared no class, smoothed down no phrase,

His words were human through and through,
And of the thousands that he slew
Love slew far more than wrath could do.

Where sin had steeled men's hearts from fears,
And conscience stunned seemed dead for years,
How scalding fell a mother's tears!

No nobler note e'er struck the world,
No flag of truce his hands unfurled,
His bolt both smote and healed, God-hurled.

We loved thee, brother, one and all,
Truth and humanity enthrall
All hearts—earth long shall feel thy fall.

But heaven has gained one victor more,
Spurgeon and Moody tread one shore,
And Jesus counts their victories o'er!

D. L. Moody.

Moody—we heard his voice and loved to hear it,
Preaching the Word with Pentecostal breath;
Clear as a bell, unswerving as a bullet.
What! is he silenced suddenly by death?

The death bells toll; toll in the hearts of thousands,
Saved by the message which he brought from God;
Or rallied by the trumpet-blast to triumph,
Beneath his banner with the scroll—The Blood.

They ring for him a dirge, and we are weeping,
Even while we say, "Our loss to him is gain."
But hallelujahs rise from hearts in heaven.
And hearts on earth wherein his words remain.

All round the world to-day the churches echo
The joyful sound for which his life was given;
To widen on with vast reverberation,
And Moody preaches still, although in heaven

Letters from Friends.

MR. T. A. DENNY.

The death of the great evangelist, D. L. Moody, at this time, casts an additional gloom upon Christians in Britain, with whom his name has been a household word for many a year. Those of us who knew him best will mourn him most.

Moody was a born leader of men, a wonderful personality, of indomitable will and exceptional common sense, eminently practical and wise, and, more than all, filled with the Holy Spirit. Men who do not usually take rank under others were contented and anxious to serve under his leadership, and tens of thousands in England and America will live to call him blessed, and to thank God for the work of his servant.

His immense enterprises at Northfield and Chicago will doubtless be fully before the Christian public at no distant date. Meanwhile, I would, with all friends of the departed beloved one on this side the Atlantic, offer his sorrowing widow and children our deepest sympathy with them in their great bereavement.

MR. C. BOARDMAN, STRATFORD.

My recollections of dear D. L. Moody are very precious. He has twice stayed at my house, and I have once visited him in his home at Northfield; and the more I knew him the more I loved and honoured him for his personal character as well as for his work's sake.

Only eternity will unfold the blessing flowing to this neighbourhood through his instrumentality, in connection with his three-weeks' mission in the Iron Hall (seating 7,000 persons)

* We are glad to learn from the correspondent to whom this poem was dictated that Rev. Charles Fox is making good progress, although much crippled in eyesight.

God's Guiding Hand.

By THOS. J. BARNARDO, F.R.C.S.Ed.

DR. BARNARDO has recently been giving the readers of his "National Waifs' Magazine" some of his early experiences, under the above title. The chapter in the December issue of the Magazine, from which we have made the following extract, is especially interesting. It appears that a speech of his, relative to the numbers of children that he had found sleeping out at night, having been reported, Lord Shaftesbury and other experienced workers amongst homeless children were somewhat sceptical as to the facts. Dr. Barnardo was invited to meet a party of friends at dinner at the house of the Peer-philanthropist, and this is how he refers to what followed:

When the appointed evening came, I found myself at Lord Shaftesbury's residence, one of some fourteen or fifteen guests. Only casual conversation took place during the dinner. Sitting next to me at table was Dr. M——, the well-known physician of ——Hospital, and one of the most charming men I ever met. A friendship sprang up between us on that night which was of incalculable advantage to one so young and inexperienced as I was, and which endured during all his life. After dinner, as we stood together in groups, Lord Shaftesbury came up and spoke to me in a manner which attracted general attention.

"I have heard," observed his lordship, "of your interest in the children of the streets, and I was very anxious to meet you, in order to ascertain from your own lips whether some statements which have been made are accurate. I have heard it said, for instance, that you often find large groups of children asleep at night in various hiding-places in different quarters of London without proper shelter or care. Is that really so?"

I replied in the affirmative.

"Have you any difficulty," he continued, "in inducing such waifs to talk freely about themselves?"

"No," I answered. "As a rule they are most willing to converse with me when they discover how deep my own interest in them is."

"Well," said his Lordship, "do you ever find it possible to induce them to leave their miserable surroundings?"

"Yes," I replied, "in some instances I have succeeded in getting them to leave the streets at once, and have obtained help for them; but my power to assist such poor children has necessarily been very limited."

By this time the assembled guests had gathered round us, in a kind of circle of which we were the centre. After some further remarks, Lord Shaftesbury suddenly inquired, "I suppose, then, you would have no difficulty in finding a group of such boys as you speak of to-night?"

"Oh, certainly not," I said; "any time after 11.30 or thereabouts I could find, at one or two places I know of, quite a number of homeless children sleeping out all night."

At this I observed the Earl's face take on a somewhat graver look. He had, as of course I afterwards found out, a profound interest in slum children, and a very wide knowledge of certain aspects of slum life; but I do not think that he really believed that at that time and in that year of grace, any very large number of waif children, such as I had hinted at, were to be found homeless and sleeping out in the metropolis night after night, and I fear it was his impression that I had deliberately exaggerated the state of the case. At all events, he lost no time in challenging me.

"Could you lead us to-night to one of these resorts?" was his prompt question. I replied, "Yes, certainly; I will do so with pleasure when it is late enough."

The thing was there and then settled. We had our coffee, and shortly after the hour of midnight had struck we sallied to the door with top coats on. Cabs were called and soon we were all en route. I gave directions forthwith to drive to Billingsgate, in Lower Thames Street. We left the West End behind us, and ere long we found ourselves down near the "Queen's Shades." On alighting we attracted the notice of a policeman who was on duty, and glad we were afterwards that we had secured his help. The "Queen's Shades" was a kind of cul de sac close by Billingsgate Fish Market. Here lay a huge pile of goods of the most varied kind, which either were eventually to be put on board some of the barges in the river, or had been taken from barges and were waiting removal. There doubtless were, also, a great many "empties" in the pile. This great pile was covered over tightly by several enormous tarpaulins, which effectually preserved the goods from damp, but which also had been turned to another purpose than that which the owners intended.

I knew my ground well, for I had often been down to this place before. Indeed, from underneath these very tarpaulins I had frequently drawn forth a number of homeless lads, who obtained their living by selling papers, cigar lights, flowers, or other oddments on the streets. But now, as we stood together, neither Lord Shaftesbury nor his guests nor I could see anything to attract attention except the huge pile securely invested with its waterproof coverings and roped down. At a part of it, however, where two tarpaulins met, I inserted my hand and then pushed my arm and shoulder within as far as I could. On groping with my hand in various directions under the tarpaulin, I suddenly encountered what I expected—a naked foot and ankle! This I seized firmly, and, pushing my other hand in and up, I soon came to the knee Then gently but firmly I threw my weight upon my prize, and presently I drew down a poor, ragged, half-starved looking boy! As he half alighted, half fell at my feet, his eyes still blinded with sleep, he thought that he had been unfortunately caught by the police, and he began to whine a remonstrance. I quickly reassured him; indeed, we all did, and after a little while he collected himself. "You are not the only one inside?" I asked. "No, guv'nor," he replied; "there's a sight more chaps up there." Well, would he be willing to try and get them out for us if we gave him sixpence? He woke up to the job at once! "In course," he would, he said. Yet the task was not easy. How was it to be accomplished? There were several methods; the one that commended itself to him first of all was, as he said, to "roof 'em." This meant simply that he should clamber on to the top of the pile where, he assured us, the greater number of sleepers lay, and running all over it dance a kind of tattoo, in which he pounded his feet as heavily as he could on the tarpaulins, and, of course, on the youngsters underneath it.

Our guide informed us that "The whole of the pile is kivered with chaps, and this 'ere 'll wake 'em up fine!" We hardly realised at first what an inhuman method this was, but when we did so we vetoed forthwith. Not, however, before his rough plan had begun to prove effective. The whole mass appeared to seethe and move on the top, struggling beneath his kicks. One boy after another slipped down and appeared at the slit between the tarpaulins, and would have withdrawn again in fright at the sight of our assembled company. But we held them firmly as they reached us. Still this would not have drawn them all out, but that one boy more experienced than the others suggested that we should promise to give them all something. Lord Shaftesbury at once agreed to give a penny to each and some food. That was enough. One of the fellows retired within the tarpaulin and communicated the glad tidings, and now we had a regular stampede! The tarpaulins, hitherto stretched so tightly over so large an area, began to collapse in parts for want of the human stay that kept them up, and soon we had, as we arranged them in a single line before us, a strange array of homeless childhood—a terrible proof, as Lord Shaftesbury remarked, of the sad state of things, and of the need of such work as I was even then beginning to do. Few knew better than he what was being carried on by other agencies throughout the Metropolis, and that was what made him incredulous at first as to the number of homeless waifs still abroad needing rescue and training.

When our awakened boys stood in a line we counted seventy-three individuals, big and little, old and young! But few of them had any covering on head and feet, and all them were clad in poor and vilely-smelling rags. However, the great thing now was to feed them. I knew of a coffee shop, open all night, "Dick Fisher's" by name; so thither we all trooped, and our company, excited and vociferous at the prospect of a feast, carried the place by storm and filled it right out, twice over. But at length all were refreshed by the hot coffee and the splendid slices of bread and butter: such a meal as the boys had scarcely had since they could remember! When Dick Fisher knew the rank of our host he put forth unusual efforts to satisfy his unwonted guests. From him, too, change of half a sovereign into pence was obtained, and then into every eager, dirty hand was placed the gift of the promised penny. The cheering that ensued was deafening! Then we talked a little to the boys, and promised to help them further, and it was arranged that some of them should meet us in a night or two elsewhere.

But the important point, so far as I was concerned, was this: that Lord Shaftesbury had now received proof that the statements which he had heard concerning the accounts of what I had discovered were not exaggerated, as he had clearly supposed. Indeed, I never saw anyone more deeply impressed than he was that night. As he stood there, in Dick Fisher's coffee shop, the great tears gathered in his fine eyes while he gazed on that ragged group of forlorn children; children most of them really were, for although a few of the company might be fifteen, sixteen, or even seventeen years of age, the majority of them were under fourteen. Then to me he emphatically whispered: "All London should know of this!" It was long past midnight when we separated for the night, and it was with a warm shake of his hand and a hearty "God bless you!" that my aged host said farewell.

Spite of my own inexperience and ignorance, the work continued steadily to grow upon my hands, and at length it became clearly manifest even to myself that I was acquiring a measure of real power in influencing the wild Arab boys gathered from every reeking slum in the metropolis who came under my notice. I could not conceal from myself that to many of these, neglected as they had once been, and forlorn as was their lot, God had apparently blessed the Old, Old Story of Jesus and his love told out in such simple language at my meetings with them. Nor could I deny that I never felt more at home or more singularly happy than when working among these rough lads and on their behalf. I seemed heartily to rejoice when the hour came at night when I could lay aside my studies and the professional duties that grew out of them, put on an old hat and an old coat, and go forth searching the streets and lanes of the city for homeless waif children. My heart indeed pulled me more and more definitely in this direction; but the question of the "ways and means" of continuing such efforts had become too serious and too urgent to be much longer shirked, while the increasing sense of my own inexperience and want of knowledge of the subject and of the social problems involved, also held me back, and and united with the claims of Medical Missions in China (as I understood them) to awaken serious hesitation and uncertainty as to my future course and present duty.

It was at this time that I began, perhaps more earnestly than heretofore, to make constant and daily request for God's guidance. I often prayed that He would somehow graciously interfere, and even stop me by illness or by bringing my plans to nought if I were following mere personal liking in doing this work among the poor waifs of East London. I remember frequently in prayer arguing thus with my Heavenly Father: "Better, O God, that I should die than that I should take up and carry on this or any any work against Thy will and without Thy presence and guidance." Thus, constantly seeking to realize his direction, I was led one day after much prayer to those remarkable words, "I will guide thee with Mine Eye." It seemed to me then, and since, that here was all I wanted. I took these words as a definite answer to prayer and as a promise given to myself. Here was a pledge of personal guidance which came to me then as if God had spoken it in my ears and to me alone, and had designed it for my peculiar circumstances. Here was a promise upon which I might rest content at all times. I remember that with this promise there seemed to me no longer room for doubt or uncertainty in my mind. The I WILL was emphatic. It was as though the words were printed in my Bible, in large capitals. At last my fears were quieted and I was at peace and rest, for had not God spoken.

And it was only a few days after that experience that I received an amazing letter, the contents of which were so surprising, so unexpected, and, as I judged, of so manifestly a providential character, that I was brought to a solemn and sudden decision concerning my life's work almost there and then. For although many days passed before I spoke of this letter or its contents to anyone, or even admitted to myself that I had arrived at a crisis in my life, I felt as if the guidance, the answer I had been seeking, had been vouchsafed to me in a wonderful manner.

The contents of that remarkable letter were to this effect: that the writer would provide £1,000 for the furtherance of my scheme of child rescue if I felt able, for the present, at all events, to give up the thoughts I had entertained of China, and would be content to remain in England, and to establish in East London a Home for Waif and Stray Children. No other condition was attached! That letter came from a well-known member of Parliament, whom I had up to that time never met, but who afterwards became, and continued until his death, a warm and close and generous friend of the work of God in my hands. It will be understood with what wonder and amazement I received such an unexpected intimation at such a time and from a person to whom I supposed I was absolutely unknown!

in 1884. The permanent outcome of that mission was the erection of the Conference Hall and Y.M.C.A., the hall seating 1900 persons, in which, to large congregations, the Gospel has ever since been proclaimed. The singing is led by a large choir, many of whom are standing monuments of the stability of dear Moody's work; and it has always been a joy to me to know that the work of the Hall and Y.M.C.A. was very near to his heart, as he called it "his child."

The three weeks he was in my house, and during the subsequent visit, he endeared himself to everyone. He played with the little children, and the extra labour involved by early and late meetings and influx of his numerous visitors, was considered by the servants as a privilege, and they were never forgotten by him.

I often hear his voice as he said in his terse way, "Boardman, what's the reward for work?" and remember his characteristic answer, "More work!" He was much amused one morning at breakfast at receiving in reply to a request to C. H. Spurgeon (asking that he and a friend might visit him) a letter with only the words,

"Come, sinners, come."

I can but feel that the world is the loser by his death, but thereby Christ has had an answer to his prayer—"Father, I will that they also whom Thou hast given Me be with Me where I am, that they may behold my glory." I pray that the Lord will raise up others to carry on the many works inaugurated by D. L. Moody.

Memorial Services.

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

An overflowing audience assembled at St. James's Hall on Sunday afternoon, on the occasion of the memorial service of the late Mr. D. L. Moody. The meeting was characterized by deep solemnity. Many persons wore mourning. The reading desk was draped in white, and bore the letter "M" on a medallion, encircled by a wreath of evergreen.

After Mr. C. Russell Hurditch had engaged in prayer, Rev. Hugh Price Hughes read from Isaiah, and dwelt briefly on the words, "I will trust and not be afraid;" one of the texts, he remarked, which the late Mr. Moody most frequently quoted when urging sinners to repent and believe. It was the custom in the Wesleyan Conference, said Mr. Hughes, to devote some time to the rehearsal of names of ministers deceased, and those who had been best acquainted with the departed ones were called upon to speak of them and their work. With something of this idea in mind, he (Mr. Hughes) had asked some representatives of the chief Nonconformist bodies to speak on the testimony and labours of Mr. D. L. Moody.

Rev. F. B. Meyer dealt with three climacteric points in the life of the deceased evangelist, his conversion, his consecration, and the baptism of power which he subsequently experienced. After describing Mr. Moody's home life in early days, and his business career in a store, Mr. Meyer dwelt upon the powerful influence exercised upon Mr. Moody by a godly Sunday school teacher, and traced the beginnings of the Chicago evangelistic work, and Mr. Moody's development as a preacher. The speaker next alluded to the addresses by Mr. Henry Moorhouse, which led Mr. Moody out to increased Bible study, and went on to portray, with vividness and pathos, the soul struggles of the evangelist in pursuit of a Pentecostal outpouring of the Spirit. That blessing he obtained, and his addresses gained greatly in unction, but he remained always, in spite of his remarkable success, ever the humblest and simplest of souls.

Rev. Dr. J. Guinness Rogers said it was no light thing that Mr. Moody was able to attract such multitudes as he did. "What," they might ask, "constituted his power?" It had been said by some papers that Mr. Moody was "not a great orator." Well, he succeeded, at any rate, in moving his audience, and surely that was no mean criterion. He was a Bible student, and had a great power of shedding new and marvellous light in the course of his public readings. He was a man of great heart, but his appeals did not end in mere "gush," for he happily blended strength of mind and heart in his appeals. There was piquancy in the novelty of his style, there was aptness of illustration, and directness of preaching. Some of us to-day were cultured to the tips of our little fingers, and afraid to go one step out of the beaten path of conventionality, but Moody was fearlessly straight and spoke in plain Anglo-Saxon, "understanded of the people." He was greatly helped, too, by the singing of Mr. Sankey. But the secret of his success was that the man had a message and preached it with power. His great qualities would have been nothing without the Gospel, and they might all—especially preachers—learn the lesson afresh, to avoid mere speculations and discussions, and stand true to the eternal Gospel.

Dr. J. Monro Gibson, while rejoicing in all the work which God had enabled Mr. Moody to do, laid especial stress upon "the witness of his life." Mr. Moody was, doubtless, a man of very strong individuality, but he manifested it in the spirit of ministry. He would never consent to hear himself commended, and upon one occasion, when a speaker was referring to him in terms of praise, he interrupted and bade that speaker give glory, not to the servant, but to the Master. Dr. Gibson went on to describe Mr. Moody as a man of vast charity and equal modesty, with an open mind for new light, never supposing that the last word had been uttered by the Spirit.

Rev. H. P. Hughes next referred to words of sympathy sent by Drs. Parker, Horton, and Clifford, and read the following communication from Rev. Thomas Spurgeon:—

"I regret that I cannot be with you on Sunday afternoon when you do honour to the name of one of the noblest of men, and one of the greatest of evangelists.

"To know Mr. Moody was to love and esteem him ever so much. His unblemished life, his transparent sincerity, his love of the Gospel, his directness of appeal, his large-hearted charity, his lovely humility, and last, but I am not sure it is least, his conspicuous common sense, made him, with God's blessing, a mighty power in the two worlds, and endeared him to thousands in all parts of the earth. It has been my joy to meet Mr. Moody in my late father's company. They loved each other in the Lord, and had very much in common. I was privileged to be with Mr. Moody in the thick of the fight during the World's Fair at Chicago. He was a real commander-in-chief, and we, who tried to help, counted it a high honour to be upon his staff. I can never forget how eagerly he heard the 'news from the front' each evening, how he gave God praise for all successes, and how prayerfully he planned the next day's campaign.

"I rejoice that you Methodists were as ready as any to receive Mr. Moody and his sweet-voiced companion when they first visited old England. (If I remember rightly, your honoured Dr. Punshon counselled your denomination so to do), and now you are foremost in glorifying God in him who has been summoned higher to receive his Lord's 'Well done.' These facts in themselves are a grand testimony to his work and influence. Thank God for such a man! Pray God for another, and yet another! The world needs them sorely, and so, alas! does the Church. Meanwhile, we can all have Moody's lofty motives, and employ his simple, God-honouring methods. Is there a better way of honouring his memory?

"I trust you will have a solemn, profitable, and soul-saving season. If Moody could speak to us at our memorial meetings, what think you he would say? Something like this, I fancy: 'Tell them of Jesus, the Mighty to Save.' Oh, that some who mourn the honoured servant would, at this time, trust his loving Master."

In conclusion, Mr. Hughes remarked on the stimulating effect which Mr. Moody's preaching had upon Methodism, and said that a personal, whole-hearted surrender to Christ had characterized their departed friend, who had, moreover, always preached, not an abstract idea, but a real, living Christ.

After the Dead March in Saul had been played by the band, the entire congregation standing, Lord Kinnaird closed this solemn and spiritual gathering with earnest prayer.

THE NOON PRAYER MEETING.

The late Mr. Moody had many ties with the noon prayer-meeting held at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A., he having initiated it 33 years ago. It was fitting, therefore, that a memorial service should be held in connection with the meeting on Monday last.

In the absence, through illness, of Mr. R. C. Morgan, Mr. M. H. Hodder presided. He referred, in a few terse opening remarks, to the permanent character of Mr. Moody's work, and described his labours in England as those of an epoch-making period. Coupling the name of the late C. H. Spurgeon with that of D. L. Moody, Mr. Hodder said there had been no revival work like that of these two men since the days of Whitefield.

Mr. Ingersoll, a well-known Christian worker of Chicago, gave a touching testimony to the simplicity of Mr. Moody's character. He had seen learned and devout ministers sitting at Moody's feet in order to study the art of reaching the people; yet how free from all suspicion of conceit he always was. Mr. Ingersoll recalled the days when Mr. Moody was unable to put a dozen sentences together grammatically, and when, coming to a string of names difficult of pronunciation, he would remark, openly, "Here's a lot of words I can't pronounce." After describing the well-known facts in connection with Mr. Moody's conversion through the instrumentality of his Sunday school teacher, Mr. Ingersoll referred to the influence of Henry Moorhouse, and the whole-hearted way in which Mr. Moody made the Bible the backbone of his preaching.

After a season of prayer, Lord Kinnaird alluded to his early associations with Mr. Moody in Chelsea, and went on to describe the meetings in Chicago during the World's Fair as perhaps the most remarkable series ever held. There were sixty-six gatherings daily, attended by more people than the places of amusement. Mr. Moody's carefulness to receive no personal praise was notable. At the Montreal Mission, for instance, he used to bolt away through the back door while the final prayer was being offered, so he was far away by the time people began to look for him. Lord Kinnaird closed with pathetic reminiscences of Mr. Moody's vigour, and transparent sincerity of mind at Northfield among his family and the students, or away in some great evangelistic campaign.

After a word from Rev. Joseph Harris on Mr. Moody's directness and earnestness, Rev. John T. Vine, told how he saw open, and, written against one of the promises, the words "T.P.," meaning, as Mr. Moody explained, "Tried and Proved." The next speaker was Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, whose words naturally gained in interest from his close contact of late years with Mr. Moody. None felt more than he how great is the loss, but Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Mr. Moody would not have had them sit and sigh, but rise in the strength of God to do the Divine will. A thrilling little piece of personal experience now came from Mr. J. F. Shorey, who told how, twenty-three years ago, a poor slave of strong drink, he was invited into a meeting. "What for?" he replied, "I've got no money!" "Never mind," was the answer, "come in." He heard Mr. Sankey sing, "What shall the harvest be?" and Mr. Moody preached on "God so loved the world." As a result, the power of the drink habit was broken, Brother Shorey was converted, and became an earnest Christian worker.

On Mr. Hodder vacating the chair, Mr. H. W. Maynard assumed the presidency. He spoke of the conversion, under Mr. Moody, of Mr. Studd, sen., of whom a coachman said to Mr. Maynard at the time, "The master's been to town, and come back the old master in a new skin." Rev. D. M. Cameron having added words of reminiscence, Mr. Finley, formerly of Manchester, pictured the early morning prayer meeting, and the people standing an hour and a half, with the snow over their boot-tops, waiting for the doors to open. The same speaker told, too, in vivid terms, of Mr. Moody's help to the Manchester Y.M.C.A. The evangelist told the people that the Y.M.C.A. needed a hall, and that suitable premises could be got for £30,000. The crowd laughed, but Mr. Moody was insistent, appealed to the merchants present, got one promise of £5,000 at once, and raised the whole ere he left the city.

Special interest was felt in Mr. Hind Smith's personal reminiscences. He related how, at the commencement of work in Manchester, the attendances were meagre. "Where are the people?" asked Mr. Moody. Mr. Hind Smith took his friend to a hall where thousands of people were listening, entranced, to a girl's singing. "I see," said Moody; "the people like singing. I've a friend who sings. Next time I come over I shall bring him with me." And so he did. Mr. Charles Cook, Mr. Ned Wright, Rev. T. Richardson, of St. Benet's, Stepney, Mr. Barry Wake, and other friends added words of experience and appeal, and the meeting closed with prayer from Rev. W. Fuller Gooch.

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

CLOSING MEETINGS FOR THE YEAR.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

WITH Friday, December 22, the meetings of the Campaign were in great part stopped for the Christmas and New Year season. On that afternoon Mr. McNeill completed the third week of his mission in Renfield Street United Presbyterian Church, which have from first to last been attended by large audiences, and have been the source of much blessing to the "business men and women" for whom they were intended.

REV. D. M. CAMERON AT POSSILPARK.

The change in the weather to snow and frost affected the attendance at the meetings in the suburban districts much more than in the centre of the city; but a thoroughly encouraging and successful mission was held during the fortnight before Christmas, in Possilpark Free Church (Rev. W. McKilliam, minister) Allander Street. After an absence of several weeks, Rev. D. M. CAMERON had been able to return to Glasgow for this mission only. The open-air work was thoroughly organized, and, in spite of unfavourable circumstances, many were found willing to listen to the presentation of the Gospel in address and song. The evangelist's heart was much cheered from the outset by the manifest presence of the Spirit of God in prayer. Much prayer had been going on among the workers during the preceding weeks, that God would bless the seed sown. A faithful Gospel ministry had produced ground well prepared; and when the time came there were not only Christians waiting, and praying for an outpouring of blessing, but people ready and anxious to receive it.

On the occasion of our first visit the song preacher was Miss Charlotte Kerr (London Missionary Society, North China), herself a convert at one of Mr. Cameron's meetings, when only twelve years of age. When a deep impression had been made by the singing of "The heavenly Bridegroom soon will come. . . . Trim your lamps and be ready," Mr. Cameron told a number of striking stories of how that hymn had been blessed to the salvation of souls within his personal experience and knowledge.

The address which followed was on "The Trial and Triumph of Abraham's Faith" (Genesis xxii.), from which it was shown that if we are having a good time spiritually, some trial may be expected to come on its heels. But "when God tries (tempts) a man, it is to take away the chaff; when the devil tempts him, it is to take away the wheat." Great emphasis was laid on the substitutionary work of Christ, as it was illustrated in the provision by God of the ram to be offered in place of Isaac. Afterwards Miss Kerr sang "Have you ever heard the story?" and the words of the refrain, that Jesus "is just the same to-day," were caught up and driven home as an invitation to all seekers.

Very few left at the close of the first meeting, nearly all who rose from their seats finding their way to the adjoining hall, for conversation, either as "seekers" or workers. We do not remember seeing the same proportion of any meeting going into an inquiry-room. Like other branches of the work, this was thoroughly organized, only the needful number of helpers being allowed, and workers of each sex being allocated as required; yet the accommodation available was taxed to its utmost capacity. Leading those who were "wise to win souls" were Mr. McKilliam (the pastor), Rev. William Havre (Keppochhill Free Church), and Rev. M. Bruce Meikleham (Rockvilla United Presbyterian Church).

TROPHIES OF GRACE.

Striking cases of conversion had occurred from the very first evening, and we found ourselves seated near a number who had returned to praise God for his mercy, and were finding in the doing of it that still there was "more to follow." Three or four seats farther forward were a number of girls, between the ages of fifteen and seventeen, who made no sign of anxiety; but when the evangelist came round they accepted his invitation to the side room, and as soon as they reached it broke down completely, showing how ineffectually they had been endeavouring to resist the strivings within.

The blessing continued as the mission passed into the second week. One evening, when Mr. Cameron was speaking of the good which often comes through open confession, a man stood right up in the middle of the church. Asked if he wished to say something, he replied, "Yes, I want to thank God that during these few days He has saved my two sisters, and my brother-in-law." This case was typical of many more, where God's people, who have been waiting and praying long for their near and dear ones, have had their desires granted.

At the closing meeting, Mr. J. R. D. McAusland lent the aid of his rich musical voice, and the evening was given mainly to words of instruction and counsel for young converts. In view especially of the temptations to which many would be subjected during the holidays, the twelfth chapter of Romans was read, and attention directed (1) to the warning against conformity to the world in principles, practices, and amusements; and (2) to the exhortation to live a transformed or changed life. All were advised to make their conversion public among former companions without delay, and to give some time every day to prayer and the study of the Word of God.

The young converts present were then asked to make public confession, and were commended to the keeping of their heavenly Father. As we were leaving, it became evident that a warm personal regard for Mr. Cameron had sprung up in the hearts of the people, from the number who waited about to say a hearty good-bye.

THE CENTRAL DISTRICTS.

The WEAVER BROTHERS had one week of meetings in Free St. Peter's Church (Rev. James Brown), Mains Street, during which most satisfactory results were apparent. The district is one of the eddies of the life of the city, where the houses are now rapidly changing into warehouses and offices, but is systematically and thoroughly worked by the evangelistic workers of the congregation. The members of the neighbouring Original Secession Church joined in heartily, and from door to door the fact was made known when and where the way of salvation was being preached. For the second week the addresses were given by Rev. JAMES E. HOUSTON (Cambuslang), and much deep spiritual teaching was presented.

Situated in the vicinity of a number of theatres and music halls, the mission in St. John's Wesleyan Methodist Church (Rev. J. Williams Butcher), Sauchiehall Street, had to face stiff uphill work. Rev. Donald Cameron (Free St. Paul's Church) and Rev. George Gladstone (North Dundas Street Congregational Church) were among the helpers, leading others from their own congregations. The missioner was Rev. GORDON B. WATT (Kilmarnock), and the two weeks were felt to be a time very helpful and very precious to many.

Over and over again the preciousness of the blood of Jesus was presented under different aspects: the unpopularity of such a Gospel being shown to arise from (1) its bringing all to a common level; (2) making everything depend on the work of Another; and (3) doing away with human merit. The hopefulness of such a Gospel was insisted on (1) because the Blood is the purchase price which has been paid for us; (2) it is the propitiation for the believing sinner; (3) it is the continued source of strength for the saved sinner; (4) if rejected, it increases the guilt and deepens the doom of the sinner.

CHRISTMAS WEEK.

It was thought desirable by the executive that work should be maintained at at least two centres during the holiday season. One of these was Cranstonhill United Presbyterian Church (Rev. G. G. Green), Lancefield Street; and the evangelist placed in charge was Mr. JAMES MARSHALL. The number of counter-attractions for the people, and of other special engagements for those deeply interested, put a severe strain on the attendances; yet, in spite of many drawbacks, we found an encouraging meeting when we visited the church on the first Wednesday evening. A fine choir of young people maintained at a high level the service of praise, one of them helping as a soloist; and —with snow on the ground, accompanied by frost and a thick fog—a strong and vigorous testimony was maintained in the open air, several of the helpers having a special gift in this direction. Various ministers and leading workers joined heartily with the local friends.

It was a pleasure to shake hands with the pastor, and to hear his expressions of gratitude for the blessing that had been granted. He was strongly of opinion that when theatres, music halls, and other strongholds of "the world, the flesh, and the devil," were so active, the door of the house of God should not be closed. If the meetings have not been large, God has been unmistakably present.

AT THE TENT HALL.

The other centre of effort during Christmas week was the Tent Hall in Saltmarket, where Mr. W. D. DUNN first took up work directly within the arrangements of the Campaign Committee. From the opening evening (Sabbath, December 24) it was manifest that the Lord was present in power. The meetings have been good considering the unfavourable circumstances of season and weather, and the evangelist's heart has been much encouraged. Elsewhere we have heard it remarked that the sunken and submerged masses were not being reached in any number by the district meetings; but a feature in the gatherings at the Tent Hall is the attendance of men and women bearing every mark of being social outcasts. From among them not a few accepted the invitation to the inquiry room, apparently encouraged by Mr. Dunn's repeated assurance that the Lord would accept "the Devil's castaways."

The closing evening was given up to an address showing the duty and privilege of attaining the joy and blessedness of assurance, based on 1 Thess. v. 16-18. After asking whether any thought it possible to "rejoice evermore," to "pray without ceasing," or to "give thanks in everything," without knowledge, he passed on to show that faith and salvation are inseparable. He said that in his personal experience the belief that a man can be a good Christian without knowing it is far more prevalent in Scotland than in England or Ireland. "Where this is got I do not know; it is not in the Word of God."

New Year's Greetings.

"A HAPPY NEW YEAR!" Once more we hear the old familiar words, and are reminded that another year of our life has passed away. We have thought about the coming of this New Year, and we welcome it as a good friend, and are all excitement over its arrival. We wonder what it will bring for us, what will happen during its days; and we make all sorts of plans and good resolutions, all for the happiness of this bright New Year.

It is not simply another year, but a new year. It should not be a repetition of the past, but should mark improvement and progress. The Old Year will soon be a mere memory; in some instances, perhaps, a very precious one, with records of good resolves faithfully kept. What will this New Year be to each of us?

We all know what it means to have a copy-book. We begin on the first line very carefully, trying our hardest to follow the copy; but the next line is not so careful, and so we go on, forgetting all about the top or guiding line, until we get to the last line of the page; then we feel sorry that we have not kept the page more tidy, and that so many blots and smudges spoil its fairness. So we are glad to turn to the next one, clean and white, and resolve to be more careful with it.

Just the same with our New Year. If we have not been quite as careful as we might have been during 1899, and have dirtied our page hopelessly, here we can turn over the leaf, forget all about the old blots and smudges, and begin upon another. How can we keep it clean and beautiful? Let us resolve to be more diligent at school, more helpful at home, truer and kinder friends, more thoughtful, better in every way. The only way we do so is to ask our best Friend, the "Friend for little children," Jesus, to come and take care of the New Year for us and help us; then if we remember, as in our copy-book, to follow Him as our Copy, our Guide, we shall have really "A Happy New Year." It offers to us many opportunities of pleasing Him—by believing Him, trusting to Him, loving and serving Him. Let us enter upon the new time with solemn joy. Welcome it as another of God's gifts to us, affording us a little more of time ere we pass into Eternity with its greater realities.

I will give you some verses which I came across some time ago, but whose author I do not know.

The book of the New Year is opened,
Its pages are spotless and new;
And so each leaflet is turning—
"Dear children, beware what you do!"

Let never a bad thought be cherished,
Keep the tongue from a whisper of guile,
And see that your faces are windows
Through which a sweet spirit shall smile.

And weave for your souls the fair garment
Of honour and beauty and truth,
Which will still with a glory enfold you,
When faded the spell of your youth.

And now, with the new book, endeavour
To write its white pages with care;
Each day is a leaflet, remember,
To be written with watching and prayer.

And if on a page you discover
At evening a blot or a scrawl,
Kneel quickly and ask the dear Saviour,
In mercy to cover it all.

So when the strange book shall be finished,
And clasped by the angel of light,
You may feel, though the work be imperfect,
You have tried to please God in the right.

But while we are wishing each other a Happy New Year, I am sorry to tell you it will not be a happy one for all of us, as you will gather from the following:—

SAD LETTER FROM A FATHER.

DEAR UNCLE TOM,—It is with deep pain and sorrow of heart that I convey the sad news that our beloved little daughter Flora has done her last "Searcher." She passed away to be "For ever with the Lord" on Tuesday, December 19.

Dear little maid, her heart was full of love and sympathy, Oh! what a blank it has left. To her little brother she was all in all. Little adviser, helper, playmate, fun maker, everything; how much she is missed. She always took great interest in everything connected with the "Searcher," and was looking forward with much pleasure to the competition at Christmas. If it is possible in a word or two to convey to the other little searchers the fact of her early decease, I am sure our dear little girl would like it done, and I would thank you.—I am, yours in deep sorrow, W. SIMMONS.

My knowledge of little Flora (who was, I think, eleven years old), was derived only from her Bible Searching, but I can quite believe all her father says about her.

She joined the "Searcher" in Jan. 1897, and from the first did her papers excellently, being eligible for each quarterly competition, and never failed to obtain either a prize or a certificate. This was especially praiseworthy when her age removed her into a higher division in which she would be one of the youngest competitors.

I am sure you all join me in hearty sympathy for the dear ones she has left behind.

"I S'all S'eep wiv Him To-night!"

SOMETIMES I believe that the little ones say the best things, after all. I knew a family in Detroit who were heart-broken and sad this Saturday night. There were three last Saturday, but to-day only two are left. The tie that bound them more closely than that which the clergyman drew has lately been loosened, and the light of their lives went out with the red winter sun only the other night. The father is a railroad man, whose duties called him away from home nearly three-fourths of the time. It was his habit, whenever he was about to start for home, to telegraph his wife, apprising her of the fact. In these telegrams he never failed to mention the name of his little four-year-old, and the despatches usually ran as follows: "Tell Arthur I shall sleep with him to-night." The baby boy was very proud of these telegrams, which his mother would read over to him, and he considered the "teledraf" a great institution. The other night, when the fever had done its work, and the mother was sobbing out her anguish, the little one turned calmly in his bed, and said: "Don't ky, mamma; I s'all s'eep wiv Dod, 'oo know. Send Dod a teledraf, and tell Him I s'all s'eep wiv Him to-night." But the message went straight up there without the clicking of wires or the rustle of wings. Selected.

RULES.

Answers to the "Bible Searcher" are acknowledged in two lists:—

(1) Those received up to Monday morning, in the next Thursday's issue.
(2) Those received later, in the one following. But no answers can be dealt with which are received later than the Thursday morning following the issue in which the Competition appears.

No Concordance may be used or help given with the answers, but the questions may be explained when necessary.

No papers can be re-examined.

It is necessary that letters should be properly stamped, and that names should be written very distinctly. A star (*) is given for neatness and extra care in answering the questions.

A Prize Competition is given the last week of March, June, September, and December. To be eligible, every child must have been correct nine times during the preceding twelve weeks.

Those whose 10th or 13th birthdays occur during the quarter may continue the weekly Searcher in the same division, but must enter for the Prize Competition for their actual age. There is no limit of age for weekly competitors; but no one above eighteen years of age can be eligible for a prize.

All communications must be addressed to "UNCLE TOM," the YOUNG PEOPLE'S EDITOR OF "THE CHRISTIAN," 12 Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C.

THIS WEEK'S BIBLE SEARCHER (No. 209).

In Proverbs I—X:—

1. What "six things doth the Lord hate"?
2. What is "more precious than rubies"?
3. How are we keep our hearts? Why?
4. What is said of (a) "the fear of the Lord"? (b) Slothfulness? (c) "the shining light"? (d) loving and seeking?
5. Who "wrongeth his own soul"?
6. Who "shall obtain favour of the Lord"?
7. Fill in these blanks:—(a) "— — if — — thee — — not;" (b) "— not — — thine — — — the — and — — —;" (c) remove — — — — —; (d) the — of thy — — be —

(Children under ten do 1, 2, 3; those under thirteen do 3, 4, 6.)

The following are eligible for the Prize Competition, but have failed as yet to give me their addresses. Unless their papers reach me by next Tuesday morning they will be too late:—

Ernst Aldwinckle, Guy Cross, Margery Coleman, Maud Eddey, O. L., Arthur and Grace Maurice, Margie Marston, Gilbert Powell, Sarah Tyson.

HONOURS LIST.

The following have been correct each week during the quarter:—

B—Maggie and Alan Banks, Lily Blackman, Massy Baker, Leonard Brown, Maude, Dorothy and Sylvia Barrett, Emily Bridgewater.
C—Anna Chaenyen, Ida and Mabel Cole, John Colville, Beryl Calvert, Maggie Carter, Sophie Cohen.

Personal.

Very many thanks for the kind greetings conveyed by means of Christmas and New Year cards, and little notes.

MRS. ROUSE.—The cards you so kindly sent will, I am sure, be much appreciated by some cripple children, to whom they will be sent.

HULDAH KRIGE.—You may answer as you please, in your own words, or a Bible verse, except where specially stated.

Edith Simpkin, Jamie de Hailes, S. Judd, Dorothy and Kathleen Heckford, Beryl Reid.—I am glad to welcome you as new "Searchers," and trust the study will be useful and interesting. A new quarter starts this week with No. 209.

Mabel de Rusett.—Thank you for your letter; but I am sorry you will have to discontinue your searching. I wish you every success in your exam.

Leonard Wall.—I, too, am sorry that you should have missed No. 206; for had that been correct, you would have had a place in the honours list. I am glad to hear you are getting on so well at school.

Irish Notes.

An instance of Christian courtesy much too rare in this country, has taken place in Galway. The Methodist Church in that old town having been closed for some weeks for improvements and repairs, the rector, Rev. Mr. Berry, B.D., placed the Parochial Hall, for the time being, at the disposal of the Methodist congregation, and there they assembled for several Sundays for worship.

Very successful evangelistic meetings have been held near Irvinestown, co. Fermanagh, by Rev. James Bradshaw and others; and at one service eighty persons signed the total abstinence pledge, several of these also signing a pledge against the use of tobacco.

A strong section of the Councilmen of Londonderry remain faithful to the Protestant traditions of that city, and recently defeated an attempt to carry a resolution recommending repeal of a clause of the Catholic Emancipation Act which marks the Jesuits as outlaws. Of course there will be the usual outcry in the Romish Press as to the refusal to grant religious liberty; but freedom of worship is one thing, and the importation day after day of swarms of members of foreign orders is quite another, and it does not appear to be any too soon to direct attention to the laws upon the subject.

Special Meeting for Confession.

At our weekly united prayer-meeting, which is held every Thursday morning in connection with the Evangelical Alliance, we have just had a special gathering for prayer and humiliation in connection with our sad reverses in South Africa.

We had a crowded attendance, and after prayer by General Hutchinson, Colonel Hare, and others, a very suitable address was delivered by Rev. E. L. Hamilton on the subject of Hezekiah spreading the threatening letter of Sennacherib before the Lord. Let us now, in our time of trouble, seek deliverance from the God who hears and answers the prayer of the needy.

At the close of the meeting a resolution was forwarded to Lord Salisbury desiring him to set apart a day for national confession and humiliation. Many of the friends, as they retired, contributed to the Widows' and Orphans' Fund. G. E. T.

Writing Cases for Soldiers.—Miss E. Alice Puckle asks for old Christmas cards and calendars for making into writing cases for soldiers on the troopships and hospitals. The articles are greatly appreciated by the recipients. An Army Scripture Reader at the front writes urgently for a supply. Ink, writing pencils, note-paper, and envelopes are given, with a leaflet or tract in each case. Miss Puckle's address is "The Hollonds," Langton, Tunbridge Wells.

Lonely Women Workers.

In a recent issue attention was called to the lonely women workers of London, with the object of pointing the opportunity enjoyed by some of inviting such friendless ones into their homes and family circle.

The Hon. Emily Kinnaird, Hon. Sec. of the London Y.W.C.A., writes to us:—

"At our headquarters, 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W., we have a ladies' club, open at all times to its members, Sundays included, where they can either enjoy a quiet time, or meet friends, and on Sundays join in the Bible service at four o'clock, and the friendly tea with the members of the Institute afterwards if they wish. All information regarding the club may be obtained from Miss Ranking, the hon. sec.

"The other provision made for women workers is in the City, where we have opened a Noon Rest Room for lady clerks in Paternoster Row; and there is no reason why it should not be opened in the evening also, if the need is made known to the committee. A subscription of 3d. per week or 2s. 6d. a quarter, will make any woman worker a member, and she will find there refreshment and rest in the midst of the City bustle. I cannot help thinking that such opportunities have only to be known to be appreciated, and will afford even pleasanter intercourse to women workers than private invitations."

Soldiers' Memorial Service.

A large and interesting meeting for prayer and humiliation was held at Hyde Park Hall, preliminary to the service in memory of our fallen soldiers, which was held at the Metropolitan Theatre on Sunday, December 24. A spirit of supplication was given, and much earnest prayer was offered for the country, Queen, and army.

Some 3,000 people were gathered in the theatre, and the memorial service was largely attended by relatives and friends of soldiers at the front. Many letters were read from officers unable to be present, and among the audience were seen some soldiers of the Household Troops, and the khaki uniform was also noticeable.

Col. Douglas Jones, of the War Office, wrote, "May our Lord abundantly bless the service, and give you many souls." Col. Macgregor wrote: "Absence from London prevents me from being present at the Memorial Service. I trust it may be blessed of God to many of the persons who will attend." Col. Spencer Acklom wrote: "I trust the glory of the Lord may be manifested among you, and that you may have a time of blessing and refreshing."

A military band was in attendance, and there was a solemn impression when the huge audience stood to their feet as "The Dead March" in Saul was played. Mr. Chas. Cook was in charge of the meeting, and spoke briefly from John xi. 25, making pointed and personal reference to the following four points:—"We are here," he said, "to (1) Honour the brave; (2) Sympathize with the living; (3) Express our hope in God; and to (4) Learn the lesson He would teach." There were many tears during the address, and many softened hearts were dealt with. In the after-meeting, to which a large number stayed, the workers were busy dealing with the anxious, and comforting the relatives of our soldiers. Some had husbands and many had brothers at the front, and prayer was offered that God would preserve his own children, and save the unsaved.

The fact that so large a meeting could be held on Christmas Eve evidenced the sympathy felt for our soldiers by the mass of the people, and the Christian spirit shown by the above officers, one of whom was an aide-de-camp to the Queen, touched many hearts. It was not mentioned in the meeting, but Royalty itself had (in private letters) expressed sympathy for all who were suffering and in sorrow; and the Hon. and Rev. E. V. Bligh, in writing, said, "My fervent prayers are offered for the Divine blessing."

The Clapton Mission.

Others besides Primitive Methodists will be cheered by the encouraging report of the social and evangelistic activity of the Clapton Mission workers, under the wise and judicious superintendence of Rev. Thomas Jackson. There has been during the past year evidence of the Divine favour and blessing on the efforts put forth; and hearty co-operation, sympathy, and support of God's people.

To turn men from darkness to light, from the power of Satan to God, is the chief aim of the Mission, and the preaching of the Gospel in the streets of Clapton, the slums of Hoxton, and the busy thoroughfare of Whitechapel Road, has been greatly blessed. These services are largely attended by hundreds who seldom enter any place of worship. Many thousands of tracts, &c., have been distributed, and some 6,000 family visits made by the helpers.

The hungry and starving children are amply provided for, 170,000 free meals for these having been distributed during the past fourteen years, and from the early-morning breakfast in the school-room precious Gospel truths have been carried by the children to their family circles, to bear spiritual fruit, which has transformed homes and hearts.

The past year has been one of remarkable success in the operations of the medical branch of the Mission, upwards of 10,000 attendances having been registered by the medical officer. The poor sufferers who have attended the dispensaries have presented touching and pathetic sights, and the assistance rendered has been of immense service to the deserving poor.

The Working Lads' Institute, now the property of the Primitive Methodist Connexion, forms the centre of a growing evangelistic and philanthropic movement. The workers are hopeful for the future progress of the Mission, trusting in the guidance and wisdom of the Almighty in bringing the widow, fatherless, and those who are ready to perish, to rejoice and be glad in the Lord.

Communications may be addressed to Rev. T. Jackson, 58, Rushmore Road, Clapton, N.E.

Literature for Soldiers.

ROYALTY AND THE SCRIPTURES.

We recently noted that Her Majesty had accepted and also bought copies of the Penny Illustrated Gospels, which are being distributed by the Scripture Gift Mission to soldiers and sailors going to the front. Her Majesty has since commanded that a letter be written to the art editor, in which the following passage occurs:—"The four Penny Gospels, which Her Majesty is much pleased with."

Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales has caused a similar letter to be written, saying, "Her Royal Highness is delighted with the Gospels."

Surrounded as the nation now is with anxious care, it is comforting to know that those ruling over us find delight in the Word of God. The Mission is very desirous of giving a copy of these Penny Illustrated Gospels to every soldier and sailor at, or going to, the front. The hon. secretary is Mr. Walters at the offices of the Mission, 15, Strand, London, W.C.

FOR THE MEN EN ROUTE.

Mr. Albert Carr of the Sailors' Institute, Port Luz, Grand Canary, sends an interesting word of the visits of the Bible Society's agent and himself to the ships conveying the troops, as they call for a few hours at this port. Large numbers of tracts and penny stories (Horner's, Stirling, &c.), have been placed in eager hands, the fact that they were given gratis affording an opportunity to speak of the great salvation "without money and without price." He found many hearts softened by the special circumstances, the leaving of home and dear ones, and the uncertainty of return. He pleads for supplies of the above and other suitable literature.

A BOOK FOR THE FRONT.

Rev. F. B. Meyer writes us recommending Comrades All, by Rev. W. J. Mathams (1s. Chatto & Windus), as "the very book that soldiers will read, and full of the Gospel." He adds, "Of course, a book like the marked New Testament would be best; but 'Comrades All' might take with some who would refuse the Bible. It is recommended by Sir Redvers Buller and Sir George White." Parcels could be sent out marked "Books, Field Force, South Africa."

700 men and hundreds of women were turned away through lack of room one night in this month, in London alone.

Address Cheques and Postal Orders to Mrs. BOOTH, 101, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., who will gladly supply Balance Sheets and further particulars, or arrange for personal inspection of the work.

AGED PILGRIMS' FRIEND SOCIETY.

Instituted 1807.

TREASURERS:

F. A. BEVAN, Esq., 54, Lombard Street, E.C.,
W. J. PARKS, Esq., 32, The Chase, Clapham Common, S.W.

1,550 of the Lord's aged poor, of both sexes, and members of the various branches of the Church of Christ, are now on the books; and upwards of £11,000 per annum are distributed amongst them in pensions of five, seven, and ten guineas. To meet this amount the ordinary income is inadequate. The pensioners live in all parts of the country, and most of them are upwards of seventy years of age.

In the four homes—Camberwell, Hornsey Rise, Brighton, and Stamford Hill—180 of the pensioners have peaceful and happy abodes. A visit to these buildings is invited.

FRESH CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE SOCIETY AND ASYLUMS ARE EARNESTLY SOLICITED.

JOHN E. HAZELTON, Secretary.
Office, 83, Finsbury Pavement, E.C.

NATIONAL PROVIDENT INSTITUTION. [1835.

Estd.]

FOR MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE.

The Profits are divided solely amongst the Assured; already divided, £5,400,000.

Claims Paid nearly - £11,000,000.
Accumulated Fund - £5,400,000.

Endowment-Assurance Policies are issued combining Life Assurance at minimum cost, with provision for old age. The practical effect of these Policies in the National Provident Institution is that the Member's life is assured until he reaches the age agreed upon, and on his reaching that age the whole of the Premiums paid are returned to him, and a considerable sum in addition, representing a by no means insignificant rate of interest on his payments.

HELP GREATLY NEEDED.

BRITISH SOCIETY FOR THE

PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL AMONG THE JEWS,

96, GREAT RUSSELL STREET, BLOOMSBURY, W.C.

THE LORD GUIDE AND PROVIDE.

Some of the Work done by the British Society.

1.—It has Hebrew Christian Missionaries and many Voluntary Helpers, all engaged in spreading the Truth of the Gospel. 2.—It has Mission Stations in the United Kingdom, Germany, Austria, Russia, and Turkey. 3.—It has Medical Missions. 4.—New Testaments, portions of Scripture, and Tracts in various languages are distributed. 5.—The Gospel is preached in Mission Halls, and from house-to-house.

6.—It has Homes for Poor Aged Hebrew Christians.

We trust you will send all the help you can, and as soon as ever you can.

Robert Greer, Esq., Treasurer.

Contributions will be gratefully received by the Rev. Isaac Levinson, 96, Great Russell Street, London, W.C., or may be sent to the Office of The Christian.

URGENT.

To complete the Good Samaritan Work of the

"Liberator" Relief Fund.

After seven years' earnest pleading, a further £10,000, or 200,000 shillings, still urgently needed to give relief to hundreds of aged, destitute, and afflicted victims of the great "Liberator" fraud, who were taught and trained in habits of temperance and thrift by their trusted leaders, only to find themselves suddenly robbed of their life-savings, and driven to face the dreaded workhouse, in spite of all their praiseworthy endeavours to make some provision for their old age.

Ninety per cent. of these sufferers are members of some section of the Christian Church.

"Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the Law of Christ.

There are 2,830 cases on the Books of the Fund, of whom 1,500 are Widows or Spinsters. 690 are over 70 years of age. 1,460 are over 60 years of age. Over 300 deaths through the disaster.

THE BITTER CRY FOR HELP

Is still coming to the Committee from sufferers who have bravely borne with their difficulties, till sickness or great destitution has compelled them to apply.

Cheques and P.O.'s should be made payable to the "Liberator" Relief Fund, crossed "The London City and Midland Bank," and sent to the Secretary,

Rev. J. STOCKWELL WATTS,
16, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

EVERYONE SHOULD READ

"Echoes from the Liberator Prison."

16, FARRINGDON STREET. 1s. post free.

The Christian says:—"The third edition of 'Echoes from the Liberator Prison' (1s., Unwin Bros.), by Rev. J. Stockwell Watts, is issued. This well-known and forcibly written book, which gives such heart-breaking accounts of the sorrows endured by those who were robbed of their support by the Liberator crash, should be helped to a wider circulation than it has yet attained."

CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY

(FOUNDED 1865.)

President - - SIR GEORGE WILLIAMS.
Treasurer - - - - - F. A. BEVAN, Esq.
Help is urgently needed for the support of the following operations.

SEVEN MISSION CENTRES.—Where meetings of a varied character are held nightly.

NIGHT REFUGE.—2,000 Homeless Men sheltered last winter.

WIDOWS' INDUSTRIAL FUND.—Which finds employment (sewing) for Widows and Elderly Single Women. 2,160 payments made last year.

FREE MEALS FOR DESERVING POOR.—22,500 given last year.

Also for Children's Dinners, distribution of Food Parcels, and much other work of a religious and benevolent nature.

Donations will be gratefully received by F. A BEVAN, Esq., 54, Lombard Street, E.C.; or may be sent to the Office of The Christian; or to the Sec., Mr. JAMES ATKINSON, 61, Rectory Road, Stoke Newington, N.

"AN UNEQUAL COMBAT"

IS THE TITLE OF THE

WINTER APPEAL

OF THE

ST. GILES'S CHRISTIAN MISSION.

The Appeal shows how acute are the SUFFERINGS OF THE INNOCENT CHILDREN AND WIVES OF PRISONERS, and how constantly their terrible needs are being made known to, and relieved by, the Mission in various Districts and Parishes.

The Appeal also shows that

are dealt with, but that a large number of

THE STRUGGLING, HARD-WORKING POOR are assisted in their efforts and supplied with

FOOD, CLOTHING, AND FIRING.

Treasurer: F. A. BEVAN, Esq., D.L., J.P., 54, Lombard Street, E.C.
Superintendent: WILLIAM WHEATLEY, 4, Ampton Street, Regent Square, W.C.
Cheques and Postal Orders may be crossed—"Messrs. BARCLAY and Co."

NATIONAL WAIFS' ASSOCIATION

(Otherwise known as "DR. BARNARDO'S HOMES").

Over 5,000 Orphan or Waif Children are now in the Homes. Among these Children there are 734 LITTLE INCURABLES, Deaf and Dumb, Blind, Crippled or otherwise Afflicted Children. EIGHT SOULS are added every 24 hours to this Great Family.

38,767 Waifs have already been rescued by the Homes. Of these 10,660 trained Boys and Girls have been successfully placed out in the Colonies, and more than 22,000 sent to Sea or placed in Situations in Great Britain, &c.

Some conception of the extent of the work may be formed from the fact that during the last Two Years no fewer than 4,655 Fresh Cases have been admitted—a number probably in excess of admissions by all other existing Societies put together.

No really Destitute Child has ever been refused admission.

The Doors are open to the Homeless FREELY, Day and Night, all the year round. No eligible case is rejected on the ground of age, sex, creed, nationality, or physical condition.

Even the Smallest Gifts will be thankfully received.

HELPING the HELPLESS, HOMELESS, and HOPELESS, to HELP THEMSELVES.

102 CHURCH ARMY HOMES, &c.,

In London and throughout the Provinces, from Newcastle to Plymouth, and from Cambridge to Dublin, for giving A FRESH START IN LIFE to every suitable case, male and female, entirely irrespective of creed.

21,000 cases—men, women, girls, and boys—dealt with in 1898. Over 50 per cent. of all received genuinely started afresh in life.

Men's Homes, Women's Homes, Girls' Homes, Boys' Homes, Rescue Homes, Inebriates' Homes, First Offenders' Homes, Discharged Prisoners' Homes, Classifying Homes.

Missions conducted all the year round by specially trained Missioners in the Prisons, Workhouses, and Reformatories of England and Wales, free of all charge, with the warm approval and support of the Home Office and the Local Government Board. The only Society in Britain carrying on this special work. Ex-prisoners received direct on their discharge from prison, as well as all suitable cases from Workhouses, Casual Wards, Police Courts, Streets, &c.

Prisoners' Families' Relief Fund and Discharged Prisoners' Aid Funds in full operation throughout the country.

Sixty-six Mission and Colportage Vans always working throughout England, Wales, and the North of Ireland, preaching the simple Gospel, and distributing Bibles, Tracts, Temperance Literature, &c.

Pioneer and Tent Missions in large, poor, and slum town parishes by Special Missioners with special equipment.

Sixty Men and Forty Women annually trained, free of charge, as Evangelists, Mission Nurses, Pioneer and Tent Missioners, Van Missioners and Colporteurs, Rescue and Slum Workers, &c.

The Church Army has, in all its undertakings, the one definite object—TO BRING THE INDIVIDUAL SOUL TO AN EFFECTUAL KNOWLEDGE OF THE GOSPEL OF THE LORD—and no effort is considered to have accomplished its purpose so long as it falls below that standard.

Obituary.

MRS. FINCH WHITE.

We regret to hear of the death, from influenza and pneumonia, of Mrs. Katherine L. F. Finch White, wife of Colonel Finch White. She was greatly interested in her husband's efforts in Christian work, especially in connection with the McAll Mission in France. Mrs. Finch White contracted the diseases mentioned while nursing one of her daughters, who, though now slowly recovering, is still too ill to be informed of her mother's death.

THE DUKE OF WESTMINSTER.

The late Duke of Westminster exercised a powerful influence upon many religious and philanthropic movements. Probably the wealthiest man in England, he dispensed large sums to charitable purposes. His connection with the Turf was, of course, a matter for deep regret; but many will recall with pleasure the deep sympathy which the deceased nobleman evinced towards the persecuted Armenians, and his labours for the protection of native races from the liquor traffic.

MR. GEORGE HARRIS, LEYTONSTONE.

The district of Harrow Green, Leytonstone, has sustained a severe loss in the decease, on Christmas eve, at the age of sixty-seven, of Mr. George Harris, one of the oldest missionaries employed by the London City Mission. More than forty years ago he commenced work in a poor district in Shadwell, where the people were sadly destitute of Gospel ministry, and left it eleven years ago with a commodious mission hall, in which a flourishing work is still carried on. The centre of his labours at Harrow Green was the Howard Road Mission Hall, connected with the Congregational Church (Rev. G. H. Sandwell); but he also conducted the adult Bible-class at the Montagu Hall, and was for three years leader of the "Men's Own" at the "Welcome" Mission. He was much beloved by the poor of his district.

REV. CANON ELLISON.

The founder of the Church of England Temperance Society, Rev. Canon Henry J. Ellison, passed away at Canterbury on Christmas morning, in his eighty-seventh year. Temperance organization was the great work of his life. It was in 1861 that he seriously took the work in hand, and in the following year the association was formed which developed into the C.E.T.S. It was carried on as a total abstinence organization for ten years, when, in 1872, the Society was adopted by Convocation and established on the present basis, embracing temperance reformers as well as advocates of total abstinence. His letter to Archbishop Tait was the immediate cause of the constitution of a joint committee of all the temperance societies for the purpose of suppressing the liquor traffic among the natives of Africa. He was chaplain-in-ordinary to her Majesty, who made frequent inquiries as to his welfare.

REV. W. WINGATE.

Rev. W. Wingate, who passed away on Dec. 24, was held in deep respect by all friends of Jewish missions. He was born in 1808, and early in his career resigned good business prospects to enter on his life's work of missionary to the Jews. He was sent by the Church of Scotland to Pesth, where his remarkable gifts soon made a lasting impression. Men so well known as Dr. Saphir, Dr. Edersheim, Dr. Tomory (of Constantinople), and others witnessed to the success of a ministry that was cut short by the expulsion of the mission from Hungary by the Austrian Government. The expulsion attracted a good deal of public interest at the time, and marks the change in religious liberty which is now enjoyed on the Continent. The deceased was the eldest of three brothers, one being the late Major Sir George Wingate, and the other the father of Sir F. R. Wingate, the Sirdar and Governor-General of the Sudan.

MR. JOHN HOLDEN.

Wesleyan Methodists will hear with regret of the sudden death of Mr. John Holden, of Folkestone, at the age of seventy-seven. By his liberality, extending over a long period, he did much to promote the building of Wesleyan churches in Folkestone, Sandgate, Hythe, and Dymchurch. As lay representative at the Wesleyan Conference, and as a member of important Connexional Committees, he rendered long and valued service to Methodism. It will be remembered that last year his youngest daughter, Mrs. Applebee, wife of a Wesleyan missionary, was murdered near Pretoria. Her death was a severe blow to her father.

REV. CHARLES STIBBERT SLATER.

The death has occurred, at Plymouth, of Rev. Charles Stibbert Slater, one of the most influential Congregational ministers in the West of England. He had been in failing health for some weeks, and the end came on Saturday morning. Mr. Slater received his ministerial training at Springhill College, Birmingham, and, at the age of twenty-one, took his degree of M.A. in London University. After serving as pastor of Addison Street Chapel, Nottingham, he had charge of the Broughton Park Church, Manchester, and removed to Plymouth, in 1883, to the Sherwell Congregational Chapel, which pastorate he resigned a few weeks ago.

REV. D. L. TAYLOR.

The death is announced of Rev. D. L. Taylor, a venerable and well-known American writer and preacher, and a close friend of the late Mr. H. L. Hastings. While a young man Mr. Taylor became a believer in the personal second coming of Christ, and remained throughout his life a prominent exponent of that doctrine. He prepared a volume made up of the utterances of the Church of Christ through eighteen centuries in regard to the coming of Christ, and entitled "The Voice of the Church." This work was largely rewritten in later years, and was republished under the title, "The Reign of Christ on Earth; or, the Voice of the Church in all Ages Concerning the Coming and Kingdom of the Redeemer." For many years Mr. Taylor was a correspondent of the Boston Journal, contributing the annual summaries of current events which formerly appeared in that paper; and at various times he was associate editor of Messiah's Herald, the World's Crisis, and the Bible Banner.

GENERAL HUTCHINSON, C.B., C.S.I.

Many will hear with sorrow of the death of Major-General George Hutchinson, C.B., C.S.I., who died on December 30. Entering the Bengal Engineers in 1844, he discharged great responsibilities during many years. Who shall tell his deeds of skill and daring? He served with the army of Sutlej, 1846; in the Indian Mutiny as political A.D.C. to Sir Henry Lawrence in charge of a movable column before the siege of Lucknow; as an engineer officer throughout the siege, and as director of works after Havelock and Outram entered; as chief engineer to Sir James Outram throughout the occupation of Alum Bagh, and in the various actions there; as brigadier-major of engineers to Lord Clyde throughout the final capture of Lucknow; and as military secretary in Oudh during the suppression of the rebellion. He entered the Bengal Staff Corps, and became chief of police in the Punjab. He reorganized and commanded the new force, 1861-75, and was mentioned in despatches, being specially reported by the Governor-General. He received a special letter of approbation by the Queen, and the medal, with two clasps. For seven years he was lay secretary to the Church Missionary Society, on whose committee he continued to act, as well as on that of the British and Foreign Bible Society, his knowledge of India being of great service in both cases. In these directions of service General Hutchinson was known to many of our readers; his judgment was sound and his devotion deservedly held in admiration.

REV. W. TIDD MATSON.

By the death of Rev. W. T. Matson, the Christian Church has lost a well-known hymn writer. Mr. Matson, who was born in 1833, was in his early days secretary of the European Freedom Committee, and formed friendships with Kossuth, Mazzini, James Stansfeld, and others. Entering the Congregational ministry, he laboured at Havant, Gosport, Portsmouth, and Salisbury Green, as well as Sleaford and Rothwell. The most popular of his hymns have been those beginning, "Lord, I was blind: I could not see;" "Teach me, O Lord, thy holy mind;" and "O blessed life, the heart at rest." The first-named has been translated into Tamil and Chinese. Another well-known hymn, "God is in his Temple," was written at the suggestion of the late Dr. Henry Allon, for the tune "Groningen."

The Y.M.C.A.

Special meetings for humiliation and prayer were held at Exeter Hall on the first day of the year, under the leadership of Revs. F. B. Meyer and G. H. C. Macgregor.

The Archdeacon of London was the principal speaker at the twenty-fifth annual meeting of the Yeovil Association. He gave valuable testimony to the usefulness of the work carried on by Y.M.C.A.'s, as observed by him in his visits to many centres throughout the country.

An important meeting, representative of all denominations, recently took place at the Plymouth Y.M.C.A., at which a resolution was formally adopted, expressing the conviction that daily united intercession on behalf of the forces and the population in South Africa will most speedily terminate the present unhappy war. Upwards of 250 persons attended the first of a series of meetings arranged to be held daily in the Guildhall, Plymouth.

MR. OATTS' TOUR.

Mr. W. M. Oatts writes as follows, dating from the s.s. Rome, on the Red Sea: "Mrs. Oatts and myself have started on our world's tour in connection with our mission to the Y.M.C.A.'s and Y.W.C.A.'s in India and the British Colonies. It was our intention to have Bible-readings on board, but this was impossible till we reached Port Said. While coaling there, Mr. Locke, the energetic missionary to the seamen, invited the Christians on board the Rome to visit his mission, and have a short service. Twenty passengers accepted the invitation, and we spent one hour and a half in delightful fellowship. Everyone in the room took part. Those who had been in work told of what the Lord had done for, and by, them; and those who were going out to the field told of how the Lord had led them. It was agreed at this meeting to have a Bible-reading on board every forenoon at 11, and each day this week about thirty missionaries and Christian friends gathered around the Word.

"One day a missionary meeting was held. There was a good attendance, the chair being occupied by Rev. Mr. Boyce, of Sydney. The speakers who took part were: Mrs. Gill, American Methodist Missionary, North India; Miss Gedge, C.M.S., Ceylon; Miss Swainson, C.Z.M. to the deaf and dumb in Tinnevelly, India; and Mr. Blair, Irish Presbyterian missionary to the jungle tribes in North India. There is a good deal of worldliness on board a mail steamer, and the Christian becomes a 'peculiar' person. We hope to reach Bombay on December 23. On December 24 we go to Poona for a Secretaries' Conference, and on December 28 an Indian National Conference of Y.M.C.A.'s is to be held in Bombay. We shall value the prayers of the readers of The Christian."

Worthing Tabernacle.—The pastor of this church (Mr. C. Douglas Crouch) and his coadjutors acknowledge no denominational name or interests in their earnest and zealous labours for the glory of God and the well-being and salvation of men. The blessing of God has attended the endeavours of the past year, and numbers have been added to the Church membership. Thankofferings for the furtherance of the work are received at the Tabernacle, Montague Street and Liverpool Road, Worthing.

Children's Aid Society.—By means of this organization children are rescued from poverty, neglect, and evil surroundings, and placed in positions which enable them to become honest and useful members of society. The outcasts are sought by the rescue officers, and maintained and employed in works connected with the Homes in different parts of England, as well as Manitoba. During the past year 1,850 children have come within the beneficent operations of the Society. The secretary of this useful agency is Mr. Arthur J. S. Maddison, 32, Charing Cross, London, S.W.

Church of England.

The next general meeting of the Bishops is fixed for Jan. 16 and 17, at the Church House, Westminster.

The Church Missionary Society has received a legacy of £5,000 under the will of the late Mr. Thomas Cox, of Longfleet.

The date for the hearing of the Woolwich faculty cases, referred to in our last issue, should have been January 2, instead of January 11.

A discovery of interest has been made at Canterbury Cathedral, definite evidence being now forthcoming that the recess in the north ambulatory of the presbytery, in which the chained Bible lies, was the site where in pre-Reformation times the Easter sepulchre was deposited during Holy Week. The alteration was doubtless the work of Archbishop Cranmer.

The Bishop of Ripon has nominated a Commission to inquire into the needs and spiritual requirements of Bradford with regard to the building of new churches, the removal of unnecessary ones, and the rearrangement of parishes, and to see by what means the resources of the Church may be made more available for the altered condition of the population.

Congregational.

Rev. Enoch Hall, of Skinner Street Church, Poole, lately conducted mission services at Portland. The gatherings were productive of much good. Mr. Hall's devoted labours have been cordially recognised at a recent presentation.

Mr. John Minshull, hon. secretary of the century fund for North Finchley Church, reports that the first list of contributions from the members of the church amount to £850. The Christian Endeavour Society has already raised £30 amongst its members.

Mr. J. Carvell Williams, M.P., has entered upon his duties as chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, in succession to Rev. H. Arnold Thomas, of Bristol. Mr. Williams is the third layman appointed to that office, his predecessors being the late Mr. Henry Richard, M.P., and Mr. Albert Spicer, M.P.

In the course of a sermon at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, on Isaiah i. 15, Rev. F. B. Meyer said that the nation must stand solid at this crisis, because the existence of the Empire depended on the issue of this war, and the British Empire on the whole stood for freedom, justice, and civilization, to say nothing of Christianity. He had gladly drafted a call for prayer, but he felt that the need of the hour was for humiliation for our national sins. To pray without the confession and removal of the wrongs which might be causing the Divine judgments seemed hypocrisy. There was no need for despair, England was England still. Her heart was sound, and in this hour of crisis her noblest qualities were apparent.

Baptist.

The Baptist Church at Chapmanslade, near Warminster, last week celebrated its centenary. Special services were held.

The serious position of the Baptist Missionary Society's finances is set forth in a statement for the New Year just issued. It appears that the expenditure is considerably in advance of the income, and a possible debt at the end of March next is estimated at over £10,000.

Rev. W. E. Wells has resigned the pastorate of the Baptist Church, Woolwich Road. At a valedictory meeting Mr. Wells' labours were cordially recognised. Rev. Hinchcliffe Higgins (Congregational) presided, and Revs. E. Henderson and W. Kendal took part. Letters from some who had been brought to Christ were read.

The new chapel at San Salvador, Congo country, Africa, has been opened. The greater part of it was built with stones obtained from the ruins of the old Catholic convent. The whole of the work has been done by lads brought up on the mission, and the native Christians have found the money for such materials as had to be purchased. The building will seat 500.

The New Year's meeting in connection with the Baptist Missionary Society was held on January 1. Rev. F. B. Meyer, who presided, deplored the present war between Britain and the Transvaal, but he believed, nevertheless, that the British Empire had meant the weal of native races, the elevation and civilization of vasts tracts of country, and ultimately the dissemination of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Several representatives from other societies took part in the meeting, and a special appeal was made for financial support.

Methodist.

The Special Committee which the Wesleyan Conference appointed as to the admtnistration of the Lord's Supper has, it is understood, agreed upon its report. It will recommend that the ordinance shall be observed in all the larger churches at least once a month, and in the smaller churches at least once a quarter. Certain changes in the arrangements for the service will also be recommended with a view to ensure a more devout and intelligent observance.

The new church of the Primitive Methodist congregation at Wishaw has been opened. The building was densely packed. Rev. W. Stott presided, and addresses were delivered by Revs. J. L. M'Gregor, Wm. Forsyth, and others. This same denomination has also in course of erection in the town a mission hall costing £240, and a new Sabbath school hall in connection with another church in the neighbourhood, which is costing £600.

Lecturing recently on John Wesley, Dr. Butler, Master of Trinity, stated that Wesley's style was "colloquial" and "remarkable for extreme directness." Commenting on this the Methodist Times remarks—"We have long been convinced that an un-Scriptural and deadly delusion exists with respect to preaching. The true preacher is, in the Scriptural sense, a 'prophet.' The Methodist pulpit, upon which we must ever mainly depend, would be immeasurably more attractive and powerful to-day if all its occupants kept up the 'colloquial' and 'direct' style of John Wesley."

Rev. W. Darlow Sarjeant has formed part of a deputation sent by the Evangelical Alliance to Dresden to make representations to the Government with respect to the persecutions to which Methodists, Baptists, and other Nonconformists are subjected in Saxony. The deputation requested that liberty should be granted to worship according to the dictates of conscience, to pray and sing audibly, that parents should be allowed to take their children with them to worship God, that they shall be at liberty to advertise their services, and that in all meetings convened by Christian men singing and prayer shall be allowed. The minister interviewed promised that the oppressed worshippers should have State recognition and a degree of liberty at the earliest moment.

Presbyterian.

Rev. Jacob Primmer created a sensation in Dumfermline Abbey at the close of a special service by reading a protest against the character of the service.

At a meeting of the Established Presbytery at Perth, a letter was read from the agents of the late Miss Spottiswoode, of Charlotte Street, intimating that £1,500 had been left to provide a manse for the minister of the East Parish Church, and £1,200 towards augmenting his stipend.

At a meeting of the Edinburgh Established Presbytery it was reported that the church in course of erection at Blackhall would be open in a few months, and would be called St. Columba's, Craigcrook. It was at first feared that there would be some difficulty in obtaining the services of a minister to do pioneer work in this district, but Rev. W. B. Stevenson, Athelstaneford, has undertaken the work.

Society of Friends.

At Richill monthly meeting, Richard Holtom Lamb was liberated for Gospel service in Ireland. He expects that his service will lie chiefly in meetings of Friends in Munster and parts of Leinster.

Fallen Asleep.

On Monday, December 11, Rev. J. GOODACRE, Wesleyan Methodist, of Witney.—Many Congregational institutions have lost a generous supporter by the death, at St. Leonards, of Mr. CHARLES MITTON ELKIN.—Rev. HENRY CHEETHAM, formerly Bishop of Sierra Leone, in his seventy-third year.—East Dereham Primitive Methodist Circuit has sustained a loss by the death, at the age of seventy-seven, of Mr. B. BRETT, who recently attained his jubilee as a local preacher.—At the age of eighty-one, Mr. ALFRED HOATH HEATHCOTE, one of the oldest members of Southernhay Congregational Church, Exeter. He was deacon there for nearly forty years, and senior deacon for several years.—At Donaghadee, Mr. ALEXANDER THRELKELD, an earnest Christian worker.—At Belfast, Mr. W. E. THOMPSON, a devoted Sunday School teacher.—Rev. DAVID J. PATTERSON, of the Second United States Presbyterian Church. He had been pastor of the church for nearly fifty-two years. Although eighty-eight years old, he retained remarkable vigour to the last.—Lady STOKES, wife of Professor Sir George G. Stokes, died on Sunday, at Cambridge, after a long and painful illness.

Protestantism in Wales.

THE great Protestant demonstration held on the 18th ult. at Monmouth was largely attended. On the platform were many well-known supporters of the evangelical cause. The meeting was convened by the Ladies' League.

Mr. Bosanquet, who presided, said they must remember that Protestantism was not a mere negation. It did not consist merely in denying the authority of the Pope; nor, on the other hand, was it a question merely of forms and ceremonies. It was a question of those vital and scriptural truths for which the first reformers were content to lay down their lives. Especially was it the case with that great truth that there was between God and man, except that one Mediator who made one sacrifice upon the cross for all.

After a few vigorous words from Lady Llangattock, Lady Wimborne, in the course of a forcible address, referred to a direction contained in a work "On Confession," where it was asserted that a person might by moral reservation tell the most exasperating falsehoods. It was not too much to say that in some Catholic countries truthfulness was a negligible quantity, and it was also a characteristic of Ritualism. After all, they must judge a system by its effect on the history of a nation, or on the character of the race. Judged on those grounds, there was not one word to say in favour of Romanism, nor that spurious imitation of it, Ritualism. If they looked over the history of the past, ecclesiastical rule had ever been synonymous with superstition and ignorance, and had ever been the but if they looked at the other side of the picture the whole of the moral and intellectual progress of the world had been due to Protestantism.

Lady Hope said that the women of the country could not regard with indifference the conflict that was going on in the Church to-day. In America the women had been largely identified with the suppression of the drink traffic in certain States, and by personal influence and fervent believing prayers women could be of great assistance in the work before them. The speaker related incidents of extreme ritual excesses, and said an attempt was made on one occasion by two clergymen and a lady to induce the lady's husband to subscribe towards the erection of a side chapel to a church in Belgravia to be dedicated to the Virgin Mary. The interior decorations were to be of lily pattern, and the chapel was to be dedicated to "Our Lady of the Lilies." Lady Hope also described a visit to a Royal Chapel in Madrid, where she heard a Spanish bishop preach an eloquent sermon to a congregation of common people during the American War, in which he described the coming of the Virgin on the day of resurrection; his text being, "She shall come in clouds with power and great glory." He also told them that the Virgin would appear in the clouds and lead the Spaniards to victory. The speaker, in conclusion, appealed to the audience for sympathy with the movement which was directed against the which had, in former years, done so much harm, and which many ritualistic clergymen were again endeavouring to introduce.

Lord Llangattock, Mr. H. N. Hughman, and other speakers also took part, and the meeting concluded with the singing of "O God, our help in ages past."

London Jews' Society.—Many friends of this excellent Society will hear with regret that the scope and extent of its operations have resulted in a serious deficiency of funds. The annual income is steadily growing, but does not, unfortunately, keep pace with the expenditure. During the last ten years the Society has added considerably to its staff of missionaries in England, Palestine, and Persia, and its agents now number 184. The secretary is Rev. W. Fleming, and the Society's headquarters are at 16, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Livingstone Exhibition.

THE exhibition arranged by Dr. C. F. Harford-Battersby, in connection with his medical missionary training work at Livingstone College, was opened on Monday last at St. Martin's Town Hall, Charing Cross.

The main object of the exhibition is to put before travellers or residents in the unhealthy regions of the world specimens of appropriate articles of outfit which are likely to help in the preservation of health, or which may be needed for the treatment of accident or disease, as well as a number of other conveniences of travel which, by contributing to the comfort of the individual, have a large share in securing health under what are often most disadvantageous circumstances.

In an annexe is shown a loan collection of Livingstone and other relics, full of interesting objects, and arranged by Mr. Frank Wilson, Dr. Livingstone's son-in-law. The Royal Geographical Society has lent two of Livingstone's original maps, his sextant, and some slave chains from Central Africa; while Mr. Wilson contributes Livingstone's Bible, watch, with other personal objects, and some most interesting journals and letters. In the same room are exhibited mementoes of Bishop Hannington and of a number of famous explorers.

At the opening ceremony, Sir George Taubman Goldie said he wondered if people realised the extent of the tropical empire of Great Britain, to which the latest addition had been made only that morning, when the Government took over the territories of the Niger Company. In all tropical regions there were Englishmen serving, some as missionaries, others in the cause of science, some in the pursuit of commerce, and many as soldiers, and this was among the reasons for the present exhibition. The speaker went on to refer to the work of Livingstone, expressing the hope that the efforts of the Royal Geographical Society would result in a suitable obelisk being raised to Livingstone's memory at the remote and lonely spot in Ulala where he laid down his life's work, which, in itself, was a monument more enduring than brass.

Among those present at the opening were Lord Radstock, Rev. H. E. Fox, and Preb. Kitto. The exhibition remains open till the 5th inst.

An Interesting Watchnight.

AT the watchnight service at the Great Assembly Hall, an immense congregation gathered, the Hall being crowded and hundreds standing about the doors. To see a company of over 5,000 at midnight listening to the Gospel is a sight never to be forgotten.

The address was given by Mr. Leonard Weaver. He took for his subject "How best to spend life in order to get the most out of it for ourselves and the world around us."

At the stroke of twelve the congregation joined in singing, with bowed heads, "I will arise and go to my father." An opportunity was then given for all who wished to sign the temperance pledge, and 205 pledges were taken.

At one a.m. the workers left the hall, full of thanksgiving for the wonderful tokens of divine power.

Personalia.

The improvement in the condition of Sir George Williams, we are glad to note, has been well maintained throughout the past week.

Our readers will learn with regret that Mr. George Holland, the venerable and esteemed superintendent of George Yard Mission, Whitechapel, is far from well, and unable to leave his house.

The name of Lord Bennet, who succeeds to the earldom of Tankerville, is familiar in association with the evangelistic meetings of the late Mr. D. L. Moody. On such occasions Lord Bennet took part and sang the Gospel with telling effect. We pray that in his new position he may be increasingly useful in the spread of the Gospel, and the maintenance of evangelical truth

Christmas Festivities.

WORKERS in various parts of London have reported upon efforts to brighten the lives of the poor and desolate during the recent festive season. We are quite unable to notice these efforts in detail; and as they are very much alike in character, there can be little need to specify instances, and go into particulars. A few lines may be given, however, in reference to classes of special interest—if classes they can be called.

The Strangers' Rest, Ratcliff Highway, was the scene of great activity. After elaborate preparations, ably organised and heartily carried out, came the festive day. Miss Bignell, after describing the meetings of English, Swedish, German, Italian, and other sailors, writes: "I never worked so hard at an urn before; I can't think where the tea went. No café chantant could compare with this Christmas feast. Sacred solos with guitar and organ accompaniment floated o'er the vast "mixed multitude," in English and foreign tongues, and the "thorough bass" brought up the chorus. After tea the men were told off to their respective rooms, accompanied by a native worker. I spent the evening in the English and American room. Those were calm and awful moments, as the Holy Spirit of God brooded over human hearts. Sailor after sailor rose and told his mates the sweet story of his conversion. Worker after worker was pleading as I left. My story has a sequel which cannot be fully told save in heaven."

"If you want to be happy yourself, try to make others happy." This proverb was fully illustrated on Christmas morning at the Field Lane Institution, when some 890 of the very poorest and destitute men and women were gathered in and provided with a substantial Christmas dinner. Good will and good cheer were the order of the day. The cost was defrayed by contributions specially collected for the purpose, and enough money was obtained to give parcels of grocery, etc., a joint of meat, and a cwt. of coal to 785 families, all known to the workers of this old-established charity, and to provide a New Year's dinner for 700 children.

The Y.W.C.A.

THE centre and branch associations in Derby report progress. A fresh and keen interest has been awakened in Bible study.

At Southport Association much interest is evinced in missionary work. The various departments are reported to be satisfactorily progressing, and the superintendent continues to receive many grateful letters, deeply appreciating the spiritual and temporal care the writers have received.

Exeter Association has just completed its twenty-fourth year. It is a special joy to the workers that the Bible classes are always better attended than any others, that an increasingly prayerful spirit prevails, and that a deeper interest is taken in missions, at home and abroad. The members continue their weekly class among factory girls. The class is very much valued by the girls, both for the help given in their sewing, and for the closing half-hour's talk over God's Word.

Mrs. Bickersteth Cook, secretary of Hampstead Association (who, during the sixteen years she carried on the work, had endeared herself to all connected with the Association), is obliged, by personal affairs, to resign the secretaryship. She remains on the committee as its president, Mrs. Gordon succeeding her as secretary. The committee are desirous of securing an institute with a boarding department, which it is believed would add greatly to the usefulness of the work. Address: 166, Rosslyn Hill, N.W.

Communications for THE CHRISTIAN should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All Advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for THE CHRISTIAN by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "THE CHRISTIAN" POSTAL DEPARTMENT, BOUVERIE HOUSE, SALISBURY SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

WE learn from Northfield that the friends of the late Mr. Moody have received a large number of letters and telegrams from Christian workers and others in the old and new worlds, President McKinley and his wife being among the number. The trustees of the Schools propose to raise an Endowment Fund for carrying on those very valuable institutions.

The Life of Mr. Moody, which is to be written by his son, Mr. Will R. Moody, will, it is hoped, materially assist the Endowment Fund. Accordingly, Mr. Sankey writes to a Brooklyn paper:

> I have declined to write for, or to assist in, the preparation of any life of Mr. Moody, other than the one authorized by the family.

This decision is as charitable as it is reasonable, for by the schools many worthy young men and women are educated and otherwise equipped for Christian service.

We have received many letters and communications from friends of the departed evangelist, some of which, together with a tribute by Rev. W. Hay Aitken, we hope to give next week. Meanwhile, we notify our readers that the January numbers of THE CHRISTIAN, bound together in illustrated covers, will form a most interesting memento of the life and work of Mr. Moody. It will comprise portraits of the evangelist, and his coadjutor, Mr. Ira D. Sankey; family groups, and views of Northfield; together with the biographic sketches, particulars of the funeral, and tributes and testimonies from many friends. Orders should be given at once for the monthly part, which will be ready on the 25th inst., price 6d. (post free, 9d.)

The meetings for united and universal prayer, organized for more than half a century by the Evangelical Alliance, have this year been made specially emphatic by the setting apart of Sunday last as a day of national humiliation and prayer in relation to the war. Every day this week Christian people are assembling together in confession, supplication, and praise. The whole world is thus girdled with prayer. At any time prayer is never presented to God in vain. There are, however, seasons which render it peculiarly fitting—entrance upon a new year, personal affliction and bereavement, national trouble and alarm, religious contentions, wars and rumours of wars, fightings without and fears within—these are some of the circumstances which give to the observance of the hallowed period of fellowship with God this year a distinctly special character.

The following incident forms an interesting sequel to Mr. Meyer's sermon on Sunday morning last upon "The Background of Life" (see p. 13).

> A working-man having heard this address went home, and was met at the door by his wife, pale and trembling, who said, "I am very sorry I have had an accident, and killed your favourite canary." She was quite prepared for violent usage, but to her surprise her husband said, "Never mind, gal, it can't be helped. See here it is, 'For his Name's sake.'" The eldest boy said to his mother, when they were alone together, "Mother, what's the matter with father? I told yon he'd give it you, and he's done nuffin." Oh that we could be always guided by the thought of his Name's sake! F. B. M.

An address, very gently and courteously worded, has been issued by the Committee of the Peace Union to "Christian Leaders," asking whether we are not bound, in this time of war, to seek for ourselves, and to encourage in others, those dispositions which make for peace. It points out that we should endeavour to think justly, generously, and humanely of all, even of opponents, and to cherish a temper of candour and humility which forbids self-glorification, or an undue dwelling on the faults of others, both in personal and in national relations. Works like these are sorely needed everywhere. War always endangers the temper of mind in which alone the Kingdom of God can abide; we know it at home; and an officer in the Salvation Army, who writes from General Buller's base, where he is kindly treated, bears the following testimony:—"Soul-saving is very difficult work in the camp, the soldiers' hearts are so full of bitterness and revenge."

The impulse is extending in all directions for a more open and definite appeal to prayer as the best means of hastening the advent of an honourable and lasting peace. The enrolment of British Volunteers in South Africa, in view of the numerous Dutch farmers who have joined the Boers, is infusing into the struggle some of the worst elements of civil war, with all its train of bitter feelings and lasting estrangement. There are so many influences at work in the direction of inflaming the passions of the combatants, that, unless we wait more earnestly upon God as a nation, our own temper may be permanently affected, and the spiritual teachings of the situation be entirely lost upon us.

One of the widespread effects of the war news is a growing inability on the part of almost everybody to read or think about any other subject. The sale of serious literature has greatly suffered already, and all classes of new books—except such as deal with military and South African matters—have been affected. It is very important that we should keep our spiritual balance under the disquieting circumstances of the hour. It is apparent that we are in for a long and bitter struggle, unless an unforeseen end comes to the conflict. For people to give themselves over, heart and mind, to the harassing details of the course of events, to the exclusion of the higher topics that should habitually have a place, is a most demoralizing process. Only by cultivating our interest in things eternal and Divine shall we rise above the tyranny of circumstances, and attain a calm and sober view of the situation, and of life as a whole.

Two articles in the Nineteenth Century on "The Defence of the Empire and the Militia Ballot," and "The Military Weakness of England and the Militia Ballot," from the pens of Sir G. S. Clarke and Mr. Sidney Low respectively, are devoted to showing that we must either limit our Empire or else increase our army. Without a form of conscription the latter alternative cannot, so we are told, be attained; to attempt the former would be, it seems, to write "Ichabod" over the portals of our Empire. It is well to have the question aired thus early. Let the nation at large awake to the danger, which is truly an appalling one, and which, if realized, would put an intolerable burden on the manhood of our race.

The true source of strength in British rule is indicated by the eulogy pronounced on the Indian Civil Service at the Indian National Council held at Lucknow. We know how carefully that service is chosen, and how the people whose vast affairs it administers praise its uprightness and impartiality. This high standard may not be incompatible with certain cases of failure of justice; even the Indian Civil Service is not infallible, and all its members are not of an equally high character; but the people at home are thankful to know that it is appreciated by those whom it rules. We would rather our empire, all the world over, were dependent on justice than on the sword; indeed, the sword can never accomplish the end, and prudence, if there were no higher motive, would prompt us to be uniformly just and considerate.

The next meeting of the Bishops is fixed for the 16th and 17th inst., probably at the Church House. Very little improvement, if any, has taken place in the ecclesiastical affairs of the nation since their last meeting. Nothing has been really settled by the Archbishops' opinion, while the tension is still as acute in both contending parties. Recent appointments of some of the bishops show that there is no real disposition on their part to save the Protestantism of the country, notably the appointment of the chaplain of the Surrey County Asylum, Brookwood, a member of the E.C.U., to be Rural Dean of Woking. Loyal clergy of Woking have thus been passed over in favour of a pronounced Anti-Protestant. The people will be eager to know whether the Bishops will formulate any "forward movement" against those clergy who defy the Archbishops as to lights and incense.

The Duke of Newcastle is to introduce the deputation to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who will present the petition organized by the Church Review against the celebrated Lambeth opinion. The document contains the names of 14,000 lay communicants of the Church of England. Here we have a body of men in deliberate and unabashed revolt against the law of the Church, whose articles they profess to accept, and whose constitution they approve. The situation painfully indicates a resolute determination to resist archiepiscopal recommendations. The issue of this organized rebellion against authority may well be watched with considerable interest.

Dr. Horton, of Hampstead, in reviewing his twenty years' ministry, stated that he had grown to mistrust excitement and emotionalism in religion. It is well known that the late Mr. Moody—contrary to the idea of many who knew him and his work only superficially—always sternly repressed any tendency to give way to mere feeling at his meetings, and appealed to the common-sense convictions of his hearers rather than their sensibilities. Emotion, like the vapour of steam, needs to be carefully regulated and wisely guided in order to issue in efficient activity. Then it gives passion and power to conduct. The more we feel the power, and charm, and beauty, and awfulness of the Gospel, the better for us; the more we conserve our feelings, and turn the awakened energies of the soul into definite channels of service, the longer will our feelings last, and the more fruitful will be the results. Heart and will must work together, otherwise the life will soon be barren.

It often happens that men who seem to differ widely on controversial matters, when they can be brought face to face in friendly mood, find to their astonishment that they are not so far apart as they thought they were. In illustration of this, the Methodist Times gives an account of a recent private gathering at Oxford between five eminent Free Church theologians and five Evangelical Anglican Divines. The two most striking features of the conference were, first, the complete theological unity exhibited by the Free Church representatives; and secondly, that in reference to the question chiefly discussed, namely, the nature of sacrifice, the majority of the Anglicans were largely at one with the Free Churchmen. Is it not an unspeakable calamity that earnest men who are so far agreed on fundamental doctrines should be separated by so thin and yet so stubborn a partition-wall of ecclesiasticism, that practical reunion is still a remote consummation, however "devoutly to be wished"?

Dr. Stalker, who has made the life of our Saviour an almost special study, is of opinion that in the near future there will be a great battle around Him. In Germany even orthodox writers have "no hesitation in sacrificing a saying of Jesus as unauthentic when it does not agree with their own views." That is to say, have a theory of your own, and then reject everything that does not fit into it; and, of course, there may be as many theories as there are writers. One result will be that the theories will inevitably be mutually destructive. In the Contemporary, Dr. Stalker says:

It is more than possible that within the next decade the Gospels may be issued from the press in all the colours of the rainbow to indicate the different documents of which they are composed, as is happening to the books of the Old Testament at the present hour. The materials already exist in abundance for such an effort, and only a bold hand is required to appropriate them. The total result of the critical processes, as they are usually applied on the Continent, is undoubtedly to attenuate the figure of Christ. His mightiest works and grandest sayings are taken from Him, and what is left reduces Him to a size very different from that in which He appears to the faith of the Church.

There is a brief sentence in an address on the "Vicarious Sacrifice of Christ," spoken by the late Dr. Cairns, which deserves constant remembrance by all Christian workers:

The great centre of life is still the Cross, and the same banner floats above every successful Revival and every advance in the mission field.

We believe that there are signs that the churches are becoming increasingly conscious of their need of the Cross as the centre of life; and certain it is that thoughtful men are more and more impressed with the fact that if we are to have aggressive power at home and abroad, we can have it only through and by the Cross. Christians themselves must abide in Christ crucified and risen, and must preach Him as the one and only Saviour of sinners.

We have frequently urged the establishment of a Council of Conciliation fully empowered to deal judicially with questions affecting Capital and Labour. A recent Report from the Board of Trade on strikes and lock-outs in 1898 materially strengthens the position, as it shows that in the twelve months in question no fewer than 714 disputes took those forms, 253,997 persons having been concerned in them, at a cost of the loss of 15,289,478 working days. Even if a large proportion of the disputes had not been settled in favour of the employers, it would be none the less evident that it would be very much to the advantage of the working classes if these unhappy conflicts could be obviated by the adoption of a wise and Christian method of dealing with the questions which now provoke them.

It is stated that at a recent Civil Service examination for girl clerkships, there were no fewer than 352 candidates for ten vacancies, and that at a previous one for women clerkships, 452 presented themselves for seventy openings. What, therefore, must the competition be where a difficult educational examination is not involved? It is at least unfortunate that, in face of this condition of the labour market, girls are unwilling to accept positions in families in which their comfort and happiness would be regarded, and the remuneration for which would at least be equal to that which is attached to the other coveted and frequently overworked positions.

We are sometimes told that large fortunes are not made nowadays. But it appears that in 1898 seven men died worth more than a million each (in one case it was nearly three millions), eleven worth between half a million and a million each, and nine worth between four hundred thousand and five hundred thousand pounds each. The richest of the number was a brewer. These facts and the high rate of wages, together with the enormous trade returns, prove conclusively that this is a money-making age, in our country at least. Out of this abundance come many of our greatest religious difficulties. Men are absorbed in things temporal; they oppress others to enrich themselves; they provoke emulation; and out of envy and jealousy spring a harvest of sins. The solemn, oft-repeated warnings of Scripture against the love of money were never more necessary than now.

The seven-day newspaper in America stays because it pays, and it pays because Christians advertise in it—so it is affirmed. If they withdrew their advertisements, something might be done. We fancy that this would be the difficulty in this country also. Representatives of both the journals that offended here for awhile have said that there was money in the venture, and therefore we can hardly count ourselves safe, unless Christians should be ready to make a stand and separate themselves. Separation, we imagine, will become a vital question for the Church in the not distant future. Testimony for our Master and his Truth is wanted, and it is not easy to see how we can give it while the world and the Church are so intimately blended.

Mr. D. E. Tobias, himself a negro, has contributed to the Nineteenth Century a striking article on "The Position of the Negro in America," and in it pays a high tribute to the Northern Christians and philanthropists, who have not only given millions of money to educate the coloured race, but also thousands of noble-hearted white men and women, who have gone South, and lived among, and taught, and preached to the coloured races.

But he draws a somewhat painful picture of the present position of the Negro, despite the proclamation of freedom and equality, and adds that it is no exaggeration to say that "missionaries in heathen countries have never been treated as these Northern missionaries have been in the South." In face of this, however, Mr. Tobias is hopeful:—

The race problem is being simplified day by day. . . . . There are more than 30,000 young negro men and women who have graduated from splendid institutions of learning, and they are now at work endeavouring to elevate others of the race, morally and religiously, and industrially; and, with the aid which lovers of humanity will continue to give, the issue is sure.

To enthusiasts in foreign missions the name of Dr. Griffith John, L.M.S., is a synonym for whole-hearted consecration to the service of Christ in China. He reports splendid prospects for mission work in Yochou, in Hunan. On four previous occasions, Dr. John sought to establish a mission in this ripe field for harvesting, but on the first and second occasions he was "pelted out" by an infuriated mob. On the third effort he was carried in and out of the place in a Sedan chair, and nothing was organized. Now all opposition seems to have been dissipated. He writes:—

As to houses, we found the people not only willing but extremely anxious to sell. More than twenty offers were definitely made, and we went to see more than ten. We succeeded at last in fixing upon one of the best sites of the place, on which are two houses.

An eminent Continental Roman Catholic is reported to have said that many English Roman Catholics are Protestants at heart; and the suggestion has just received a fresh illustration. A few years ago an article in one of our reviews by the eminent Catholic scientist, Professor St. George Mivart, was placed on the "Index," and so denounced as heretical. On certain express conditions, and out of respect for the Pope, Dr. Mivart accepted the decree. In this month's Fortnightly Review, however, he thus recants his retractation:

I am now free so to act, since, in August last, I wrote to Cardinal Steinhuber, S. J. (Prefect of the Sacred Congregation of the "Index"), to say that since my article had been freshly placed on the "Index" (in a new edition of that publication), if I did not receive answers to certain questions I should feel compelled to withdraw my submission. The reply I received did not answer those questions, and my submission is withdrawn accordingly.

As the right of "private reason" is absolutely forbidden in the Church of Rome against its authoritative decree, this attitude is a distinct rebellion against the authority of that Church. Whether the Sacred Congregation of the "Index" will now excommunicate the English professor, remains to be seen.

The London Council for the Promotion of Public Morality propose to hold their first public meeting, in St. Martin's Town Hall, on February 1. The Bishop of London will take the chair. Mr. A. H. Asquith, M.P., Sir Edward Clarke, and Mr. J. Compton Rickett will also take part. The Society has been formed for the purpose of combining efforts made throughout London by different organizations to combat certain social evils which have reached serious magnitude. The treasurer is Lord Kinnaird. The Council already consists of 100 members. The secretary is Mr. Fox Butlin, and the offices are at 37, Norfolk Street, Strand, W.C.

The Background of Life.

By Rev. F. B. MEYER, B.A.

"For my Name's sake" (Rev. ii. 3).

THERE is a clear distinction between a background and a foreground. In a landscape you have the road, the meadow, the flowers, the copse by the river; and beyond, the chalet, with children's voices, and women going about their work, and men labouring in the garden—all this is foreground. But beyond, bounding the horizon, rise the mighty hills, holding commerce with the skies, swathed in clouds, and sending streams into the valleys—this is the background. The foreground alone is thin and meagre; the background alone is dim and indistinct. Put the two together, and each has depth, meaning, and interest to the other. The villager, as he works upon his little patch, realizes, however feebly, the grandeur and impressiveness which the mountain range gives to the minutest detail.

It is thus with human life. Each of us has a foreground, the details with which we are daily concerned, the work we do, the words we speak, our domestic and business engagements; but to all these there should be the background—the great truths we hold, the vows of consecration we have made, the hopes we cherish, our sense of God and eternity. How meagre and commonplace life is without the sanctions of these imperial thoughts, but how sublime become the minutest when set back in the embrace of the background of God's everlasting hills!

To many men home is the background. Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton tells us of the impression produced upon him by a visit to the Gurneys, of Earlham—the home-life of that delightful family group, their morning rambles in the park, their afternoon excursions to distant spots, and their evenings of simple family joy. The memory of this home was an incentive to him afterwards at Dublin, elevating and purifying his existence.

The background of our brave soldiers in Africa is the thought of Great Britain with all her myriad life, from the dear ones of their households to Her Majesty on the throne. The thought of this dignifies the details of the camp.

The background for other men is a great purpose. The lawyer anticipates the time when he will sit upon the woolsack, the employé hopes for the time to come when he shall be the head of the home; the scion of a ducal house hopes that one day his bust may stand in Westminster Hall; the philanthropist consecrates himself to a great mission for the emancipation of the down-trodden. And just as the purpose of taking a distant journey gives meaning and dignity to all the incidents that take place en route—the conversations with your fellow passengers, the glimpses of scenery, and the details of eating and sleeping—so gives new meaning to its commonplaces. The mountains of the background lift the plain in their arms.

But the background which is within reach of all of us is a greater one than any of these, and speaks to us from those words of the risen Lord, "Thou hast patience, and didst bear for my Name's sake, and hast not grown weary."

I. The background of the life of Jesus Christ was his desire to glorify his Father's character. As a boy in the Temple he caught sight of the distant hills in the background, when he talked about his Father's business. As his public ministry opened, He told us that the first petition in every prayer should be to hallow the Father's name. When He drew near to his death the cross stood at the end of the vista. He had but one prayer—that his Father's name should be glorified at whatever expense to Himself; and when He approached the gate of Gethsemane, it was his consolation that He had made known the Father's Name, to those who had been specially given Him to train, with the infinite tenderness and watchfulness of a shepherd's heart.

To the ordinary gaze, watching only the foreground of the Saviour's life, it may not have seemed very significant or important. The son of a carpenter making articles of furniture for the villagers of Nazareth, sitting with the rest of the men in the village synagogue whilst his mother sat with the women apart, pursuing his way through Galilee with the train of poor and sick people, educating a number of humble fishermen, unrecognised by the State or Church of his time—the foreground of his life seemed

MEAGRE AND ATTENUATED INDEED.

But behind all that was the constant recognition of God his Father. This was the background of his strong and lovely life.

II. The background of the life of these Ephesian Christians was their thought for the Name and character of their Lord. Ephesus was one of the most brilliant cities of the world, lying in the focus of two continents; it was the resort of travellers, sightseers, business men, of rank, fashion, and wealth. Here a little church of believers had been mustered, under the successive ministries of Apollos, of Priscilla and Aquila, of the Apostle Paul, who spent three years there; and of John the Divine. It had been exposed to great but these were not by any means the worst foes with which it had to contend. Men who called themselves apostles, but were not, had intruded into their ranks; evil men and seducers had come to them in sheep's clothing, but had been proved to be ravening wolves; the Nicolaitans had taught the doctrine of Balaam, and had sought to make the worship of God consist with lascivious lusts. These internal evils had been more trying than the external brunt of suffering; but the little handful of believers had borne with patience, and not grown weary, because from the hills of God, which were veiled by mist from ordinary gaze, but which to them stood out clear and apparent, there came a wind, as from glacier snows, bearing upon it, "For my Name's sake!"

Judged by the foreground merely, there was very little in the lives of these people to excite the interest of onlookers. A handful of slaves, mechanics, artisans; not many wise, or mighty, or noble, just a collection of commonplace ordinary, people; but how much dignity and sublimity become theirs when we remember that this foreground was combined with the sublime background of the risen Christ, and that they endured as seeing Him who is invisible!

III. The background for our own life is the thought of Jesus Christ, and the appeal of the simple words, "For my Name's sake." Be sure not to live in the foreground only, but day by day lift up your eyes unto the hills; for as the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so is God round about his people. Take the motto, "For my Name's sake," as your watch-word for the New Year; frame it, hang it in your room, where you will constantly receive its warning and inspiration.

The man of business comes home at night sorely tempted to make money by some sleight-of-hand. To-morrow he must give a decision. Living in the foreground of the present only, he is strongly tempted to sell his soul; but when he thinks in the quiet evening of the unseen and eternal—when his Master Christ appeals to him for his Name's sake—when he puts the eternal against the temporal, the unseen against the seen—he dares not swerve from the path of strict integrity, and resolves

RATHER TO BE POOR THAN SIN.

The sufferer, whether from external trial or from the fretting yoke of some perpetual pain, is inclined to give up heart and hope, and to faint under the chastening of God. This is largely due to considering the foreground only; but when he remembers that it is "for his Name's sake," who endured the cross, despising the shame, when he realizes the eternal weight of glory and the afterward, when the background looms in sight, the suffering seems endurable, the pain even light.

The tempted is near being overcome if he looks only upon the foreground with the pleasure of immediate indulgence; but when, like Joseph, he catches sight of God, the fascinations of evil have lost their power.

"Thou hast not grown weary," the Master said. It is in the mid-passage of life that we get most weary, weary with the burden of responsibility, with the constant strife against circumstances, with the struggle for daily bread, with the unlessening brunt of evil. The Christian worker is sometimes sorely tempted to give all up: "Why should I not take life more easily?" he says. Nor would he be able to endure unless he could view the summits of the hills, and see eternity breaking with the roseate hues of dawn, the first gleam of that eternal life which shall more than compensate for all. Look up to thy background:

> And in the glimmering limit far withdrawn,
> God makes Himself an awful rose of dawn.

Something Between.

'Twas but a rush of service,
Making the heart rejoice;
But there was danger ever
Of missing the Master's voice.
Oh! to know more of his presence sweet,
Spending more time at the Saviour's feet,
Learning to be like Him.

'Twas but a prayer unanswered,
Had it been laid in vain
At the feet of Him who bade me
Plead it in Jesus' name?
Oh! to be willing to leave it there,
And, when the waiting is hard to bear,
Casting the care on Him.

'Twas but a sharp word spoken,
Thoughtlessly giving pain,
And 'twas hard not to answer
Hastily back again.
Oh! to know more of restraining grace,
Putting myself in another's place.
Oh, to be more like Him!

'Twas but a disappointment,
But from the heart it tore
All that was planned for service,
Leaving a blank before.
Oh! to know more of a trustful rest,
Knowing, not hoping, it will be best
Leaving it all with Him.

'Twas but—yes, always something
Tempting the heart away;
Small, but how hard to conquer,
Coming anew each day.
Oh! to walk constantly in the light,
Knowing it's "not by power nor might."
But that it's all through Him.

Suggestive Readings.

THE BACKGROUND OF SCRIPTURE.—II.

AFTER giving his disciples many instructions concerning the kingdom, Jesus taught them to pray. And as the Beatitudes and the instructions are all painted in the bright and beautiful colours of heaven upon the dark background of the prince of this world and the power of darkness, so this model of all prayer is throughout in allusive contrast to the condition of man, as perverted and spoiled by the Old Serpent, the Devil, and Satan.

Our Father who art in heaven.—We who had become, by faith in his lie, children of the wicked one, repudiate our father the Devil, are born again by faith in God, and yield to the love, and claim the protection, of our Father in heaven. (See Isa. lxiii. 7-16.)

Hallowed be thy Name.—We had dishonoured it by listening to the slanderer. "Yea, hath God said? . . . Ye shall not surely die. . . . God doth know that ye shall be as gods." But we cast off the works of darkness. "Other lords have had dominion over us; Thee and thy Name henceforth will we celebrate." "So shall they fear the Name of Jehovah from the west, and his glory from the rising of the sun."

Thy Kingdom come.—Let the reign of God overthrow and supersede the mischievous and tyrannical predominance of the god of this world, the father of lies, the prince of the power of the air, the ruler of the wicked spirits in heavenly places.

Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.—We have been led captive by the Devil at his will, and our own will has been yielded to the spirit which now worketh in the children of disobedience. Keep us free from this evil bondage. We present our bodies to Thee, a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is our reasonable service, that we may not be conformed to this world, but transfigured by the renewing of our minds, that we may prove what is that holy and acceptable and perfect will of God.

Give us this day our daily bread.—At the bidding of thine enemy, and ours, we snatched at the forbidden fruit, to our shame and sorrow, and proved it apples of Sodom, that turned to ashes in our mouth. Now we turn to Thee, to feed our spirit and soul and body with food convenient for us; with angels' food, with bread of heaven, the bread of life, the bread of God.

And forgive us our debts, as we have forgiven our debtors.—In thine exceeding grace, Thou forgavest us all trespasses when we came to Thee at the first, and cast all our sins behind thy back. Our Lord has paid the ransom price, not to the Devil, but to Him that sitteth upon the throne. Now, forgive us our trespasses, as we have forgiven them that trespass against us. Forgive us our five-hundred talent debt, as we forgave our fellow-servant his debt of a hundred pence. Satan cannot forgive, neither can he be forgiven.

And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the Evil One.—Thou didst declare our Lord Jesus to be the beloved Son in whom Thou art well pleased. The prince of this world came and had nothing in Him. He could be led into temptation: yea, He was driven by the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the Devil. And He overcame him by the word of his testimony, and by the blood of his cross. But we have a traitor within. We cannot say, "The prince of this world hath nothing in me." Therefore, lead not us into temptation, but deliver us from the Evil One (Matt. vi. 13, R.V.).

For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory.—The usurper has never had a righteous claim to his ill-gotten and ill-used predominance. By right of creation, by right of righteous government, the kingdom, the power, and the glory, were thine from the eternal past, and are thine for the eternal future. Amen. M.

South Africa.

THERE have been many good men in South Africa, who have been misunderstood at home, and recalled when good work was being done. One of these was the Rev. John Mackenzie, of the London Missionary Society. The following are a few extracts from his "Austral Africa; Losing it or Ruling it." (2 vols. 8vo. Sampson Low, 1887.)

CHAPTER VIII.—The Transvaal struggle for supremacy in South Africa. The delegates in England in 1883-1884.

It was not easy for those who had confidently expected to secure for the Transvaal the leading place in South Africa to have to be content with less than a secondary position.

The delegates' denial of slavery was met by the secretary of the Aborigines Protection Society, who brought forward some awkward testimony of recent date. But what was equally to the point was the suggestion in an evening paper that President Kruger should for ever silence his calumniators by demanding a Commission of Inquiry, which would be authorized to take evidence within and around the Transvaal as they might see fit. This challenge the delegates took good care not to accept.

They freely called names, and tried to lead off public opinion on side issues; but their opponents kept to the main question, and pressed it calmly and without any bitterness: Was the Transvaal to be the future dominant political power in South Africa—to the prejudice of the Cape Colony and of the whole of South Africa, as well as to the detriment of England? The reluctance of the Transvaal Deputation, therefore, to give up its ambitious schemes, only led to the greater study of the question on the part of the English people, and to a firmer and more intelligent resolution than had ever been entertained before to act the part, as well as reap the benefits, of the Supreme Power in South Africa.

English people came to understand the question, and there was no difference of opinion on two points—that supremacy in South Africa was at stake, and that England, not the Transvaal, must exercise it."

The purpose for which these extracts are made is to show that the real question between these contending Powers was thus distinctly stated more than a dozen years ago, and was not originated by the ill-starred Jameson raid four years ago.

There has been from the beginning much mistake and inconsistency, much blundering and vacillation, much culpable governmental ignorance of the condition and trend of things in South Africa, which is becoming daily manifest. But it behoves us as Christians, not unfairly or with exaggeration to befoul our own nest. Those who desire to inform themselves of the events which were leading up to the present position, from the pen of a man of God who, had he been supported instead of hindered, would have done much to prevent this war, may read it in these important volumes, which have a pathetic interest in the fact that the esteemed and beloved author died a year ago.

Postal Employes in South America.—Letters have been received from Mr. and Mrs. Harrison, who some time since went to Buenos Ayres to undertake work among postal employés. They have started a monthly Gospel paper in connection with the work, and from Chili and Venezuela, as well as Buenos Ayres itself, have received earnest requests for supplies. In view of the interest in religious questions which is displayed in the South American continent, it is felt that the dissemination at this time of Gospel truth is a matter of considerable importance. The hon. treasurer is Mrs. C. T. Smith, 35, Eltham Road, Lee, London, S.E.

Soldiers in South Africa.

Cape Town and Wynberg.

IT will interest friends in England to know what is being done for the troops in South Africa at this time. Miss Huskisson, who has had a Home for men in Capetown for some time, and who has recently made a special point of reaching soldiers and sailors, is at work amongst the troops in a temporary camp at Green Point, a suburb of Capetown. She has a splendid marquee pitched right amongst the men, which is used as a Soldiers' Home, as well as for meetings.

Coming to the work of the South Africa General Mission, we must first mention Mr. Smyth, who has charge of the Maritzburg Home. He went to the front with the men, and we recently heard from a friend who had received a letter from Mr. Smyth before he was shut up in Ladysmith with the troops. In this letter he described his opportunities of talking to the wounded and dying on the battle-field: one whole night seems to have been thus spent, and Mr. Smyth had to feel his way in the darkness from man to man,

AS THEIR LIFE WAS SLOWLY EBBING AWAY.

In the docks at Capetown, Mr. Harrell, the worker in charge of our Sailors' Rest, has been more than busy amongst the troops as they land. Local friends have supplied us with tens of thousands of sheets of notepaper and envelopes, and gross upon gross of pencils. These we distribute amongst the men, so that they may send a line or two home before entraining for the front. There is usually a great crush to get hold of the paper, and the men give us to friends in the Old Country. This work fills up the time of two men and one lady worker, to say nothing of the rush of work in our headquarters office in stamping thousands of letters, seeing to postage, money orders, registered letters, &c.

The two workers in charge of the Capetown and Wynberg Homes—Mr. Percy Huskisson and Mr. Darroll—have gone up to Orange River. They passed through De Aar, where they had a short time of fellowship with Mr. and Mrs. Osborn-Howe, and then went forward. The officers have been most kind to them, and our friends write full of praise for the splendid openings they have amongst the men. The work is chiefly personal, and they have many small meetings in the tents with groups of men. Numbers of gospels, tracts, &c., have been distributed thus at the front, and the men read them eagerly.

At Wynberg our Soldiers' Home is in full swing. It is well filled at night by men from the Army Medical Corps, as Wynberg is the base hospital. Starting with the New Year we opened our large hall and headquarters building in Capetown as a soldiers' home, which is to form the headquarters for our soldiers' work. It is interesting to know that several Dutchmen who have been blessed in our work at Johannesburg are seeking to do work for Christ amongst the Dutch troops, though quite on their own account. At our Johannesburg Book Room we were able to sell a very large quantity of Dutch Bibles, Testaments, Hymn Books, tracts, etc., to local Dutch ministers, who wanted them for use amongst their own people during the war.

Reports of the work being done amongst the soldiers by the S. A. General Mission will be seen month by month in the pages of the South African Pioneer.

At De Aar.

May I convey our thanks to those who have kindly helped us with gifts of literature for the troops at the front? It is impossible at this time to communicate with them individually, but they may be assured that the best use is being made of what they have sent. The marked Testaments lie by many a cot in the wards of the base hospital. Smaller Testaments and Gospels are hidden away in khaki tunics, and carried by the wearers to the front.

Train-loads of troops, passing through northward daily, generally halt at De Aar for an hour or two. After their two days' journey through the burning karoo, refreshment for the body is most gratefully received by the men, and the precious opportunity is used for giving away literature to individuals or into each compartment.

As the Guards passed through, many copies of the "Springing Well" were distributed. The eagerness with which hands were outstretched for them was remarkable. Not many days later, scores of these men were in eternity.

A young Christian belonging to the Naval Brigade, stole away during the halt to our little prayer-meeting. All were impressed by his brightness and spirituality. In the terrible fight that soon followed, he fell. An officer who was shot at his side knew him, and offered him a stimulant. "Thank you, sir; no," he replied, "I am going to Jesus and to glory."

God has greatly blessed our Camp Soldiers' Home at De Aar as a means of reaching thousands who remain at the base for a week or weeks. Mr. Howe started it with an empty hand, and to-day, five weeks later, he finds £432 has been taken in soldiers' money for refreshments and writing materials. We have no paid helpers—most of them are members of the Railway Mission; and yet, since what is supplied to the soldier is at the lowest possible charge, the expenses connected with the purchase of marquees, with equipment for Gospel meetings, cannot be covered apart from outside help.

The work has extended to two other camps, and we are now on our way to open a Camp Home at the base of the third column under General Gatacre—who favours the project. We have the earnest co-operation of Rev. David Russell and some Christian friends at Capetown, who have formed themselves into a small committee to aid work such as this among the troops now in South Africa.

(Mrs.) M. S. Osborn-Howe.

Things Japanese.

By Rev. Geo. C. Needham.

We would not for one brief moment seek to divert attention from the fields of war which burden English hearts at the present, yet we plead for a share in their sympathetic intercession for that land of crises—Japan.

The bright hope which had been enkindled regarding the practical working of the new national laws in their relation to mission schools has been sadly blighted. Missionaries are expecting a change in the attitude of the Department of Education, as many Japanese in high places have fully expressed their sympathy towards Christian missions. But as yet there are no indications of a modification.

Christian instruction having been restricted by the law forbidding religious teaching in the schools, the Buddhists are emboldened to agitate for State recognition. Large sums of money have been collected for lobbying purposes. Five hundred priests are delegated to each House to besiege members of the Diet for their influence. Buddhists and Shintoists deem it an opportune time to strike at Christianity.

Meantime, evangelistic work goes on with most encouraging results. The Word is preached in remote parts of the Empire, and in the Hokkaido (the most northern section) new churches are springing up and Sunday-school interests are steadily increasing.

Another source of encouragement comes from a greater demand for the Scriptures. Sales have largely increased. A brother missionary has attempted this work on the trains with surprising results. Since July he sold 16,000 portions, Testaments, and Bibles. The new laws of extra territoriality have quickened the desire for English studies. This also has fallen out for the furtherance of the Gospel. Hundreds of Japanese are now procuring copies of our English Scriptures. Within half a year more than 500 Bibles and 1,800 Testaments have been purchased. Quite recently there have been 700 applications for price-lists.

A good and great woman has been called home—Mrs. H. L. Pierson—who for thirty years wrought assiduously for the conversion of the Japanese. An early pioneer, in company with other godly women, she founded a large school in Yokohama, with its training home for Bible women. It was my privilege frequently to address her large band of native teachers, who for many years were her co-workers in evangelism. They were well taught in the doctrines of Grace, in the practical tenets of our Faith, in the blessed expectation of our returning King, and in the absolute necessity of personal and social purity.

At this crisis in her national life, Japan should be remembered by all the praying people of God. Both foreign and native Christians would welcome good Bible books, and any whose libraries are too crowded with choice works of a deeply spiritual nature will find a ready field for them by mailing, paying full postage, to Rev. H. Loomis, Bible House, Yokohama. He will place them where they will be appreciated. Alas! alas! as I write the dread tidings come that our life-long friend, D. L. Moody, has gone from our circle. The cable will announce to you this sad news. Only a few hours since, a letter from his home reached me full of hope. And now he has fallen asleep. "At home with the Lord."

The Y.W.C.A.

Friends of the World's Young Women's Christian Association will be glad to hear of the development of the Association in Alexandria. At this time last year the committee had under consideration the possibility of not renewing the lease of the flat. An appeal was made for a worker and for funds. Both were soon provided, and there has been no want during the whole year. Miss Rose Johnstone has opened a small Home in the flat, and a library and a reading-room in an adjoining flat. A resident near Alexandria is able to offer daily help, which Miss Johnstone's ill-health makes very necessary this winter. Friends visiting Alexandria are asked to go and see the work.

A local secular paper publishes the following:—"The Y.W.C.A. has made great strides in Alexandria of late, and bids fair to be one of our most useful organizations. No better thing could have happened to it than to obtain the services of Miss Rose Johnstone. All who knew Miss Johnstone felt that if she could be led to undertake the charge of its interests a new life would be imparted to all its work, and already, in the short time she has superintended, a transformation has been effected. An additional house has been taken, with large rooms, for the use of members, and membership is a very simple affair, neither difficult nor costly. The nucleus of a good library has been formed, and a warm welcome is given to all who may drop in for friendly counsel or advice."

GIRLS AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

At the request of the English National Committee of the International Union of Friends of Young Women and of the World's Young Women's Christian Association, we are venturing to ask you to make known a great need in regard to the approaching Exhibition in Paris.

Numbers of English girls will arrive there in charge of the various English exhibits, and many more, alas! will arrive with no such occupation, but merely in search of it; we also hear of hundreds being required as waitresses. We must fully face the dangers and perils to which they are necessarily exposed at such a time.

At the last Paris Exhibition, a home (under our auspices) for English girls employed there was not only very useful but much appreciated. It is now proposed to join in a large scheme for which arrangements are being made by the Paris Committee of the International Union, under the wise and experienced guidance of Madame Fisch, Mdlle. Sarah Monod, and others. They have secured a fine building, not far from the Exhibition, as a kind of Central Institute, and in addition to this there will be different houses secured in the immediate neighbourhood, where each nationality will have bedroom accommodation, and where a lady superintendent will take charge, making the house a "home" in the highest and best sense of the word. A most experienced and devoted English lady, long resident in Paris, has generously acceded to our request to "mother" the British Home. Of course the proper charge for accommodation will be made.

The sum of 6,000f. (£240) is required at once for the British share (as the rents must begin from January), which sum includes the cost of furnishing bedrooms; but it is at present impossible to tell what the total amount needed will be—it cannot be less than £500 or £600, and may be more.

The need for such a Home is very great; the dangers without it are untold! We would entreat all who have influence among English girls to warn them against visiting Paris without a certainty of proper employment. Meanwhile, we earnestly appeal to the generosity of your readers to help in providing a safe abode, more than ever necessary this year, in the great city of Paris, for the many girls arriving alone and friendless on an occasion like that of the coming Exhibition.

Lucy J. Tritton,
President World's Y.W.C.A, and British National Council of International Union.
Mary F. Harrowby,
International Union, Great Britain.

The offices of the World's Y.W.C.A. are at 26, George Street, Hanover Square, W.

A special gathering was held at the Glasgow Y.W.C.A. on New Year's Day. The president, Mrs. Mirlees, after referring to the absence of the secretary, Mrs. Oatts, gave an address, in which she reviewed some of the social developments and scientific advances of the present century. The speaker added some helpful words on "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." Miss Grierson, from Jaffa, gave an account of a Christmas Day in the schools in that town; and, after tea, Miss Jane Haig gave an historical lecture.

Hammersmith Association (Wycombe House, 11, The Grove) is able to report a forward movement in connection with the various works of the Asssociation. The Sunday Afternoon Bible Class has shown a steady increase, and a greater interest is displayed in the study of the Word of God. The Gospel services continue to be held on Sunday evenings, and it is a cause of much thankfulness to record that from time to time testimony is received of the good done by the preaching of the Gospel to those who seldom or ever attend a church or chapel.

The annual report of the Aberdeen Association is a handsome booklet, giving a terse review of good work. The membership has increased in the Bible classes, and devotional meetings are, on the whole, well attended. The evangelistic work is an important section, open-air meetings held in various parts of the city being largely attended. The Lodging-House Mission Band conducts services on Sunday evenings in the corporation lodging-house. The Missionary Band has an active membership of thirty. The quarterly letter to missionaries in the field has been continued throughout the year. Tract distribution and house-to-house visitation have also been steadily carried on.

The National Refuges.—The New Year's gathering of the staff of the National Refuges and training ships Arethusa and Chichester took place on the 4th inst. at the Society's headquarters, 164, Shaftesbury Avenue. The address was delivered by Rev. A. J. Poynder. Mr. W. E. Hubbard presided, and many of the Homes of the Society were represented. Mr. H. Bristow Wallen, secretary, Mr. Henry G. Copeland, finance and deputation secretary, and others, took part in the proceedings.

Torre Annunziata Seamen's Mission.—This work, for British seamen and the mission ship St. Paul, is conducted on undenominational and temperance principles. The object is to promote the social, moral, and spiritual well-being of seamen. The first annual report has just been issued, in which the story of the beginnings of this work is simply and impressively told. It has had much to contend with, but notwithstanding seems to have gained a footing and to be making headway. Copies of the report, with other information, may be had of the superintendent, Mr. Stephen Burrowes, 7 Vico 2o del Piliero, Naples; or Rev. D. M. Cameron, 515, Wandsworth Road, London, S.W.

SUNDAY, January 14. Job xii.

HERE is the eternal mystery which has perplexed all the ages, that a just and perfect man should be a laughing-stock, that a praying man should be left in the hands of Satan, while the tents of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God are secure.

Job, however, seems near the true solution when, in the 9th verse, he says that the hand of the Lord has wrought these varieties of the human condition. For with Him is counsel and understanding, wisdom and might. God's absolute sovereignty is the only solution, whether He breaks down or shuts up, whether He withholds the waters or sends them out, whether He spoils counsellors or looseth the bonds of kings.

But whilst every thoughtful man is driven to this, the Christian believes that the Sovereign of the Universe has a father's heart, and that He has a reason for every sorrow He permits, and an alleviation. In regard to alleviation, I saw the other day a tender, moving sight, which helped me. I was visiting an estate where men are being redeemed by work and Christian counsel. They were sowing 6,000 young fruit trees, which were carefully tied each to a stake, in order to support the fragile things against the winter winds. I pitied them as they were caught and bound, as it were, to a cross. But I noticed, to my great comfort, that in each case the men put a piece of flannelette around the tender bark that it might not be abrased by rubbing against the stake; and I thought that wherever our cross frets us most, God would be careful to insert some alleviation or mitigation of our pain. Always a "Thus far and no farther."

A man in sore straits may seem to talk unwisely and against reason. These are but the cryings of a child—

> Crying in the night,
> Crying for the light,
> And with no language but a cry.

Bear with him. Do not reproach, or rebuke. Do not enter into long arguments. This is not the time. Some day God wil say, "Let us reason together." In the meanwhile, let him pour out his soul. It is better for this fever to be out than in. In hours of pain those friends help us most who sit beside us holding our hand, and saying as little as possible.

One cannot wonder at Job resenting the words of his friends, the more so as they seemed to be dislocating and distorting religious arguments to serve their own purpose. Only genuine religion can make a man a true comforter, and the genuineness of his religion is sorely tested at such a time. God grant that when we go forth on errands of consolation our memorable sayings may not be proverbs of ashes, nor our defences those of clay (v. 12. R.V.).

The 15th verse is a marvellous blending of two opposite poles. Deep down in his soul the sufferer has resolved that he will trust God. Isaac will look beyond the knife raised in the air for the death-stroke to the father's face bending over him. It is easy to trust when a summer sky is over us, but faith only becomes strong when the winter wind screams through the rigging and not a star shows itself in the murky night. Then is the time not to think of God's words, promises, or past dealings only, but to trust Him. "I cannot understand, but I will trust." But this attitude is not inconsistent with the desire of the saint to maintain his cause—humbly, with due reverence and meekness.

TUESDAY, January 16. Job. xiv.

The brevity of life is the theme of this matchless psalm. The fading flower which the scythe has cut down with the grass; the shadows of the clouds which pass across the hills; the dwindling brook; the drying river—such are the emblems. Even the tree will sprout from the root, following the scent of water, but after the stroke of Death's swinging axe man revives not again. These images are, of course, true only of man's physical life, and we must remember that, in common with all the ancients, Job had the most hazy conception of a life elsewhere. It was only when Jesus brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel that men were able to stand on the border line between the two worlds, and weigh affliction in one hand and the weight of glory in the other.

We should not read such a chapter as this over those who have died in Christ, except by way of contrast with the triumphal outburst of the New Testament—"In my Father's house are many mansions. . . I will come again and receive you to myself." Or, "The Lord shall descend from heaven with a shout . . so shall we ever be with the Lord."

WEDNESDAY, January 17. Job xv.

From hints and suggestions, as they enter on their new cycle of argument, Job's friends proceed to direct charges and accusations. Rather than sacrifice their own standpoint of associating sin and suffering, they set themselves to accuse their friend of hiding his sins from them, and they proceed to remonstrate with him for posing as a righteous man. He must be a sinner, or their precious system will be upset, and they would rather the character of their friend suffered than their system. Their want of love was probably the surest sign that they were wrong, and he right. Whenever a system of theology and a church association is deficient in the love of 1 Cor. xiii., you may be sure that it is not built on the truth of God.

Whilst Job rightly refused to admit that he was a sinner above all others, since he was an especial sufferer, he could not know, as indeed none of us can, how very far short he had come of God's perfect standard. We have sometimes seen photographs of the huge blocks of stone at Baalbec, quarried, but never carried to their place in some disused palace or temple; and the photographer has ingeniously stationed against them a man, that we might be the better able to measure their enormous bulk. In the same way (in vv. 15-16) Eliphaz puts an angel against the burning purity of God, and lo! he waxes dim; the gaslight casts a shadow as the electric light rises behind it. And if an angel's nature is not able to satisfy the lofty demands of Divine purity, how much less can mortal man!

Let us put to ourselves some of the questions here suggested. Are we deficient in the fear of God? Do we restrain our prayer before Him? Do our lips condemn us? If so, let us seek to be forgiven and restored.

THURSDAY, January 18. Job xvi.

Human comforters cannot help us very far. Sometimes they provoke rather than help. I was told once that a minister who had lost his wife received a large number of letters and visits, none of which seemed to touch his case, and his soul was like to cry with Job, "Miserable comforters are ye all." Then another minister who had lost his wife some few months before called, sent up his card, entered his friend's study, put his hand on his brother's hand, and sat perfectly still for some five or ten minutes, and then left without saying a word. But that visit was the one thing which brought comfort to that desolate heart.

The most terrible thing to bear is the fear that God has forsaken the soul, and will be favourable no more. It is not permitted to many to know the darkness of this soul anguish, but wherever it is experienced, the sufferer may know that there is nothing beyond, nothing to be feared. Why such experiences are permitted we dare not conjecture, but we know that in some way they are requisite to the development of the soul. It would seem as though God, who had bestowed upon us gifts without number, expressions of his love and good-will, feared that we should rest too much upon these of which we were so sensible, and drift from Himself. Not unfrequently, therefore, He deprives the soul of the conscious enjoyment of his presence that He may lead it to love Him for Himself, and to trust Him in the darkest midnight.

In this connection it is very beautiful to see that, in his anguish of soul, Job still believes that his witness is in Heaven, and that there is One on high who will vouch for him. A man may forego friends and comfort, and all beside, if he knows that God is working for him.

The patriarch's sorrow waxes more acute. To think that there is no hope in this world makes him long for death. His spirit is consumed, his days are past, his purposes are broken off. He says to corruption, "Thou art my father," and to the worm, "Thou art my mother." Amid such a whirlwind of trouble, there is but one course open—the righteous must hold on his way, and keep his hands clean (9).

Not unfrequently I have been appealed to by those who have lost their faith. It may be that what they thought to be their faith was only the reflection of the faith of others, and they must find a faith of their own. Sometimes the paralysis has come from some nervous and physical shock. Not unseldom young people are disturbed by the questions which are being raised so widely and constantly about Inspiration and the foundations of faith. In all such cases it is my habit to bid them live up to all they know to be right. Let such hold on their way, and, above all, keep their hearts and hands clean. There is only one solution to much of the difficulty through which the soul passes, namely, for God to look in at the window, and, by one glance of his eyes, banish doubt. But in order to get that, the life must face towards Him, and the windows must be kept clean. He that is righteous with his fellow-man is on the way to the full vision. He that will do His will shall know of the doctrine. He that is of the truth recognises the voice of the King of Truth. If you cannot pray, or delight in the fellowship of God's people, or speak as you used, still hold on your way, and do as you did in the moments of your fullest credence, and the light will dawn again. Let us follow on to know the Lord. His coming is prepared as the morning.

SATURDAY, January 20. Job xviii.

Bildad answers Job with great severity, and describes the fate of the wicked man. He uses all sorts of metaphors to describe the waning of his hope, the bitterness of his destruction. It is altogether too bad and unjust. Job might well cry out against the wrong that was being perpetrated on him.

The ancients had a very distinct belief in the punishment which befel sin. No doubt it is far worse than any of us dream. The direst emblems of suffering are none too great to disclose the fate of those who in sinning against God destroy themselves. This note is almost entirely wanting in modern preaching. The ministers of God's Word vie with each other in proclaiming his love. They forget that God does not hesitate to appeal to fear, and some of the most startling revivals have ensued upon the plain declaration of the inevitable woe which must follow disobedience. Who that has read them can ever forget Baxter's "Call to the Unconverted," or Jonathan Edwards's "Sinners in the Hands of an angry God"?

This, too, was an element in the revival work of the fifties of this century. As a boy I can well remember the deep impression made on me by a sermon from Brownlow North in St. James's Hall, when he described, in vivid and terrible words, the fate of Dives in hell. We need to know the terror of God ourselves that we may be able to present it to our fellows as a powerful persuasive that they should be reconciled with Him. The doom of sin cannot be otherwise than terrible, when one counts up the enormous cost to which God has gone to deliver us from it. A great Atonement implies great sin, and this involves a great penalty.

Human Documents.

GENERAL BOOTH'S "Darkest England" scheme is but one branch of the world-wide enterprise out of which it has grown; and the summary of the work for 1899 forms a striking testimony to the development of the various agencies of the Salvation Army amongst the lost, the hopeless, and the fallen. Last year over two million and a half of meals were supplied at cheap food depôts, at prices varying from one farthing to fourpence; 1,650,116 lodgings were provided, at a cost to the lodgers of one penny to six-pence per night; £33,609 was received for food and clothing; 12,307 applications from the workless were registered at the labour bureaux; 2,210 persons were received into the Salvation Army's factories or "elevators"; employment found for 12,461.

Six hundred and five ex-criminals have passed through the homes, and have been restored to friends or sent to situations; inquiries were made for 2,744 missing persons, of whom 1,093 were found; and 2,129 women and girls were admitted to the Rescue Homes, of whom 1,823 were either placed in a position of earning a virtuous livelihood or restored to friends.

The Rescue Homes are situated as near to the poor and despairing as possible, and all too sad are the stories told by the inmates of these institutions of characters lost, lives blighted and robbed of all that is good, noble, and Christian. No form of depravity, however, is too deep for the vigilant and arduous workers of the Army to deal with; and the propagation of the Gospel with loving urgency amongst the churchless and Christless crowds of the metropolis has been blessed to thousands of perishing souls.

It is good news to learn that the Farm Colony at Hadleigh is largely self-supporting, the produce realizing £10,000, while the brick-making carried on has produced a sum of £7,833.

The scheme was advanced with hopes that are being realized in a wonderfully encouraging manner, and the report of last year's work will doubtless prove a helpful stimulus and inspiration to those who pray and labour to open the hearts of the friendless to the love of the Friend above all others.

DARE-DEVIL NELL.

Here is a sample of what a loving and affectionate nature can be transformed into by the lack of a common mother love such as is the birthright and heritage even of animals. Surely poor, desolate little Nell never thought that one day she would earn the name of Dare-Devil Nell? She is also a type of what the law failed to do in the way of reformation. We are glad that this sad story has a good ending, and that the "soft spot" in poor Nell's sin-seared soul was found at last.

* * * *

"Well! What now?"

"Mother's funny. Gone off a little, I think. Hev ye noticed?"

"Say out what ye're meanin', Dick."

"That letter she had las' night. She's just acted luny ever since. Got somethin' up her sleeve she's after she don't want us to know."

Nell, a slim girl of nearly seventeen, gazed down at her brother as he rubbed up an extra polish on two rather dilapidated shoes.

"Thought so myself," she responded briefly. "Don't s'pose it's any good she's up to if she's hidin' it from us."

"Have an eye on her, Nell; I'm certain sure she means mischief."

Mrs. Tarbutt, it may be seen, was not a mother who looked after her offspring, but a wandering and somewhat irresponsible individual, devoid of true maternal instinct, whose son and daughter had done their ignorant best to look after her since their father's death.

The worst they feared was a specially bad outbreak of drunkenness, during which it would be needful to mount guard over the clock, the fender, and Dad's old arm-chair, possessions which had a glittering fascination for Mrs. Tarbutt during her occasional hilarities.

An hour later Dick flung back the door and entered breathless.

"She's off, Nell, clean gone! You'd ought to ha' got hold o' that letter, Nell. Old Dubbins told me she was along there this afternoon with a bundle, an' she showed 'em a letter, where it said somebody had died, Cardiff way, and there was money for her if she could prove she was the true an' lawful widdy o' James Tarbutt."

"She'll come back all right," said Nell hopefully, who loved this mother of hers; "she've never gone clean off before. I s'pose we two can keep going. 'Taint no good looking for her. If she gets that money we shall see her back all serene; an' if not, she'll tramp home at her case, I expect."

But she did not. Nell, at work in her lozenge factory, and Dick on the canal, did their best to keep a respectable front to the world, but Mrs. Tarbutt never reappeared.

Then came a sorry day for Nell. Dick had been towing a barge, had slipped through a temporary bridge, and been DROWNED IN THE FOUL WATER BELOW.

"'Tisn't no good to try an' live on with no folks belongin' to me," said Nell to herself after the dismal funeral was over. "It's the loneliest world as ever was made. You've got to have somebody if you're happy, an' I ain't got nobody."

"Yes, you have," said a neighbour to whom she confided her desolateness, "if you think it's worth while goin' to 'em. Old Dubbins has heard from your mother, and she's married again and living at Y——."

"My mother!" cried Nell excitedly. "Oh, why wasn't I told? I shall be off to her at once. So I have a mother after all!"

Getting all the directions she could, Nell sold her few belongings and tramped off to the distant town, presenting herself with sure expectation of welcome. What was her bitter disappointment to be asked what she had come for, and to be told to go off and and seek a place for herself, as there would be no home for her there!

A male lodger of her mother's was present at the scene, and, following the heart-broken girl, he told her that in a public-house to which he often went they needed a servant. Nell dried her eyes, went after the place, and secured it.

They were kind to her in a rough way, especially an old sea-captain, who often dropped in. "Might give that there girl o'yourn a outin', an' cheer her up a bit," he remarked to the landlady. "I'll take her to hear a concert if so be as you'll let her come one evening."

Poor innocent lassie! She was plunged that night into a sink of nameless horrors, and the morning gave her a bitter awakening.

"And I've always been respectable before," she sobbed to herself as she watched her opportunity of slipping into the public-house unseen. "I can't face nobody any more; I'll just get my clothes an' make off where folk ain't never laid eyes on me."

In her desperation she seized five shillings bar money which lay on a shelf, made up a tiny bundle, and stole out again unperceived.

Then follows the sad history of her downward career—drink, jail, jail, drink, year in and year out, until at last in her degradation she was led into "the street called Straight," and "for more than twelve months now has been living in the city of Salvation, giving the earnest of a new life of usefulness, and labouring hard to repair the breaches in her own character." Surely there is joy in heaven over the reclamation of this "sheep that was lost." The Report, which is profusely illustrated and replete with most interesting reading, may be had at Headquarters, 101, Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

Stratford Conference Hall.

THE work at Stratford Conference Hall has recently been taken in hand by Mr. Wm. Ross, for some years secretary of the Derby Y.M.C.A. Mr. Ross comes with hearty benedictions from his important Midland sphere, as he enters upon the manifold labours of Mr. Fox Butlin, which have for a long period been as unremitting as they have been devoted, and true to spiritual ends. The Y.M.C.A. connected with the Hall has hitherto been instrumental of great good, the Sunday afternoon Bible Class being a model organization in many ways.

On Thursday last Mr. Ross was formally welcomed, or recognised, at Stratford. Illness prevented the attendance of Sir George Williams, and bereavement hindered Mr. A. Boake from being present. The prevailing influenza also weakened the platform, as, consequent upon a severe attack, Rev. Alex. Jeffrey was regretfully absent. The chair was occupied by Dr. Barnardo, and among those who spoke were Archdeacon Stevens, Mr. W. Hind-Smith, and Mr. C. Boardman. Words of sincere welcome to the new secretary were followed with timely counsels to the members and helpers. Mr. and Mrs. Baker, the blind singers, were present, and rendered duets in the course of the evening.

Seamen's Christian Friend Society.

THE special gatherings of seamen at this Society's Headquarters, London Dock, E., on New Year's Eve and New Year's Day will long be remembered, not only for the large numbers attending, but for the spiritual results following them. Mr. George Lampard, L.C.C., presided at the New Year's gathering. The foreign seamen were addressed in German, Swedish, and Dutch by various friends, and the British paid rapt attention to brief Gospel addresses from Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Maynard, Mr. W. H. Seagram, Rev. John Wilson, of Woolwich, Rev. G. J. Hill, and others, and the addresses were interspersed with sacred choruses, solos, &c.

During the evening, in the absence, through illness, of Mr. R. C. Morgan, a marble tablet in memory of the late Mrs. Hill was unveiled by Mrs. Maynard, of Wimbledon, who made tender and touching reference to her long acquaintance with the deceased and her high esteem of her character and work. The tablet bears the following inscription:—"Sacred to the memory of Emily Hill, wife of Rev. G. J. Hill, and 'the Sailor's Friend,' who entered the Father's House July 12, 1899, aged fifty-three. This tablet is erected by fellow-labourers and friends at headquarters and coast stations, in loving remembrance of her thirty-three years' fruitful service for Christ, and noble efforts towards securing this freehold Chapel and Institute for the use of seamen and the glory of God. 'For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain.'"

It was stated that, as more had been received than the cost of the tablet, the balance would be handed to the Society in aid of the "Emily Hill Memorial Fund" of £3,000, which the committee are now endeavouring to raise. Mr. W. H. Seagram conducted the closing meetings, at which a number of seamen were led to the Saviour.

The Great Awakening of 1740.

Jonathan Parsons.

By Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

IN the history of "the great awakening," few men, apart from the leaders, are so attractive in character and labours as Jonathan Parsons, of Lyme, Connecticut, and afterwards of Newburyport, Massachusetts. He was a graduate of Yale College, and in less than six months after taking his first degree he was invited "to preach as a probationer for settlement." The settlement was not quickly effected, because of some difficulties in the young man's mind with regard to the validity of Presbyterial ordination; but in March, 1731, a year after his first visit to Lyme, he was ordained, and took for his rule "the general platform of the Gospel." The population of his parish was "about 768 souls."

In the summer following there was, in his belief, a great effusion of the Holy Spirit upon the people. There was uncommon attention to the preaching of the Word, a disposition to receive advice, and a remarkable concern about salvation. Youth and middle-age were asking the question, "What must I do to be saved?" He urged them very much to good works, and gave it as his opinion that such awakened souls ought to attend the Lord's Supper, advice much like Wesley's in his early years before he found liberty of soul in the Aldersgate Street meeting. In less than ten months fifty-two persons were added to the church; several whole families were baptized; and many of the young turned their meetings for mirth into meetings for prayer, conference, and reading books of piety. Yet, later on, he did not think that many had been truly converted.

Owing to some changes that took place in his views three years after his ordination, he told his people that conversions could not be reckoned by additions to church membership, and that outward profession and a negative blamelessness were not sufficient EVIDENCE OF REGENERATION.

In other words, he removed the emphasis from things external to things internal, from the form to the life. This his people called censoriousness, and then quarrelled with his doctrine for some time, till he was, he says, "awfully deserted of God, and got into a very dull, legal frame himself; and then some were better pleased."

This time of trying and winnowing must have continued for several years; but in 1740, when revivals were springing up simultaneously in various parts of New England, it pleased God to strengthen and enlarge his desires after the increase of Christ's kingdom, and to stir him up to "more ardent endeavours after the eternal welfare of immortal souls." The news of Whitefield's rising up with great zeal for holiness and souls had a great influence upon his mind. Accounts of Whitefield's labours were sent to him by Dr. Colman, one of those strong and influential ministers in Boston who did so much to give reputation and power to the Evangelical movement. He also went to hear Whitefield himself. The good impressions made upon his own mind he quickly communicated to others, and thus helped to prepare the way for a change. Nor were his people unreceptive.

At last he preached from Isa. lx. 8: "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?" His object was to correct mistakes about that was going forward, but it was not lacking in direct personal application, and was attended with happy results. "A deep and general concern upon the minds of the assembly discovered itself at that time in plentiful weeping, sighs, and sobs." Many testified that they had never before had such "an awakened sense" of the danger of putting off the concern of their souls to a future season. Then Gilbert Tennent came with that strange ministry of his, which seemed to do little good at the time, but so much afterwards. One of his sermons, preached near Lyme, was heard by several members of Parsons' congregation, none of whom seemed to be blessed at the time, but some were very much enraged with the preacher afterwards. One man especially could not bear the sermon; it was "so censorious." He could not drive it from his mind, but talked against it incessantly, till finally he was made to see that "he was the very man to whose case it was suited, above any sermon that ever he had heard." Now the people began to FLY AS A CLOUD.

Sabbaths alone would not suffice for hearing sermons; the request was made for lectures in houses and in the church during the week. An evening lecture he had set up the winter before in a private house, for the sake of a young man who was a cripple, though at first "exceeding thin"—only seven persons besides the family—was now greatly increased, and, in about a month, grew to several hundreds, so that he was obliged to turn it into a "public evening lecture." It is pretty evident, though he does not say so, that many of these hearers came from adjoining parishes.

At this time it pleased God to encourage his heart, to give him unusual freedom, and to grant him such vigorous health that he could go through three times the service he had formerly rendered; he says he was able to study and write three sermons a week, and preach several others of his old notes, for he seldom in all the time preached without writing.

He was discovering that with the quickening of the heart there comes also a stirring of every power of body and soul, and that the apparently unattainable is reached. Now also invitations began to come to him for services beyond his parish, and he gladly consented to do what he could. But his heart burned with love to, and pity for, the people of his peculiar charge, for whom he was

ABUNDANT IN LABOURS.

During one month he preached and exhorted publicly, and from house to house, about six times a week, besides attending upon distressed souls upon certain appointed days in his study. And though he spoke to them with unusual moderation, both in his study and in his sermons, that he might the more clearly present the truth to their minds, and they more clearly discern it, yet he was constantly compelled to make pauses of considerable length, and entreat them to restrain their feelings. Afterwards he doubted whether he had not done wrong in asking for this self-restraint, for the pains they took to check expressions of emotion was a greater hindrance to their hearing than their outcries were. Sometimes as many as thirty persons, or more, would come to his study in a day, and for a month he could not remember preaching a sermon which was without the manifest blessing of God. Practically it continued the same during the summer.

The intense feeling was not one exclusively of alarm and anxiety; in a daily increasing number of cases it was a feeling of joy and comfort, an overwhelming sense of the love of God seen under "high discoveries of God reconciled in Christ;" with not a few it was concern for

THE SALVATION OF OTHERS.

He declares, as to the thoroughness and efficiency of the work, that he believes the people advanced more in their acquaintance with the Scriptures, and a true doctrinal understanding of the operations of the Holy Spirit in conviction, regeneration, and sanctification, in six months' time than they had done in the whole of his preceding nine years' ministry. "Love to God and man, with their genuine fruits, were increasing. Rough and haughty minds became peaceful, gentle, and easy to be entreated. Lowliness, long-suffering, forbearance, a courteous deportment, beneficence, and tender-heartedness, meekness and moderation, to all appearance seemed to increase abundantly. And to all these there was observed a delight in Christian fellowship, in breaking of bread, and in prayer." It is well to remember that all this occurred in a parish of 800 souls, where there was only one church and one minister. Similar work in every parish in the land would regenerate a whole nation. Though the converts were chiefly from among the youth, three or four were upwards of fifty, two near seventy, and one ninety-three years of age. In nine months 150 members were added to the church. And still the work advanced!

Writing about it fifty-four years ago, Mr. Joseph Tracy makes some observations which are, perhaps, more apposite in 1900 than they were in 1845. He says: "It would scarce be possible on one of the congregations of the present day. The pulpit has laboured so long, and so powerfully, to give all our religious thoughts a practical direction; to engage us in plans for accomplishing appreciable good here on earth; and we have been so thoroughly taught to expend our sensibilities in action for the good of others, that we should need a long and laborious training to make us capable of such engrossing contemplation of objects purely spiritual. Whether we are, on the whole, the worse or the better Christians for the change, is a question not to be answered hastily. There can be no doubt that we are better than they for certain uses, and perhaps we should be better still if we had occasional seasons of contemplation and feeling more like theirs." For "perhaps" we would substitute "certainly." An outside life of activity leads, unless sustained by a life of meditation and prayer, to thinness, feebleness, and ineffectiveness. If "a drawn well never runs dry," an over-drawn one will.

Parsons preached a sermon on Titus ii. 8: "That he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you," which he entitled "A Needful Caution in a Critical Day," for the purpose of his people against the dangers of the revival. The sermon is a model of good sense and spiritual understanding, and useful for almost all times, though he is too strong on the ministerial prerogative. He was one of those modest men who quickly see their mistakes and confess them, and who did not a little to save the movement from extravagances and consequent censure.

His life, labours, and influence, passed into the great stream of the religious life of the times. He was the beloved and trusted friend of the most conspicuous leaders, and gave them through all his years a loyal and generous support. Into his hospitable house at Newbury-Port, to which place he removed from Lyme, George Whitefield was received on Saturday night, September 29, 1770, very tired and very unwell. When, early on Sunday morning, the alarm was raised that Whitefield was dying, Parsons came to his aid, and saw him die. In front of Parsons' pulpit the great evangelist was buried, and Parsons preached the first of the many funeral sermons for him that were preached in America and in this country.

Under the church of Federal Street,
Under the tread of its Sabbath feet,
Walled about by its basement stones,
Lie the marvellous preacher's bones.

Long shall the traveller strain his eye
From the railroad car, as it plunges by,
And the vanishing town behind him search
For the slender spire of the Whitefield Church.

Still, as the gem of its civic crown,
Precious beyond the world's renown,
His memory hallows the ancient town.

If not in Jonathan Parsons' house, where the marvellous preacher died, then close to it, was Lloyd Garrison, the anti-slavery leader, born.

The Clergy and the War.

DEAR SIR,—Freethinkers often charge the clergy with being indifferent to, if not promoters of, the terrible evil of war. As a matter of fact, as long as party politics divide men, there will be difference of opinion amongst the clergy, as well as others, as to the expediency of war. Fortunately, however, we very seldom find so full a justification for the above charge as in a sermon preached by Rev. Canon Carmichael, of the Church of Ireland, last November. That sermon, which is "published by request," I now have before me.

Briefly the arguments are as follows:—War is not evil, but a "mixture of good and evil." "The Bible hardly seems to see any evil in war at all," and the Old Testament wars and battles are set forth, and Saul's suicide referred to as a deed of bravery and honour. "Nor is the New Testament far behind in this respect. The Lord Jesus never says a word against war. John the Baptist gives advice to soldiers, but never condemns their profession. St. Paul revels in military phrases." The history of the world is full of wars; "then must war be congenial to the mind of God in his evolution of humanity. What does God care for death?

WHAT DOES GOD CARE FOR PAIN?

Many good people go into hysterics about the horrors of war. . . . But all such talk is artificial. Just as horrible things are happening every day around us. The soldier who is killed in battle might, had he stayed at home, have died of some horrible disease." War "purges men of the poison of prolonged peace—the hateful selfishness of a smug security, the quiet fostering of the love of money, the multiplying of worthless lives." "The death of battle is swift and merciful. No long, wasting, hideous agony, as of cancer. 'But what of the soldier's soul?' it may be said. 'He may not be prepared to die.' It is in the hands of the God who made it, and who is responsible for it to his own eternal verities." "To suppress war is impossible; to do so we must get rid of its causes—human nature, and the conditions of society in which God has placed us."

I think a child could answer these arguments. Though war is, at the outset, stated to be a mixture of good and evil, no evils are admitted in the argument. They are shown to be "good," or are called "hysterics," and "artificial." The difference between the spirit of the Old Testament and that of the New is ignored. Our Lord is cited as not opposed to war, our Lord—the Prince of Peace—at whose birth the message was "Peace on earth, goodwill to men": and whose teaching was "Love your enemies," "Blessed are the peacemakers," "Peace I leave with you," and who forbade Peter to appeal to force, saying, "Put up again thy sword into his place: for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." St. Paul is referred to as revelling in military terms—St. Paul who took care to add "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal' but spiritual." "From whence come wars' and fighting among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?"

The history of the world is full of wars. It is also full of frauds, and drunkenness, and murders, and sin of every kind; therefore, these things are right and good and part of God's plans! This seems to be the Canon's argument.

Again, because we have diseases and accidents at home, let us add to the causes of death by fightings and war! As a matter of fact, change of climate, food, habits, work, &c., often bring on an epidemic amongst soldiers at the front, and in some of our former campaigns more men have died of sickness than from weapons of war. Death in war is "swift and merciful." Perhaps it is, in the case of one man out of ten. But there are from four to ten men wounded to every one who is killed; and of those killed, I suppose the majority have at least some hours of suffering to undergo before they expire.

As to the soldier's soul, the phrase, "God is responsible for it to his own eternal verities," may or may not be true; for it either means nothing at all, or it means just what the writer or the reader chooses to make it mean. If it does mean anything, it does away with all human responsibility in the matter of our eternal destiny, and makes the Atonement a useless and unmeaning thing.

It may, indeed, be that to abolish war is impossible. It is also impossible to abolish poverty, pain, and crime; but none the less is it our duty to lessen and restrain these evils as much as possible; and during the present century a large number of international disputes have been adjusted by arbitration which otherwise would have resulted in war. This, according to Canon Carmichael's reasoning, must be a real misfortune. Indeed, the logical and natural conclusion of his whole argument is that the best thing that could happen to the human race is for everyone to commit suicide.

That God does and will bring good out of war, and out of every kind of evil, is certain; for all things work together for good to them that love God. The greatest blessing that man is capable of receiving has come from the greatest crime man is capable of committing—salvation through the death of Christ; but none the less was that death a crime in all those who took part in it.—I am, yours truly, Ritualists and Schools.

A QUESTION FOR FREE CHURCH COUNCILS.

SIR,—In a recent issue, I noticed in your "Notes and Comments" the warning you gave with regard to the teaching given in public schools. I fear it is almost too late now for much to be done. I have been watching in this direction for years, and find that, as far as I can ascertain, the Ritualists have succeeded in putting teachers holding their views at the head of nearly every educational establishment of any importance, for girls as well as boys.

In the city from which I write, the High School for girls, which was started mainly by money from Nonconformists, under later management is tending in this direction, although the school is called undenominational. Through the schools the Ritualists hope to influence the next generation of statesmen by imbuing them with popish ideas. They are "wiser in their generation than the children of light." They have already almost all the village education in their hands; so that, if something is not done to check them soon, the country will be ripe for the reintroduction of popery.

It would be well if some of the "Twentieth Century Funds" were used to build and carry on schools in the villages instead of building churches, or soon there will be no worshippers to fill the latter. How can the children of Dissenters, being obliged to attend the Ritualistic shools, where they are taught that it is a sin to enter a Dissenting place of worship, and "that their parents are going to hell," be expected to attend Dissenting churches when they are built?

When visiting a village in Yorkshire I was told that the Evangelical cause was dying out there, as the children rarely came back to worship with their parents after being trained in the Church schools. No one objected to their being taught there so long as they were taught the truth; but it is different now. It is long since the ritualists have captured most, if not all, of the girls' schools in Brighton, so that it is difficult for parents to find any school where they can be sure of the teaching. The Ritualist party is so subtle and underhand in its methods, and is everywhere trying to get hold of the young. I am told that the tactics pursued (really borrowed from Rome) are the same as in France. This is a matter which should primarily engage the attention of the Free Church Council, as even in the Board Schools the Ritualists are endeavouring to introduce their teaching, and the Board of Education does not seem to interfere. While the churches are sleeping, the enemy is sowing a plentiful crop of tares.—Yours, E. M

Industrial Missions.

THE directors of the Industrial Missions' Aid Society report that, notwithstanding the many difficulties necessarily attending the inauguration of a new society, and a certain amount of, perhaps not unnatural, prejudice against the somewhat experimental character of the work proposed, they have, nevertheless, received such encouragement both at home and from the mission field, that they feel confident a large and useful work lies before the Society.

At Cawnpore the Society has been the means of raising £1,200 for the Girls' High Schools, which belong to the Methodist Episcopal Church of America Mission, and produce a substantial income. The money has been advanced on loan for five years at 5 per cent. in order to pay off a mortgage held by a bank at a much higher rate of interest. The advance has been amply secured by a first charge on all the school property.

A carpet industry has been opened at Ahmednagar, the first of a series it is proposed to start in different parts of India. A missionary pointed out to one of the directors of the Society who visited India last year, the opportunity Ahmednagar presented for the establishment of a mission industry, and invited the Society to commence operations there at once, promising the hearty co-operation of his mission; also undertaking, if a factory were started, to supply in a very short time about a hundred trained hands from amongst the youths who are taught carpet-making in the technical school of the mission. For convenience, a small company was registered under the title of the INDIAN MISSION INDUSTRIES.

Limited, to carry on carpet-making and other industries in India, as an auxiliary to mission work. The factory will be a great boon to the mission, as there has hitherto been no opening for the hands trained in the school, owing to there being no carpet factory in the neighbourhood.

At Sharanpur, Nasik, an arrangement has been come to with the C.M.S., whereby the industrial work—chiefly carpentry—which has for some few years been carried on at Sharanpur will be taken over by the Indian Mission Industries, who will furnish the necessary capital for developing the industry. An experienced European mechanic (who has had a previous acquaintance with India as a missionary) will be sent out immediately as the representative of the company to take charge of the movement, of which Bishop Peel warmly approves. At Aligarh, N.W.P., India, capital has been provided, and advanced to Rev. J. C. Lawson, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who is commencing industrial work at Aligarh. The amount has been amply secured by a first mortgage on the mission property.

Now that initial difficulties have been surmounted, and as continually increasing interest is shown in the Society's work, it is confidently expected that, under Divine guidance and blessing, the future working of the Society will be of constantly increasing usefulness. The late Mr. F. W. Crossley provided the whole of the initial expenses, and, up to the time of his decease, financed the Society; no appeal, therefore, was made for funds. Since his death, however, this has become necessary. The secretary is Mr. W. H. J. Hatch, 10, Paternoster Row, E.C.

Ringwood.—The opening of St. Ives Gospel Hall, is the result of united effort of the various Christian workers, who, though representing different church governments, are unanimously agreed on the necessity of providing such a place of worship. The opening services recently held were attended with much success, and over £50 was subscribed towards the funds. The results of the efforts of those banded together have exceeded all expectation. The preaching of the Gospel at the hall will devolve chiefly upon working men, who will doubtless have the sympathy and help of all who labour along unsectarian lines. Sunday school work is to have a prominent part in the future of the Mission, the prospects of which are particularly favourable and encouraging.

The Late D. L. Moody.

FURTHER TRIBUTES AND TESTIMONIES.

AT length particulars have come to hand of the last days of Mr. Moody, and of the circumstances of his lamented death. The passing of his spirit to the rest beyond was as gentle as could have been wished. The family of the evangelist were gathered at his bedside, and the later hours of the departing saint were spent in comforting those around him. He knew that death was near; there was "no pain, no valley;" scenes of glory unfolded to the spiritual vision, as faith was consummated in sight in "the land that is very far off."

According to the Springfield Union, Drs. Wood and Scofield were among the witnesses of the final scene. Between some fainting spells Mr. Moody held converse with his family. On one occasion he remarked in a happy strain: "What's the matter? What's going on here?" One of the children replied: "Father, you haven't been quite so well, and so we came in to see you."

Among other things, addressing his sons, Mr. Moody said: "I have always been an ambitious man, not ambitious to lay up wealth, but to leave you work to do." He urged them to continue the work of the schools at East Northfield and Mount Hermon, and of the Bible Institute at Chicago. Mrs. A. P. Fitt, his daughter, remarked: "Father, we can't spare you." The reply, so characteristic of the man, was "I am not going to throw my life away. If God has more work for me to do, I'll not die."

At eight o'clock in the morning (December 22) Mr. Moody said: "I see earth receding; heaven is opening. God is calling me." Shortly afterwards he had entered upon what one of his sons described as "a triumphal march into heaven." Before noon, after a brief sleep, he entered into rest.

The death was not unexpected, although hope for his temporary recovery from illness was entertained, not only by friends at hand, but by those who had listened to his words and teachings on both continents.

The cause of death was general collapse, due to overwork. His constitution was that of an exceedingly strong man, but untiring labours had gradually undermined his vitality until the heart became affected. After his return from Kansas, medical diagnosis excited much alarm; and at length the labourer's task was o'er, and the servant was with his Lord.

On Sunday, December 24, the services at the Congregational Church, East Northfield, were conducted by Drs. C. I. Scofield and R. A. Torrey. Thanks were rendered to God for all that He had done by his servant, whose noble life was the subject of timely remarks, ever in chastened terms.

On page 24 we give an account of the funeral.

Dr. T. L. Cuyler.

Moody's death is the greatest blow the religious forces could have received. The Church has sustained a terrible loss.

From Dr. De Witt Talmage.

I consider the death of Mr. Moody the greatest possible calamity. He represented the purest evangelism, and was a great power for good in every way. He always had access to the eyes and ears of the entire community.

Moody did his work and completed it. Others will come forward and do their work. Men die, but the cause of righteousness will go right on to eternal triumph.

By Dr. J. Monro Gibson.

IT is nearly eight years since the Church catholic has suffered such a bereavement as this. Spurgeon on this side the sea, Moody on that, have stood out from their fellows as field-marshals of the army of the Lord. And now the younger of the two has followed his senior to higher service in another sphere. "The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away," and if we do not forget to lay due emphasis on the giving we shall be able to add, "Blessed be the name of the Lord."

For indeed this gift which has just been withdrawn was a very noble and a very needful one. It is difficult in all the complexity of forces in modern Christendom to measure individual contributions, especially in the case of men of far-reaching and varied influence; but there seems to be a general agreement among those in sympathy with evangelical truth that there is, probably, no man left whose life and work have been such a large factor in the history of the Kingdom of God as his whom now we mourn.

Mrs. Moody and Her Grandchildren.

That he sprang from the ranks of the people; that his nature was so rude and unpromising in the eyes of all who knew him in boyhood and youth; that he was without advantage of education or of culture; that in fact the vessel was so unmistakably earthen, and yet held such incomparable treasure—all this has only served to demonstrate that the excellency of the power has been of God and not at all of man.

"HE WAS A STRONG CHARACTER,"

you say. Certainly; but explain how that strength was so completely redeemed from all selfish uses and consecrated wholly to God and his fellow men. "He had great self-assertion." Yes; for the Kingdom, never for himself. Even on his natural self-assertiveness he had "Corban" written as plainly as on any other part of his many-sided nature. His self-assertion was part of his self-denial; his masterfulness was always in the Spirit, and for the ends of ministry; for, though he was a king of men, a born ruler of his fellows, he was as humble as a child.

He could not bear to hear himself commended. I remember on one occasion, when an injudicious brother fell into that vein, Moody sprang to his feet, stopped him, and intimated that the time was too precious to be wasted in that way. He must speak of the Master, not of the servant. And those of us who knew him intimately can testify that he was just as careful in private to avoid the subject.

Never, perhaps, was a man, judging by natural disposition, more likely to be spoiled by public recognition; never was man exposed to greater risk of spoiling; yet who can point to anything he ever said or did which showed a sign of it? One thing I must not leave out even in a brief notice—the great value of the example he has left of charity towards those who differed from him. Though a man not only of great heart and lofty and courageous spirit, but also of marvellous strength of mind and we cannot speak of him as holding the same high position in the matter of intellectual discrimination; but then he was great enough in all other respects to know and acknowledge his limitations here. He did not, as so many small men do, condemn those whom he could not understand. He had strong convictions, and held to them with great tenacity, and often used very strong language on subjects under controversy. But when he found good Christian men differing from him, even in matters on which he had thus strongly expressed himself, he did not conceitedly assume that he must of necessity be altogether right and they wholly wrong; still less did he condemn and denounce them. He not only recognized the presence and grace of the Spirit in men with whose intellectual position he could not sympathize, but he was noble and modest enough to keep an open mind for any new light there might be for him. He was not among those who supposed that the Spirit had said his last word to the Churches. So we find him not only a teacher and a preacher, but a learner and a listener, to the end. Oh, for the diffusion of that same spirit of

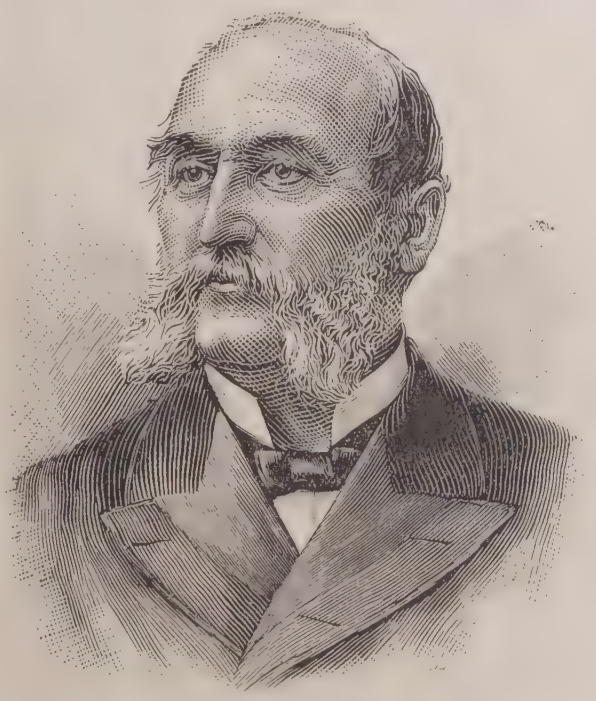
in all who bear the name of Christ, and especially in those who stand forth as champions of his Word of truth!

I have not written of his work, so vast and varied and penetrating; blessed be God for it all,—for all the streams of gracious influence which have flowed from the ever-springing fountain of that consecrated life. But, above all, we thank and bless our God for the witness of the life itself; lived in as fierce a light as beats on any throne, and without the corresponding shelter from criticism and cavil, yet kept unspotted from the world; a great heliograph for these times of ours of the mind of Christ. Blessed, ever blessed, be his name, by whose grace he was what he was in the face of the world, and is what he is before the face of God. May He who kindled that fire in the heart of our Elijah now gone from us, and kept it burning so many years, touch all our hearts with the same fire now; and call many a young Elisha to take up the prophet's mantle with a double portion of the Spirit, to be for light and leading and Spirit-power in the years to come.

By Mr. Wm. Fry, Dublin.

My acquaintance with our beloved departed friend dates from the year 1868, long before his name had become famous, as it afterwards did, throughout the English-speaking world. He was preaching in the Merrion Hall, and stayed with the late Mr. Henry Bewley at Willow Park, Dublin. It was the time of the



Mr. Ira D. Sankey.

"Believers' Meetings," and one of the delightful days at Willow Park was drawing to a close, when D. L. Moody, Henry Varley, Grattan Guinness, and a number of other brethren engaged in the Lord's work, withdrew to a large hay-loft for a season of special prayer, confession, and renewed consecration to the Master's service. It was a wonderful time of the Holy Spirit's presence and power, and Mr. Moody often spoke of the blessing received on that occasion.

The friendship which then commenced deepened and increased as the years passed, and I had opportunity of becoming more thoroughly acquainted with the transparent honesty of his aims, and his whole-hearted devotion to his Master's service. I have been with him in many of his missions in England, Ireland, and Scotland, at times when no buildings could be found large enough to contain the crowds that thronged to hear him, when the secular and religious press were eager to report his meetings, and thousands were converted under his preaching. Yet he thought nothing of himself, gladly giving all the glory to God alone. In fact, anything approaching to flattery was very distasteful to him. On a certain occasion, when some remarks of a complimentary nature were made to him by a well-known dignitary of the Church, Moody's reply was, "Well, sir, I believe I am the most over-rated man in Great Britain to-day!"

One never heard him speak of "my converts," or of numbers of conversions, for his object was the glory of God in the salvation of the perishing; and so he truly rejoiced when souls were brought to Christ, no matter who was the instrument used.

In his preaching he did not allow any mere worldly considerations to influence him. I have heard him speak to some of the highest in the land, as well as to the poor; but even in the presence of Royalty his message was the same as before any other audience, for he could say with truth, "I seek not yours, but you." And this with his intense earnestness, compelled the attention of his hearers to the great truths of the Gospel. With his whole heart and soul, both by word and example, he sought to promote the spiritual prosperity of God's people.

In the company of those like-minded with himself he was very happy and sociable; but I never knew him speak an unkind word of a fellow-Christian, or even allow anything of the kind in his presence. Wherever he travelled through the land he made many friends, but I never knew him to make a single enemy. Where differences or estrangements had come between Christians, I have known on several occasions how gladly he sought to be the peacemaker.

When last in London he had the highest medical advice, and was warned by the doctors to be careful on account of his heart, but he still continued his great work with unabated vigour. Personally, he was a strict tectotaler and never lost an opportunity of

ADVOCATING THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE.

In money matters he was most unselfish, and in his living very moderate, preferring the simple and plain food. He suffered much from seasickness, and probably this (considering its effect on the heart) was one of the reasons which kept him from visiting this country in recent years, though his interest in the work of God, and his affection for friends on this side of the Atlantic, never abated.

In his home life he was a devoted and loving husband and father, as well as a dutiful son to the dear old mother who finished her earthly pilgrimage but a short time before her son.

Mr. Moody, Daughter, and Grandchild.

Dr. C. H. Parkhurst, New York.

The secret of Mr. Moody's power and success lay, first of all, in his sterling good sense; second, in the thoroughness of his commitment to the service of his Divine Master.

He had no will but to do God's will, and God empowered him to do it right royally.

He has brightened and sweetened hundreds and thousands of lives.

By Lord Overtoun.

One day in 1873 I met Rev. Dr. Andrew Bonar in the street. We talked together of the daily prayer meeting then being held in Glasgow, and Dr. Bonar said, "I do not suppose it will get fresh life until Mr. Moody comes." This was the first time I had heard the name of our honoured friend, and I then learned of the beginning of his work in England; but I little thought that God was sending us a man who was to be the means of untold blessing to our country.

To know Mr. Moody was to love him, and to have known him intimately and worked with him, is a treasured memory and inspiration to everyone who had this privilege. I had the happiness of being in his inner circle, and working with him on each of his three visits to Scotland. During his first visit I was a member of his committee, and in his later visits, chairman. While I had the pleasure of working with him in London and Liverpool and many parts of Scotland, I, of course, had most to do with his Glasgow Campaign, and the hallowed associations of those times of blessing can never be forgotten.

THE SCOTTISH CAMPAIGN

of Messrs. Moody and Sankey began in Edinburgh, where, in the winter of 1873-74, their meetings were very widely blessed; a deep and genuine work of grace resulted, and the churches received much blessing. The notable movement in Edinburgh awoke the country, and, in many instances, a work of grace had begun before the evangelists reached the district. The Evangelical ministers throughout the country threw themselves into the work, and the churches all over the land received fresh impulse and life. Mr. Moody's work, especially in Scotland, has made preaching and praying much more direct, and has led thousands to love and study the Bible as they never did before. It has led the churches to fresh and successful efforts in aggressive work, and has thus done much to bring them together by united service in the great harvest-field, where earnest labourers lose sight of their minor differences in view of the mighty link which makes all one in Christ Jesus.

Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey arrived in Glasgow in the spring of 1874, and very soon the expected blessing came. The Evangelistic Committee then formed from all denominations of the Christian Church, arranged the Campaign, and for twenty-five years has continued it; so that now, as the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association, we are celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of Mr. Moody's visit by a Gospel Campaign on a larger scale than ever before attempted. Mr. Moody, in response to our invitation, greatly desired to come over and help us, but family bereavements and impaired strength—the result of his manifold labours—rendered his coming impossible; and now, while we are in the middle of the Campaign here, the sad tidings reach us that the loved friend to whom we all owe so much has been called to his rest and reward. Few have ever laid more and few ever received such a welcome in the "heavenly land" of which he so often spoke.

Space will not allow me to give in detail what I could tell of our honoured friend's character and work, nor the many instances that come to mind of what I saw and heard during these times of blessing. Mr. Moody was a born leader of men, and had the talent of discerning character in a wonderful way; as when, for instance, he selected James Scott, a young divinity student, to be secretary of the committee when he left, and everyone knows how splendidly James Scott justified his choice.

Mr. Moody's wonderful power of preaching and organizing were consecrated to the service of Christ and the winning of souls. Brought up among Unitarians, he early gave up their doctrines, and during all his life most eloquently pleaded the essential truths that circle round the Divine Saviour and his great atonement for the sins of men. Of course, such preaching and work as Mr. Moody's, which made great inroads on the kingdom of darkness, could not fail to rouse strong opposition in many quarters, and many, both in the churches and outside of them, objected to the singing and the preaching of the Gospel. But God set his seal unmistakably on Mr. Sankey's singing and Mr. Moody's preaching, and to-day thousands, both in heaven and on earth, bless God for sending his honoured servants to our islands. As of old, people said that it could not really do good to men to tell them that they would be saved by simply believing in Jesus, and that the doctrine of immediate salvation by faith in Christ was a dangerous one; but the quarrel of these objectors lay, not with Mr. Moody, but with all who preach the Gospel, for this doctrine of justification by faith inspired Luther to shake Europe, and is the theme of every evangelistic preacher, and the teaching of the inspired Word of God.

By Rev. G. Campbell Morgan.

The names of Moody and Northfield must always stand connected. There he first saw the light of day. There the schools that are now world-famous have their home. There also since 1880 have been held the Conferences that have become so great a force in the spiritual life of the world. They began in a very simple way, and have grown in numbers and interest up to that of last year, when the greatest of all, in point of numbers, was held. Over all these gatherings Mr. Moody has personally presided, save during his absence in this country on evangelistic campaigns. He has also organized them, and carried them on his heart as one of the most delightful burdens he has borne. It has been my lot to be present and take some part in the last four of these, and the privilege of doing so I shall always count as one of the greatest of my life.

The last was in very many ways a most remarkable and memorable one, and it is of that, in the light of the ascension of our beloved friend, that I want to write. Over the whole of the sessions there rested the shadow of the illness of little Irene, the beautiful child of his son, Will R. Moody. Yet that shadow was the background which served to throw into brighter relief many of the glorious lights of the Light in which we were gathered together.

Paul Moody met us at Northfield Station and drove us to our home. Mr. Moody at once came to see us. That conversation I shall not easily forget. He first told us of his sorrow about Irene, and we had some glimpse into that great heart. It was his own, the little one's pain (which he seemed to feel), and the anguish of his son's heart, which was very real to him. Then he spoke of the Conference, full of hope and confidence. Never had he felt greater joy or expectation. Past years' gatherings were sending their sheaves to this, and people were crowding in, and everywhere his keen ear caught the sound of the going in the tops of the mulberry trees. Then he spoke of our comfort. The rooms were to be arranged so as to make us feel at home. No detail escaped him; and, while his heart was full to overflowing of his own trouble, every little thing that concerned us was considered and attended to. The days moved on. Once he said to me that he had dreaded the burden of the meetings under the existing circumstances of sorrow, and God had just come in and taken all the burden off his shoulders, and he felt the work was going right on independently of him. Whenever he spoke the tenderness of his words told how full his heart was, and surely through that baptism of suffering the Father sent some of his choicest blessings to us.

The Conference closed on Sunday, August 20, and, on the following Tuesday, in the early hours of the morning, to use Mr. Moody's own beautiful words, "the chariot of God came down to the Connecticut valley and took our little Irene home." On the following day we committed the fair form of her earthly tabernacle to rest. What a funeral that was! Flowers were everywhere. Songs of triumph over death were sung. Every address had victory as its key-note, and most beautiful of all was that of Mr. Moody himself, closing with the words: "I thank God this morning for the hope of Immortality. I know I shall see her in the morning, more beautiful in her resurrection glory than she was here." That morning has dawned for him also, and surely he and Irene are together.

During the days following, he gave himself up with loving devotion to his son Will and his beloved wife. He sat with them, he drove with them, he mastered his own grief, and flung across their pathway the joyousness of his bright spirit. Then, as September came in, and of boys and girls, the Mount Hermon and Northfield students, gathered back, he opened his heart and took them all in, driving backwards and forwards between the two schools, with always a cheery word and some strong, practical, happy sentence of counsel for each of them.

At last, my work being done, and my extended tour beginning, I had to leave him, but I saw him again at Chicago, Boston, Brooklyn, and New York. How little I imagined these were the last occasions! How good God is to veil the future!

After visiting several places, I reached Chicago, and there I found him at the head of the forces, eager for the campaign. It was his old and earliest battle-ground, and he knew it and loved it well. And what a time it was, and how we all had to "move around!" Three centres, and three meetings a day. He was not a general directing others merely. He was himself busy from morn to night. Some days he took part in as many as six meetings. At last his voice gave way. He was announced to address the students at but could not speak. Nevertheless, he came to the meeting, and I had to speak. It was no easy task. A thousand students and the faculty were there to hear him. When I rose I told them they had only to look at Mr. Moody and then at me to know how impossible it was for me to fill his place. His ready humour helped me immediately, for he rose and stood by my side to emphasize the truth I had uttered. The effect was electric, and from that moment I had the attention and sympathy of the audience. That night he left for home.

I saw him next in Boston. Three days' meetings in the Tremont Temple he presided over. There I found his mind very much exercised about our war with the Boers. He could not understand it. Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., of Liverpool, was staying at the same hotel with us, and one evening, after the meeting, Mr. Moody got him to tell him the story of the Transvaal and of the causes leading to the war. He was intensely interested and deeply grieved at the conflict. My last days of work came

AT BROOKLYN AND NEW YORK.

In the former place the meetings were very large, and Mr. Moody came on from his home to help. He had another building, which, of course, was immediately filled to overflowing, and, when I went to New York for the last three days, he continued the work in Brooklyn.

During those days we stayed together at the Murray Hill Hotel. We had not very much time in each other's company, but the hours we had were full. I cannot write of them. We look back when loved ones have been gathered home, and see the signs to which we were quite blind till their departure. And so I feel to-day as I look back. Surely he was "like as a shock of corn—in its season." The fuller life, the new light, how manifest these were; yet we saw them not, or saw them only as those that do not apprehend quickly the significance of the King's portents.

My last vision of him is as he stands at the door of the hotel and waves us his farewell, having attended to the minutest matter that made for our comfort—God's gentleman in every fibre of his being. I shall see him next "at Home." Many men have loved him longer, none have loved him more than I.

By Dr. Wilbur Chapman.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, New York—intimately associated in work and joined in heart to the lamented evangelist—was interviewed just after the death by a correspondent of the New York Herald, who speaks of him as a "possible successor of Moody in evangelistic work." Among other things, Dr. Chapman said:—

"Mr. Moody was the most lovable man I ever knew, and, aside from my own father, he filled a larger place in my heart than any other man. His chief characteristic was his honesty. He was the most genuinely honest man I ever knew, and as sincere a man as ever lived. He had perfect confidence in the Word of God, and never took any stock in the so-called 'higher criticism.' The only time I ever saw him angry was when he was discussing the utterances of one of these critics.

"He could read a man through and through, and was as keen a judge of human nature as I ever saw. He believed thoroughly in prayer. I knew his secret Christian life, and I saw him before and after his sermons, and in times of perplexity, when as freely as my own children talk to me. He had perfect confidence. On one occasion he needed a sum of money—5,000 or 10,000 dols.—to complete the Mount Hermon School, and he sat down and wrote for the money to a man in a large city which I will not name. He knew that no human means would induce this man to give the money. Before sending the letter he took it to his chamber, placed it on a chair, and, kneeling, prayed over it as only Moody could pray.

"The letter reached the man at breakfast. He read it and threw it aside as preposterous. But there was something peculiar about it, and he read it again and a third time, and finally went to his library and wrote the cheque, sending it in a letter in which he explained the circumstances, and said he hastened to write before he went to his office, for fear he might change his mind.

"Mr. Moody practised what he preached. He never did a mean thing in his life, and if he injured another unwittingly he was the first to make it right.

"He asked a St. Louis man for money, and the men refused because he thought Mr. Moody did not say enough about of the Saviour. Mr. Moody went to Colorado Springs, and in preaching there he mentioned the incident, in touching on hobbies. He gave the man's name, and the papers made a sensation of it. The man wrote one or two sharp letters to Mr. Moody, but the latter saw it was not a matter to be explained in letters. He stopped in St. Louis on his way back, and held a meeting there.

"The man came, taking a seat in the rear of the auditorium. As soon as Mr. Moody saw him he called him to the platform and made an apology, saying he wished it to be as public as the words that had given the offence, though he had intended to give none. He had to raise 200,000dols. a year to carry on the Northfield schools and the work in Chicago. Men rarely refused his appeals. One man in the West who had never seen him told me it was a pleasure to give to him, because he believed Mr. Moody would spend the money more wisely than he himself could.

Mr. Moody's home life was heavenly. His boys and his daughter were literally devoted to him. He lived everything that he preached. His power of inspiring confidence and arousing respect was marked. I think this country has not produced a greater man than he. Some persons thought he was bluff and dictatorial, but he was no more so than any other great leader. He would have been great in any occupation.

"I think he had a premonition of the end, for the last time I saw him he talked of work which he wished to have carried on after he had gone, and said he did not know how much longer he would be here. He feared the result of the weakness of his heart more than he let any one know, yet he never spared himself. Some men complain that to preach twice a week is too much for them, but he thought nothing of preaching twice a day."

Dr. A. C. Dixon.

I think Drummond was right when he said Moody was the greatest man this century had produced. He was a many-sided man. He was not only a great preacher, but, uneducated man as he was, he had no second as an educator.

Dr. Lyman Abbott.

Moody's name and his good works are known and loved throughout the civilized world.

The world has lost its greatest leader. His marvellous energy and kindly spirit made friends for religion by tens of thousands.

Letters from Friends.

From Mr. Martin Hope Sutton.

WHAT has always appeared to me characteristic of our dear departed friend, Moody, has been (1) his remarkable discernment as to the real character of the men with whom he has come in contact; (2) his boldness on behalf of Christ and his cause; and (3) his personal humility.

I think these traits in his character must have been observed by all who knew him. The first-mentioned saved him from disappointments in those who were invited to labour with him. The second was manifest in his public addresses, and the third in his more private intercourse with friends and fellow-labourers.

I remember an occasion when he and his committee were invited to breakfast at the house of one of his most wealthy and most liberal supporters near Hyde Park Corner. Mr. Moody said: "You ought to build here in the West End such a hall as that at Islington;" and when it was replied that it would be impossible because the land here was so valuable, he replied, "Nonsense! You who are now in this room could give the money, and never miss it." His proposal did not meet with much response; but Lord Radstock and another present, wishing the subscription commenced, promised certain sums, and though Mr. Moody's West End hall was never realised, the result was the erection of the Eccleston Gospel Hall in Belgravia, where Lord Radstock and others have since ministered.

Mr. Moody's humility struck me forcibly when spending a few hours one Saturday evening at Cintra Lodge. I asked him to conduct family worship. He expressed himself as much less competent than I should be, but being pressed he did it in the most simple manner possible, though not without one or two of his very telling remarks on the Holy Scripture read. Some of the domestic servants afterwards expressed their astonishment that Mr. Moody should be "so soft and gentle," they having repeatedly heard him preaching in the Town Hall.

From Mr. Charles Inglis.

Some few of us who knew him intimately for more than thirty years can hardly realize that we shall see his face no more on earth, nor hear his voice pleading with thousands to be reconciled to God. While heaven is all the richer, earth will be the poorer for his departure.

How he will be missed in that sorrowing home at Northfield, by those students in Chicago, who used to look up to him as a father, and by some of us who received such a loving welcome from him whenever we landed on the American continent! I do not believe that I ever met a servant of Christ who was more self-denying, more humble, more indefatigable in work for his Master.

Nothing will be a greater source of comfort to Mrs. Moody and her family than to know that there are thousands of Christians in England who are praying for them in this their time of deep sorrow. May every fellow-evangelist follow him, as he followed Christ. Then, when the last message is given, and the last meeting is held, we shall have an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom.

D. L. Moody.

DEAR honoured friend of God and man,
The world thy loss will mourn;
In Gospel work thou led'st the van,
'Neath burdens bravely borne.

The Bible was thy chosen creed,
The Christian pilgrim's guide;
'Twas thy delight its priceless seed
To scatter far and wide.

Thy lips its sacred truths to teach,
Were long ago unscaled;
Thy heaven-sent gift of faithful speech
A harvest rich shall yield.

In Britain didst thou labour long
The multitudes to win;
Whilst Sankey's gift of sacred song
Brought countless listeners in.

As brethren in one holy cause
Together did ye toil:
The heroes of unearthly wars,
Ye gathered heavenly spoil!

The Spirit's sword how didst thou wield,
Where few before had gone;
And 'neath faith's brightly-burnished shield
To victory march on!

Once more we hoped to see thy face,
Thy voice once more to hear,
Ere thou hadst run thine earthly race,
And found a higher sphere.

But tho' unwearied was thy zeal,
And loving toil thy choice,
An angel did beside thee steal,
And hush thy pleading voice.

Thy heart that felt the world's deep need,
That angel touch hath stilled,
Thy life from grief and pain hath freed,
Thy soul with rapture filled.

Long shall thy fragrant memory last,
And where Mount Hermon stands,
A hallowed influence, rich and vast,
Stream forth to distant lands.

In yon bright world round Jesu's feet,
Where sainted spirits dwell,
We trust, ere long, once more to meet.
Farewell, dear friend, farewell.

Clevedon, Somerset. WM. KITCHING.

"Three of the . . chief."

WHY am I sad because the brave and strong
Among the Warriors of the Cross lie low?
Why do I grieve when leaders rich of song
In honour of our precious Saviour go—

To swell the choirs above with blissful note
Through the whole regions of eternal peace,
Their happy powers to his renown devote,
And hasten on his boundless Realm's increase?

Three brothers* (mighty in the Scriptures) dear
Wherever Christ is named, with gracious voice;
O'er Hastings, Moody, Lowry—shed a tear,
Then bless our Heavenly Father, and rejoice!

Memorial Service.

The first memorial meeting in New York City was held at the Calvary Baptist Church, on Tuesday, December 26. The church is one of the largest and handsomest in the city, and is only a stone's throw from the Carnegie Music Hall, where such a mighty series of meetings was conducted by the evangelist a winter or two ago. After prayer and the singing of "Rock of Ages," Dr. Morse, who presided, observed, in respect of Mr. Moody, that he was undoubtedly one of the best Biblical students on this Continent; and that, though he did not read the Bible in Greek and Hebrew, no man was better acquainted with the English Scriptures.

Dr. R. S. MacArthur said that, although Mr. Moody had not learned theology in a college or seminary, he had sat at Jesus' feet and learned of Him. His work had given dignity and honour and glory to the labours of numbers of the laity—people who had never been ordained by man. He had himself been to be a saver of souls and a comforter of saints. The doctor went on to point out that Mr. Moody had emphasized the gentler rather than the sterner aspects of the Gospel. "He lived with Jesus, caught his spirit, and echoed his message, clothing it in a garment of love. He preached a crucified Saviour in a crucified spirit.

Mr. Stokes, who had known Mr. Moody since boyhood, and who accompanied him to Philadelphia the last time he left New York, gave some of the conversation he had had with Mr. Moody on that last journey. Speaking about some social scandals, he had said, "Money is rushing in on us, and destroying our social and spiritual life." On the subject of bicycles taking the place of the Bible, and science that of sermons, he predicted that there would soon be a reaction, and that the people would soon want the old Bible and the old religion back again. Mr. Stokes, in speaking of Mr. Moody's widespread influence, and of his work as a seed-sower, named Ceylon, Cairo, and St. Petersburg as three places in which he had found persons who had been converted through Mr Moody. Almost the last words Mr. Moody spoke as the train reached Philadelphia were, "Well, Stokes, pretty soon we'll be home!"

Dr. Hillis, who has followed Dr. Lyman Abbott in the pulpit formerly filled by Henry Ward Beecher, gave an eloquent address. He began:—"There was a man sent forth by God whose name was Dwight L. Moody; and by his death the unchurched masses have lost their best friend. He was the greatest evangelist since Whitefield, and no man since the Apostle Paul had addressed so many people. For 300 days in each of seven years he had spoken to audiences of 5,000 persons each afternoon and evening." After a rapid outline of his marvellous personal history, Dr. Hillis mentioned in which God had prepared Mr. Moody for his special work. In the first he had invited a saloon-keeper to come to his Sunday-school class. The man said he would if he (Mr. Moody) would come to the opening of his saloon on the following Thursday. Moody consented, saying that he had a Friend, without whom he never went anywhere, and he must bring Him along.

The saloon-keeper agreed, but said that if he was going to bring along somebody to talk, he should reserve the same privilege for himself, and to this Moody agreed. About half-past nine on this night Moody proceeded to the saloon, taking with him one of his poor-boy protégés. The saloon man was ready for him, and had fortified himself with the aid of an atheist, an anarchist, and a man who railed at everything. After the first civilities, these men began to talk, and went on for three-quarters of an hour, and Moody's heart was in his mouth. Then he said, "I think I should like to pray." "Oh, but," said one man, "the Book says that two or three must gather together. and you are by yourself!" "Oh, no, I'm not; here is a friend of mine who will join me." So saying, he drew forward the boy, and the two knelt down.

AS THEY PRAYED THEY CRIED, and as they cried they prayed, and God gave him, as a reward, the saloon-keeper and his family.

The other experience (that gave him the inquiry-room) was that of going to visit personally all the girls in the class of one of his helpers, who was ordered away from Chicago to die of consumption. This man came to him telling him of his hopeless physical condition, and declaring that he could not go away without asking each of the members of his class to give herself definitely to Christ. The two men and set out to do this work, visiting the girls wherever they could find them. Out of the whole number not one was unwilling to avail herself of the chance thus given. Moody made up his mind then that an opportunity for immediate decision should be provided at all his meetings. Dr. Hillis closed with a heart-searching appeal to his audience to do such work as lay within their power for the salvation of souls.

Dr. Hoadley believed that more people had been led to decision by Moody than by any other man since the Apostle Paul, Whitefield not excepted, and for the reason that he was the great world-evangelist. He attributed his mighty influence to two reasons, he believed in Jesus and loved Him with all his heart, and and believed it with all his heart. The doctor then described the impression made on the preaching of hundreds of ministers by Mr. Moody's work in making their presentation of the truth more acceptable to the people by greater simplicity and by modification of their scholastic methods. He also referred to his marvellous influence among great scholars of the world.

Mr. Harold, formerly a student at Northfield, spoke of Mr. Moody's personal kindness and interest in "even the most obscure" of those who studied there. Mr. James Talcott, who was introduced by Dr. Morse as having been one of Mr. Moody's "strong arms," and with whom he usually stayed when visiting New York, spoke a few words, describing his friend as having been "unselfish, and loving his neighbour better than himself. He is not dead but sleepeth, and I cannot think of him in any other way."

The Funeral.

Our readers will peruse with interest the following note from Mr. Sankey, for so many years Mr. Moody's right hand in the service of song:—

Brooklyn, N.Y., Dec. 28, 1899.

Dear Friends,—On Tuesday, December 26, we laid our beloved brother and friend, Mr. Moody, in his grave on beautiful "Round Top," within a stone's cast of the spot where he was born a little over sixty-two years ago. The day was one of the most beautiful I ever witnessed in Northfield; not a cloud in the sky from morning till night. When I went into the room where he was yet lying on the couch, I could scarcely believe that he was not sleeping, just as I had seen him so often after a hard day's work.

About twenty-five Mount Hermon students carried him from his home to the church, about half a mile down the street; there he lay in state for a short time before the hour appointed for the funeral service. Thousands of his neighbours passed by in tears, looking for the last time upon the face of him who had been a personal friend to almost every one of them. During the service, and while one of his co-labourers was speaking of the joyful death our brother was permitted to die, the sun, which was shining so brightly without, broke through a small opening in one of the window shutters and cast a beautiful ray of sunshine upon Mr. Moody's face and the pillow of roses at his head, on which was written the dying words of the brave warrior, "God is calling me." Every other spot in the building was in the deepest shadow.

We followed him once more through the quiet street, past the house in which he was born, to the spot selected by his family for his last resting-place; and, while the day was dying in the west, we sang a hymn, and laid the tired body away to await the resurrection morning, when we shall clasp glad hands again, and be "forever with the Lord."—Yours, in the "Blessed Hope,"

Ira D. Sankey.

The New York papers give detailed accounts of the obsequies. There were few of the ordinary accompaniments of such sorrowful occasions—no hearse, nor funeral music, nor tolling bells, nor crape, nor veils to hide faces suffused in tears. Tears there were in the eyes of every one of the large congregation present to pay a tribute to the greatest religious force in this century. But there was no weeping; and the calmest faces in the church were those of the immediate family.

The resignation manifested by Mrs. Moody was that of one whose husband had entered into joys unspeakable, which await her also, and which she is to share with him. "I hope no one will speak of me as fatherless." said the daughter to a friend. The sweet voice of the elder son's wife was heard in the Gospel hymns as if only happy days had been hers; there was no suggestion of the loss of her two children, the serious illness of her father and the death of her devoted father-in-law, all within a year.

At 10 o'clock there was a brief service at the house, conducted by Dr. C. I. Scofield, the pastor of the Congregational Church, who was present during those "four glorious hours" before the evangelist fell asleep; and Dr. R. A. Torrey, the pastor of the Chicago Avenue Church, and the superintendent of the Moody Bible Institute in Chicago, also took part. Dr. Scofield read Psa. xc. and 1 Thess. iv., and Dr. Torrey offered prayer. No signs of mourning appeared about the house; no crape was seen on the door. The window blinds were kept up, and people freely entered the house. Their conversation was mainly about Mr. Moody, recalling incidents in his eventful career,—helpful words which he had spoken and deeds of kindness which he had done.

Shortly before 11 o'clock, the body, upon which others had leaned for a generation, was taken from the room upstairs in which it had rested after being embalmed and placed in the cloth-covered coffin with quiet trimmings, and a plate bearing simply the name and dates of his birth and death:

The coffin was placed upon a cloth-covered frame and carried to the church, a half mile distant, by some thirty students of the Mount Hermon School, headed by the officiating ministers and followed by Mr. Ira D. Sankey, Mr. Moody's associate for nearly thirty years; trustees of the Northfield Schools, and other intimate friends. Christmas greens festooned the galleries of the church, while on the coffin and about it were appropriate floral tributes from the trustees, faculties, and students of the several institutions at Northfield and Chicago. At the head was a pillow, in which a crown had been worked in white, with a purple ribbon on which Mr. Moody's last words were seen, "God is calling me."

An open Bible, with "Victory. 1 Corinthians xv. 55-57" on the left side, and "2 Timothy iv. 7-8" on the other, rested at the foot. Palms, ferns, laurel, violets, cut flowers and callas were placed about the pulpit.

Soon after two o'clock the relatives entered the church. There were many well-known clergymen and laymen present, in addition to those taking part in the services. Besides Mr. Sankey, who was accompanied by his wife, there were three of Mr. Moody's singers present —George C. Stebbins, D. B. Towner, and F. H. Jacobs, besides many friends of long standing.

Dr. Scofield had charge of the services, which began with the hymn, "A Little While." After he had offered prayer, Dr. A. T. Pierson read the Scripture lesson, and Rev. G. C. Needham prayed. "Immanuel's Land" was the second hymn. Addresses were delivered by Dr. Scofield, President, H. G. Weston (Crozer Theological Seminary), Dr. Torrey, and Bishop W. F. Mallalieu. Then came Dr. Wilbur Chapman, Dr. Pierson, Mr. Wharton (evangelist), and Mr. John Wanamaker. Mr. Moody's elder son delivered in words of tender affection. Other men, he said, had spoken from various points of view; he wished to speak as a son. Standing beside his mother, unannounced and unexpectedly, he said that if his father, in a moment of impulsiveness, rebuked one of his children, and afterwards learned that he himself was in the wrong, he would come to them, and, with tears in his eyes, would say: "My son, my daughter, I have done wrong; forgive me!" Besides his kindness to his children, and consideration for their feelings, he had done more —he had led each of them to accept Christ as their Saviour. Then, in an impressive manner, he added: "Father did not yearn to die. Life was attractive to him. He loved his work."

The service was closed with the singing, by the Mount Hermon Quartet, of "The Hope of the Coming of the Lord," the words written by Major Whittle, and the music by his daughter, Mrs. W. R. Moody. The coffin was afterwards carried by the Mount Hermon students to Round Top, the Olivet of Northfield, and placed in a vault just at the crown of the little hill, so dear to Mr. Moody's heart, and the scene of so many hallowed associations.

There was sadness in the scene, but not sorrow; how could there be sorrow for one who was "at home with the Lord"?

Mildmay Mission to the Jews.

On the second evening of the New Year, more than 200 Jews and Jewesses sat down to tea at the Central hall, Philpot Street, E. After tea, a Gospel meeting was held, presided over by Rev. J. Wilkinson, who was supported by Mrs. Wathen, Rev. S. Wilkinson, Drs. Dixon and Rocha, and Mr. Fondaminsky. It proved to be a truly happy gathering. The conduct of the Jewish guests was admirable, and the attention given to the various addresses was most encouraging to Mr. Wilkinson and his fellow workers.

On the following evening more than 300 Jewish children were entertained in the same place; and when their hunger was appeased, a truly interesting and happy meeting was held, Mr. Wilkinson being again in the chair. On this occasion he was supported by the Misses Maddicks and Cornwall and Mr. S. Wilkinson. The children belonging to the mission night-school sang sweet Gospel hymns, and repeated from memory a chapter from the Word of God, and other passages in a way to gladden all our hearts.

Numerous prizes were distributed during the evening for good conduct, regular attendance, and diligence in mastering their lessons; and this proved to be a very exciting time. For these two happy gatherings the workers thank God and take courage.

Aggressive Primitive Methodism.

SOUTHWARK has long held an unenviable reputation for squalor and vice, and although for the time being its hooligan bands appear to have been suppressed, yet it would be difficult to over-estimate the need for aggressive Christian work in such a district.

The opening of the magnificent St. George's Hall, in connection with the Primitive Methodist South-East London Mission, is, therefore, an event of high importance to transpontine London. The building is admirably suitable for the purposes of a vigorous evangelistic movement, and affords excellent accommodation for the many departments of Christian effort undertaken by this flourishing mission. The premises are happily situated on the Old Kent Road, one of the busiest of metropolitan thoroughfares, and are of impressive and attractive appearance. A part of the site was formerly occupied by which in these pushing days would doubtless have developed into a flaring gin palace.

The entire cost of the buildings amounts to upwards of £12,000, of which £11,000 was raised prior to the opening, largely by the personal efforts of the superintendent minister, Rev. J. Flanagan, who has toured the country in the interests of his mission. Certainly the successful development of so important a scheme adds greatly to the usefulness of Primitive Methodism as a potent force in dealing with modern social and religious problems among the masses.

The programme of opening services is announced to cover the entire month of January, many leading Free Church ministers taking part, but the chief functions were the public gatherings held on Monday last week. First, Rev. Hugh Price Hughes gave a forcible address to a large congregation. In the evening there was a great rally of London Methodists, and the proceedings were marked by a delightful freedom and fervency. Mr. W. P. Hartley, who presided, congratulated the congregation and the Connexion on securing so valuable a habitation as a

CENTRE FOR EVANGELISTIC WORK.

Mr. Hartley dwelt on some important considerations with which the workers would necessarily be faced. Dealing chiefly with the subjects of sweating, overcrowding, and drunkenness, the speaker pointed out that Christianity, as the antithesis of selfishness, must be relied on to right these evils. He encouraged Mr. Flanagan and his helpers to go forward in the great work they had undertaken.

Mr. Thos. Robinson, of Paisley, followed on similar lines, and with reminiscences of the mission's early days of darkness and difficulty at an old and unsuitable building in a back street. Rev. William Williams, of Upton Baptist Church, rejoiced in the sound character of the work, the keynote of which was, "Ye must be born again." It was better to have one man converted than a thousand merely moralized. It was obviously useless, from a spiritual point of view, to rest content with giving the poor better dwellings, since the rich folk of the West End, amid congenial surroundings, were at any rate as wicked as the poor of the East. All moral reformation, to be of solid service, must be the outcome of the union of the soul with God through faith. Mr. Williams concluded a glowing address, with the hope that St. George's Hall might deserve the title applied to the Tottenham Court Road Tabernacle of Whitefield, "a soul trap."

Rev. J. E. Wakerley is, of course, quite at home in a mission chapel, and he gave an address instinct with enthusiasm. On behalf of Wesleyan Methodism, he said to his Primitive friends, "Go to those who need you, and who need you most." Mr. Wakerley briefly reviewed the aims of the Mission. There was no longer any need to look to the highly-respectable suburbs for large congregations. The people in the inner districts of London were being reached, and willing, consecrated toilers were going right of sin and wickedness to pluck up gems for the Saviour's crown. Mr. Wakerley recalled, in breezy style, some of his own experiences in the translation of a "high and dry" neglected chapel into a popular mission hall, and described his assault on a forbidding announcement of "seats five shillings a quarter," on the bolts and doors of pews, and all other things likely to repel the masses from worship. In conclusion, he adjured them to remember that to be true to the principles of Methodism they must be a soul-saving church. The preaching, the visitation, the nursing of the sick, and every other branch of the work must lead up to this great end—the salvation of souls.

After Rev. Joseph Ferguson had stirred all hearts with an appealing address, Rev. J. Flanagan came forward, at a late hour to give some particulars of the progress of the work. He referred especially to the financial position, and related some touching instances of self-denial among the poorer members of the Mission in the keenness of their desire to aid in the erection of the hall. He went on to acknowledge the timely and generous help received from all classes of society, both in London and the provinces, in the undertaking; and, subsequently, reiterated his intention not to devote himself to preaching in the hall until the debt remaining upon it was cleared.

At the conclusion of the meeting it was found that a sum of £900 was needed to balance the accounts. Communications for Mr. Flanagan may be addressed: 112, Page's Walk, Old Kent Road, S.E.

London Cabmen's Mission, like similar organizations, has its days of darkness and light, its seasons of encouragement and disappointment; but the past year has been one of steady progress. At the King's-Cross Mission Hall the Gospel has been preached simply and earnestly to cabmen, their families, and friends. The distribution of literature, visiting and assisting the needy, afflicted, and dying, and the training of the children in the Sunday Schools, are among the efforts put forth in the interests of these toilers. Many of the cabmen themselves conduct the meetings, and are earnest workers in the cause of temperance. The Mission workers are naturally anxious to extend their operations when funds will permit. The treasurer is Mr. John Dupee, who may be communicated with at the Mission Hall, King's-Cross, W.C.

Students in Conference.

ENTHUSIASTIC GATHERINGS IN LONDON.

SUCH a movement as the British College Christian Union is significant in view of the immense influence which the class that it aims to reach may be expected in after years to exercise. The World's Student Christian Federation, in which some 56,000 students are enrolled, now links together in spiritual brotherhood universities and colleges in many lands, and, as is well known, the members sign a declaration to become foreign missionaries if the Lord should open their way. There is reason for abundant gratitude to God that during the years which have witnessed the operation of these organisations there has been a deepened interest in the great work of world-wide evangelization. The explanation is found in the fact that God, whose is "the kingdom, and the power, and the glory," has provided the movement to perform a ministry demanded by the times and required in the outworking of his gracious purposes.

It was with the object of furthering this great movement, and quickening Christian interest in foreign missions, that the International Students' Missionary Conference was held last week in Exeter Hall. The proceedings opened on Tuesday afternoon, and during following days the gatherings were numerous as well as enthusiastic. The entire Conference was characterized by a spirit of goodwill and Christian love. Delegates were present from America, Norway, Sweden, Finland, Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Switzerland, Hungary, Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Turkey. Of course, the British contingent was large and influential.

THE PREPARATORY MEETING, held on Tuesday afternoon, was pervaded by a fraternal spirit, and was a singularly helpful and encouraging experience. At this early stage it was evident that many had brought with them happy remembrances of previous gatherings, and had come in the spirit of the words which form the motto of the union, "The Evangelization of the World in this Generation." Mr. H. C. Duncan, M.A., chairman of the Conference, led the meeting, which was of a devotional character.

Dr. H. C. G. Moule gave an address on the Lord's promise, "Lo, I am with you." In a brotherly way he exhorted the company, at the outset, to make a full and complete consecration. The message of the text was held to be one of comfort and consolation to the missionary. The promise was not "I will be with you," but "I am with you." Then, these were the words of Him who had promised his grace and love, and had left the inspiration of his life and example. Professor Moule concluded with spiritual counsel and encouragement, and with fervent prayer that the students and delegates might be preserved from all error, misunderstanding, and perplexity.

In the evening the hall was crowded, and the meeting was one long to be remembered.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON

gave an address of welcome to the students and delegates, who numbered between 1,700 and 1,800. He greeted them because they were young, because they were students, and because they represented all sections of the Christian Church. The followers of the Lord Jesus Christ had the whole of his commands to obey if they expected to receive every blessing He had promised; and the most important of those commands was to preach the Gospel to every creature.

To his lordship's mind, it was most gratifying to think that the society existed on so broad a basis of Christian zeal, overcoming many of those differences which so often hinder the progress of the Gospel. They were united in the belief that the earth must be claimed for Christ; they were bound together as servants of one common Master, and engaged in one common work. The end and object which God wished to come from their differences was that they should enjoy a clearer and firmer grasp of truth. Proceeding, the bishop observed that to have the energy of youth was a great thing, but it was still better to have the wisdom of the student and the advantage of a trained mind. He prayed that God would bless them in all they did, would guide them into a knowledge of his purposes, and fill their hearts with the love of his holy name.

Dr. Alexander MacKennal followed with an address of kindly welcome on behalf of the Nonconformist churches of the country. When he saw their motto, he felt that it embodied a conception in which there was something more than came from the mind of man. The problems that the Church of Christ has to face to-day are more difficult than those which beset the first disciples of our Lord; and the solution of these problems calls for all the resources of mind and soul under the direction of the Holy Spirit.

Mr. H. C. Duncan replied on behalf of the students, whom he exhorted to beware of mere emotionalism, but to look for spiritual enthusiasm as a result of their consecration to God. He earnestly prayed that they would go forward, a band of men and women, moved with one great desire—to serve Him at whose name every knee shall bow.

Rev. R. J. Campbell, of Brighton, introduced the first subject for consideration at the sessions of the Conference—"The Inadequacy of non-Christian Religions to meet the Need of the World." He defined this need as being triform—a vision of God, redemption from ill, and "more life and fuller." He expounded with eloquence and clearness the principles of the most prominent religions, and their effects upon the world. Many of these religions embody evils against which Christians have to fight. The world is to-day seeking for a vision of God, and nothing less can satisfy the world's need. Christianity reveals God in Christ, it unfolds redemption, and shows the way of life for time and eternity.

WEDNESDAY.

The reception of foreign delegates was the purpose of the first gathering on Wednesday morning. Mr. H. C. Duncan gave a hearty and fraternal welcome to the representatives of the foreign centres, numbering over 200. This was followed by accounts of Continental and other student movements, in which the progress and needs of these organizations were briefly reported.

The Archbishop of Canterbury was the first speaker at the session which followed. In forcible terms, his Grace urged the evangelization of the world as the primary duty of the Church. It was a humiliating thought, he said, that, after 1,900 years, the Gospel message had not been heard all over the world. It seemed as if God was now giving a fresh call to the work of carrying the Gospel to all mankind. Men's minds were increasingly aroused to the duty which the Lord impressed upon the disciples before his ascension; and every Christian, if he loved his Lord, was now bound to think of this great command, and how he could best help to carry it out. God Himself had made preparations for the work. The whole mass of mankind had been brought nearer and nearer to each other, and we have means of communication which our forefathers never knew or enjoyed. Facility of intercourse between man and man is a distinguishing feature of life in the present age; and God has unlocked the door through which the Church can enter upon her work, and find her task to be far easier than ever. Was not this a plain call from God? The way having been prepared, there should be no more hanging back. As God, in the past generation, opened the way, should it not be the work of the present generation to complete the task, so that it might be possible to say that, although the whole earth was not Christian, there was no nation to whom the Christian faith was not taught, and who had not the opportunity and privilege of hearing and accepting the message of God to the world through his Son?

Rev. Alexander Connell followed with some earnest and practical remarks. Evangelism, he said, is the heart of the Gospel, the Gospel is the heart of the Church, and the Church in which Jesus Christ dwells is the heart of the world. The evangelization of the world is the ruling passion of the heart of Christ. The subject needs no hysterical enthusiasm; it only requires to be stated to be declared proved. Evangelization must be the task of all who believe in the Gospel. It is the right of any and every nation to have preachers; it is the function of the Church to send them; and it is the teaching of the Gospel that they should go.

In the afternoon a number of sectional meetings, for the consideration of various mission were held, principally to guide the decision of volunteers with regard to different phases of mission enterprise, and to give them opportunities of hearing the results of work. The position of the native races in South Africa was dealt with in the large hall by Rev. W. C. Willoughby (London Missionary Society). He maintained that South Africa being a part of the British Empire, its welfare depends on the English nation. The native problem was one of great difficulty. South of the Zambesi there were probably six or eight millions of blacks, but only one million of white people, and the work of welding the black and the white to form one strong self-reliant and mutually helpful brotherhood is before us. Wherever Englishmen went they took with them enthusiasm for freedom. The natives had caught the contagion, and in all tribes there was an ever-growing impatience of restraint. "For the sake of our sons and daughters emigrating to South Africa," continued Mr. Willoughby, "we must raise the natives to a nobler life. God has put genius under the black skin, and the natives must be educated and turned into useful citizens."

Addresses were also given by Mr. L. H. Gaunt (London Missionary Society), Rev. W. B. Stapleton (Baptist), Dr. Laws and Mrs. Stewart (of Lovedale). A paper written by Rev. H. E. Fox was read, dealing with the problems and needs of the races of the "Dark Continent."

China was the subject of consideration at the meeting in the Lecture Theatre. Rev. W. T. A. Barber (Wesleyan) spoke of the vitality, cohesion, and characteristics of the Chinese race, and their effect on the progress of Christianity. Archdeacon Moule dwelt upon the various religions of the natives, mentioning the evil results of Taoism, Confucianism, and Buddhism on the Chinese mind. Other speakers were Revs. G. Owen (London Missionary Society) and J. W. Inglis (United Presbyterian).

At a meeting held in furtherance of missions in India, Rev. F. B. Meyer presented the claims of our great Eastern dependency, and spoke of the moral and social evils there encountered. Rev. C. E. Wilson (Baptist), Mrs. A. E. Ball (Church Missionary Society), Rev. E. P. Rice (London Missionary Society), and Mr. John Lampard (Balaghat Mission to the Gonds and Baijas) also advanced the claims of India, and spoke of its prospects.

Other meetings were held, at which discussions took place on missions to Japan and Formosa, the Jews, the Mohammedan world, South America, and the lands in which the Greek Church prevails.

At the evening meeting, the Chairman read a message of greeting from twelve former secretaries of the Union, praying that the blessing of God might overflow in the life-purpose of every heart. The subject for meditation was

"THE NEED OF THE WORLD."

Rev. G. Owen (Pekin), in a touching address, dealt with the deep and crying needs of China, spiritual and moral. Rev. James Johnson (Sierra Leone) followed with a pathetic plea for the missions in Africa. Although different in colour, language, and habits, the people are part and parcel of the nations of the earth, and sharers in the redemptive blessings brought by the Saviour. Africa's heathenism bears witness to a sense of religious need. To appease the wrath of offended deities, the people sometimes spend more than half their earnings upon sacrifices. The speaker did not challenge the designation of "Dark Continent," as applied to Africa. The land was dark, not because the sun did not shine upon her, but through ignorance and gross superstition, degradation and domestic slavery, and, among other things, the belief in witchcraft. "Dark, you confess; but does not that confession throw upon you the responsibility, if you love the Lord Jesus Christ, to take to them that Light in which you revel—the Light of the Gospel — which shall bring peace and happiness to home, heart, and nation?" Dr. BRUCE, of Persian fame, followed with many instances of personal experience as to the way in which to serve the missionary cause. He earnestly exhorted the students to leave the formulation of their life-plans in the hands of God. In Persia there were now thirty missionaries, and through the dissemination of God's Word a knowledge of his love for the world is being brought home to the hearts of the Mohammedans.

THURSDAY.

The morning session was devoted to a historical review of missionary enterprise, Dr. GEORGE SMITH dealing with the period prior to 1800, and Rev. R. WARDLAW THOMPSON (in the absence of Mr. Eugene Stock), with the nineteenth century. Relating the story of the pioneers of modern missions, Dr. Smith spoke of labour in the face of tremendous and innumerable difficulties, and with but few encouragements. Referring to the early movements in Denmark, Dr. Smith said that country still maintains a deep interest in missionary enterprise, and has given a remarkable and powerful impetus to the Moravians, whose missions have reached the most

ISOLATED NATIONS OF THE EARTH.

The inauguration and development of the Baptist, London, Scotch, and Church Missionary Societies were described; also the way in which many obstacles which threatened the existence and progress of missions had been met and surmounted.

Rev. R. WARDLAW THOMPSON, Foreign Secretary of the London Missionary Society, spoke of the nineteenth century as one of the most remarkable in the history of the world in many respects, and declared Christian missions to be one of the most wonderful developments of the age. Having sketched the formation and history of the various organizations, their present position and future outlook, Mr. Thompson pressed home the importance of turning to the best account the opportunities and privileges of the present. The importance of studying foreign missions was becoming more general, and it was not necessary now, as in the early days of the C.M.S., to go to the Continent for the purpose of getting German and Dutch students to prepare for work abroad. Speaking of the signs of progress, Mr. Thompson dwelt upon the increasing wakefulness of the Christian public, and also on the large number of individual missions. God had responded to of his people, and made it possible for the world to be evangelized.

A meeting was subsequently held, at which Mr. F. M. GILBERT (Boston, Mass.) gave a brief report of the College Department of the Student Movement in the United States and Canada. During the last four years remarkable progress had been made, no fewer than one hundred additional associations having been formed. He strongly urged upon students to use their influence upon their companions, as he believed no greater opportunity ever came than during their college career.

Miss EFFIE K. PRICE gave a glowing account of the work of the College department of the Young Women's Christian Association of the United States and Canada. The labour of twenty-six years had been abundantly blessed by God to the with whom they had worked. The desire for Christian service was becoming more prevalent among the women students, who were giving more of their time to the study of the Gospel, and their relation to missionary movements.

Mr. S. EARL TAYLOR had much to say of the attitude of theological students in the American colleges towards missions, and the increasing interest manifested by them in all that pertains to the carrying of the Gospel to the uttermost parts of the earth. As a result of this, over 1,500 had sailed for the mission field during the past ten or eleven years, and seventy-five universities are contributing towards the support of missionaries.

In the afternoon, there was a gathering of theological students under the presidency of Mr. F. Lenwood. Rev. J. H. ELLISON, vicar of Windsor, read a useful paper on the need for and importance of interesting congregations in foreign missions. The average man, he had found, considered missionary enterprise as not coming within the circle of those matters in which he was bound to take an interest. By giving to this subject themselves, they would be able to bring men to see that the missionary cause was deserving of their serious thought and consideration.

Mr. S. EARL TAYLOR gave some useful and practical advice, and urged reasons why theological students should take up the study of foreign missions.

A discussion on medical missions, at a meeting in the Examination Hall, also attracted a large number of the students and delegates, Mr. W. MCADAM ECCLES presiding. Dr. HERBERT LANKESTER (Church Missionary Society) spoke of the relation between medical and evangelistic work. The doctor, in opening up new ground, can break down hostility by exhibiting practical Christianity; he can strike an effective blow at the

by curing his patients; he can relieve a great deal of suffering, thus following the example of Christ. But the medical missionary must be thoroughly equipped, for he is expected to be, in turn, general practitioner, surgeon, oculist, aurist, dentist, and dispenser. Dr. D. CARR (C.M.S.) spoke of medical missions to the Mohammedans.

At the sectional meeting devoted to the consideration of evangelization, Rev. EGERTON R. YOUNG recounted some of his pioneering experiences among North-West American Indians. The missionaries to these tribes needed a strong constitution, in order to withstand the hardships and climate to which they would be exposed. He must also be a "crack shot" at 500 or 800 yards, as his meals often depended upon bringing down game. The chiefs had a great suspicion of the white man; but nothing appealed to them more than the simple Bible stories.

THE QUESTION OF EDUCATIONAL WORK

in theory—its advantages and dangers—was dealt with by Rev. R. WARDLAW THOMPSON at an assembly in the Examination Hall Buildings, under the presidency of Mr. G. T. MANLEY, Cambridge. Addresses were also given on educational work in practice by Rev. B. K. Cunningham (S.P.G.) and others.

In the evening there was again a full attendance, when extracts from the Report of the Student Volunteer Missionary Union were read by the Chairman. The Report stated that the Union in no way usurped the functions of existing missionary societies, but was the servant of all and the rival of none. It was organized by and for students. Since the inception of the movement 1,320 men and 366 women had been enrolled as members. These were classified as—Theological, 595; medical, 458; arts, 363; and 270 in other faculties. Since the conference at Liverpool, in 1896, the number of volunteers who had reached their field of labour had been more than doubled, and more than 33 per cent. had sailed to the mission field. The Union, however, had not accomplished much of what it hoped to do, notwithstanding the fact that there are now eleven different nations federated, representing 56,000 students and professors. It was necessary that more should be enrolled as members of missionary study bands.

Rev. W. WATSON, who had promised to give an address on "Prayer and Missions," was unable to be present. In his absence the subject was dealt with by Miss EFFIE K. PRICE, in a fervent and impressive discourse. Prayer is an illuminator of man's heart and mind. It is not always an easy matter to pray—it is often a battle. The councils of the eternal God are not lightly entered into, neither can we rush into the presence of the Holy One. We should willingly heed the call to remembering that the conflict would be followed by victory.

"The Holy Spirit and Missions" formed the subject of an intensely earnest and passionate address by Mr. ROBERT E. SPEER, secretary of the American Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. We contemplate, said Mr. Speer, that our purposes in this movement are the same as prompted the heart of Christ. His methods are ours: "Not by an army, nor by power, but by my Spirit." When we look on the history of Christ's Church, we see that no relationship can be closer than that between this enterprise and the Spirit of the living God. They believed the Bible to be a missionary book, not merely because it contained a missionary prophecy or psalm, but because it proclaimed the message which was to be carried to every creature. It was the Holy Spirit that could make their labour effective. It was the Holy Spirit that could lift the Church out of her selfishness and indulgence, above her appreciation of the world, and give her a clearer vision of her service.

Mr. SPEER concluded with touching and searching appeals to the students to be ready to make whatever sacrifice might be required of them in the work to which they had dedicated their lives.

(Our Report will be concluded next week.)

A Waifs' Supper.

THE scene at Dr. Barnardo's annual supper for waifs would be difficult to parallel even in metropolitan slumdom. The occasion is a red letter one for many hundreds of miserables. They are hatless, shoeless, ragged, or attired for the occasion in every imaginable kind of shabby cast-off clothing, often several sizes too large, and occasionally variegated with marvellous odds and ends of redundant finery. From the common lodging-houses, of Spitalfields and Mile End, from the mean streets of dingy Stepney and the wilderness of Old Ford, from out-of-the-way yards and cul de sacs of gin-sodden Whitechapel, the children set out in squads and bands early in the evening for the famous Edinburgh Castle. Grim humour and heart-breaking pathos were combined in the great supper room. Around the worthy doctor's festive board there was no reserve in conversation; urchin foregathered with urchin, exchanging confidences as to home circumstances, and discussing the New Year's prospects in matters of new boots, or jackets, or skirts.

In the buzz of conversation, as 2,000 little voices sounded shrill appreciation of the promise of a good meal, it was no easy matter to keep order, but the staff of the various homes and the cheery buglers were equal to the occasion, and everything passed off happily.

A bright entertainment was remarkable to the onlooker for the glimpses it afforded of child-character and child-suffering. One sturdy youth would lean back into chuckling laughter, which he seemed to enjoy too much to express. The white face of another puny little mortal would flicker with passing satisfaction, and then set once more into an expression of despair. Among the items which called forth prolonged "hurrahs" of enjoyment was a clever performance on ocarinas by eight boys from the Leopold House Orphan Home.

An address from Dr. Barnardo was, as usual, a feature of the proceedings, and hope must have kindled in many a young heart as the speaker told, with breezy style and in simple language, how eight happy and prosperous "old boys" had, at their own expense, crossed the ocean from Canada in order to revisit the familiar Homes of their childhood and wish the Doctor "A Merry Christmas."

The many institutions carried on in connection with this work of the National Waifs' Association continue to increase in usefulness. During last year 13,290 children were dealt with. Of these, 3,011 were homeless and destitute, including 200 babies in arms, and 78 deaf mutes and cripples. On one day 56 boys and girls were admitted, the youngest child being six weeks old. Of trained boys and girls, 640 emigrated, bringing up the total of those sent abroad to 10,660.

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

AFTER THREE MONTHS: AND A FRESH START.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

WITH the close of December, the organizers and workers of the Campaign lifted up their hearts in gratitude to God that they had been privileged to accomplish one-half of the plan originally laid out. There had been no "general break" or outpouring of the Holy Spirit over the whole city; but much blessing had been received, and all who had put their hands to it thanked God and took courage as they girded themselves to renewed effort. The work has been very unequal in results in different localities. Certain onlookers have described it as "taking hold" in some districts and not in others, and have indicated their opinion that the same methods are not equally adapted to the different classes of the community. As the result of close observation in different directions, we have found that where the blessing has come there had been much prayer previously; and where this was joined with careful preparation and arrangement, there has been "much fruit." Evangelists of long experience have told us that in some cases what took place in the course of the services was quite inadequate to account for the impression made; but the local workers, who knew what had gone before, recognised the awakening of sinners as a new proof of God's faithfulness to his promises.

REACHING ALL CLASSES.

As a matter of fact the blessing has not come among any special classes, but has been shared alike by West End and East End. In a church in one of the fashionable suburbs a lady came up to her minister, and said: "Dr. ——, I always thought I was a good sort of woman. At one time I joined the Good Templar movement, and thought I was all the better for it. To-night I learned for the first time that I was a lost sinner, needing a Saviour, and I have found him now." It was rather remarkable that two efforts such as that among the business men of the city, and that among men and women employed in ship-building yards and factories, should have been inaugurated at the same time, and should have been at once crowned with an equal measure of success.

CHURCHES, NOT HALLS.

One feature of the campaign to be borne in mind is that the work was, with the exception of the Tent Hall, and the great Sabbath evening services in St. Andrew's Hall, carried on in recognised churches. The writer is an office-bearer of a mission congregation connected with one of the great denominations, and was somewhat surprised that it had not been included in the centres for meetings; but, on inquiry of an official of the Campaign Committee, was informed that no exceptions were being made to the rule that only congregations of full status were to be asked for the use of their buildings. The work was arranged territorially, and churches were used irrespective of their former attitude to evangelistic effort. In these circumstances it is not surprising that in certain quarters there was much to learn as to method, before even the workers felt themselves at home in the meetings; and much to do before the surrounding population came to understand what was really going on.

One evangelist told us of a choir in which not one member would admit assurance of salvation. Ministers, mostly on the younger side of life, who had been labouring and praying long in order to bring their people into line with aggressive work, rejoiced to find themselves so ably supported from the outside, and have been much encouraged at the new start which they have been enabled to make. Naturally, when the meetings changed to churches whose people had all along been among the rescuers of the perishing, the complexion of the work was entirely different; but who shall say which class of cases marks the greater progress?

As we have repeatedly pointed out, denominationalism is being entirely lost sight of, in spite of the fact that the meetings are nearly all being held in churches; and congregations are labouring together as they never did before, even during the memorable visits of Mr. Moody.

SINGING THE GOSPEL.

The singing of the Gospel by soloists has not been a mere adjunct to the addresses, but, as with Mr. Sankey and other leaders in this department, has occupied a place of its own, and borne its own fruit. The leader of the song-preachers has been Mr. J. R. D. McAusland, whose wonderful voice has aroused the attention of the most careless to his message, as he went from centre to centre. His heart has been cheered by persons coming to thank him for words which had reached their hearts. One railway employé, passing in a great hurry, recognised him, and stopped just for a moment to thank him for blessing received through his ministry. Certain songs—notably "Christ is all"—have been in great request, the fame of them going before him.

DEEP PLOUGHING.

The ploughing has been very deep in some of the congregations. Not only the openly careless, but those who had been brought up to manhood and womanhood under the ministry of the Gospel, have been awakened to their lack of the one thing needful. We know of the secretary of a local branch of the Y.M.C.A. who cried out, before many who knew him, what a great sinner and hypocrite he had been; and about a week later we were introduced to him as he was busy redeeming the time by telling his friends and acquaintances what the Lord had done for his soul. At the same mission, one man attended who professed to be a Unitarian, and who would not remain to an after-meeting; but he took care to meet the evangelist on the way home, and yielded himself to the Lord at a street corner. A company of young people have abandoned an annual dance which they have held for a number of years, because of what has taken place at Campaign meetings.

MR. M'NEILL'S WORK.

The personal influence which Mr. McNeill has exerted over the whole movement, cannot be over-estimated. From the very outset it was felt that the afternoon meetings for business men were making their influence felt in every part of the city and suburbs. From various causes, already indicated, the amount of direct good done through them is exceedingly difficult to estimate, but their effects were felt everywhere in the impetus which they gave to the Campaign generally. Yet the preacher was not left without the knowledge of actual fruit. He says that "a considerable number of those business men have said to me what amounts substantially to this, that what had been only head-knowledge, and theory, and traditional respect, had become to them a real living experience."

In addition, Mr. McNeill has been one of the few evangelists who have held on during the whole three months, preaching regularly in the evenings. A writer in one of the daily newspapers had made a calculation of how much public work Mr. McNeill had done during the period, and supplied his readers with a remarkable array of figures. Only a man with exceptional physical powers could endure such a strain. But what shall we say of the "inwardness" of these evening services? The state of affairs which we were able to record regarding the mission in Govan really gives the key-note of all. Carping critics there have been; but the great wave of spiritual power has followed the preacher wherever he went; and, as it gathered volume, has swept before it all that savoured of opposition. A minister, among whose people there had been some who viewed the meetings with unfriendly eyes, publicly declared that never in the course of a long experience had he known the district moved in the same degree.

Undoubtedly the larger measure of blessing has come among the children. As Mr. McNeill put it, "God is saving the situation ten years hence by saving the children now." On another occasion he declared that, while many conversions were taking place all round, it behoved himself and others who were dealing with adults to recognise in the fullest manner the wonderful things God was doing "among the bairns." More than once we have called attention to the fact that in this department the workers seemed to have prepared far too small a vessel to receive what the Lord was ready to give. Over and over again the helpers were far too few to deal in any thorough way with the numbers of really earnest boys and girls whose hearts had been touched. As many as 500 such cases were to be found in a single after-meeting, and frequently the number was over 150.

In every mission that came under our notice great discretion was used in speaking to the young people who remained behind. No encouragement was given, by leading questions or otherwise, to premature or ill-considered professions. Yet from every quarter the testimony is that clear and decided cases of conversion abounded. One well-informed on the subject says that "the quietness, order, decorum, solemnity, and attention, almost universally observed, could not be surpassed;" and adds that between 7,000 and 9,000 children have in this way come into touch with workers.

YOUNG CONVERTS.

At the close of a children's mission held in two churches within the western division, we were present at the gathering of the converts. The whole of the fruit was not by any means represented, yet when those present were classified there proved to be fourteen boys and girls in their tenth year, fifty-one in their eleventh, thirty-six in their twelfth, thirty-eight in their thirteenth, and thirty-eight who were still older, making in all 177 while there were a number still younger, who to their disappointment were discouraged from joining the company. One elder, who was by no means naturally disposed to take an over-sanguine view of such professions, assured us that he had satisfied himself about more than a hundred cases. While every effort was being made to bring all these into actual touch with such organizations as would be helpful to them in the development of the Christian life, and care was taken to inform their respective Sabbath school teachers and pastors of what had been going on, they were affectionately counselled to forestall such formal intimation by personally communicating the good news on the first opportunity.

One preacher touched a deep note in saying that evangelists were apt to forget how many children from Christian families were children of God already, and that he often blamed himself for having addressed his audiences as if they all required still to undergo conversion. Whether this be so or not, there was evidence of ripening for the harvest in the juvenile audiences. Well-attended prayer-meetings were held in connection with many of the missions every evening at an earlier hour than the general service; and in one case, in a southern suburb, a gathering for the instruction and encouragement of young believers was held after the others had left, at which the attendance averaged about eighty.

As time goes on, the campaign reaps the benefit of the work done by the various Christian agencies working in the city. The members of the Bible Institute are particularly valued as workers in the inquiry-room and elsewhere, and their Scripture training inspires confidence in their personal dealing. Missions too, like that conducted by Pastor D. J. Findlay, are all the year round doing the evangelizing and soul-saving work which characterizes the campaign. The cheering aspect of the present movement is the extent to which the churches are identified with it.

A True Story.

"PIERRE, tu es bien désobéissant; tu me fais beaucoup de peine."

Madame Sagot looked worried and anxious, for Pierre was a constant trouble to her; he was so disobedient, and he was making his little brother almost as bad as himself. Pierre was only seven years of age, with fair, curly hair, and bright blue eyes. A merry, laughing boy, who was always in mischief.

At church, on Sundays, he would make the other boys laugh. Sometimes he would frighten the little ones by bringing a huge hanneton out of his pocket and letting it crawl up their legs, or over their hands. Sometimes he would pinch them, and make them cry; at others he would push them so that they fell over.

In vain the curé talked to him, in vain his schoolmaster punished him, Pierre remained incorrigible.

Pierre had a little card in his bedroom on which was written, "Enfants, obéissez à vos parents"; and, although Pierre saw it many times during the day, he never followed the commandment given, and Monsieur and Madame Sagot were in despair.

They dearly loved their little son, but felt they must send him away from home, for he was leading little Louis into naughty ways.

Monsieur Sagot lived in a small house près de l'église.

Although the house was petite, le jardin était très grand, and contained all kinds of pretty flowers and shrubs; il y avait des roses, des marguerites, des myosotis, and many more, too numerous to mention.

At the bottom of the garden was a narrow road leading to the church.

Now, Madame Sagot allowed Pierre and Louis to play in the garden, but she had forbidden them to go to the garden gate, or to open it, or to play on the road.

One day, late in August, Pierre thought he would just go to the gate, to see if he could see his petit ami Jean, who lived at the ferme à côté de l'église.

Little Louis went toddling after him, and they peeped through the gate together; but as no Jean was to be seen, they opened the garden gate, and as nobody was looking, they went on to the road, to see if Jean were anywhere in view.

Suddenly a large cart laden with blé turned the corner. The horses could not be stopped quickly enough; le pauvre petit Louis became frightened, and Pierre did not seem able to move.

The road was very narrow at this point, and the fermier could do nothing but shout to the children to get out of the way; but it was too late, the first horse knocked poôr little Louis down, the heavy cart passed over him, and he was killed.

Pierre's disobedience was the cause of his little brother's death.

And Pierre? Poor little Pierre! You have had a bitter lesson to learn, but may it help you in future years to remember the words of the Bon Dieu who loves us all:

"Enfants, obéissez à vos parents;" and again: "Honore ton père et ta mère, afin que tes jours se prolongent dans le pays, que l'Eternel, ton Dieu, te donne."

DORA CHESTERFIELD.

St. Genevieve's Bones.

NO doubt when you are grown up many of you will visit the country that is nearest our own. Of course, you know all about France, its capital, its religion, and people. I am not going to give you a geography lesson, but just to tell you something that I saw one day in a church in Paris, and which I have never forgotten. It was the church of St. Geneviève, not a large church, but an important one, because there lies buried the patron saint of Paris, Saint Geneviève; a good lady who lived and died many hundred years ago. Roman Catholics believe that some good people who have died and gone to heaven can hear their prayers and ask Jesus to answer them. It is very sad that they should thus pray to saints who, however good, cannot hear them, and have no power at all to answer them.

Saint Geneviève's tomb is a very beautiful one, enclosed in a railing and covered with ornamentations of brass. On the top of the railing are spikes on which lighted candles are put by people who come to pray at the tomb of the saint. A very well-dressed lady drove up to the church in a handsome carriage, and entered the door just as I was going in. She held by the hand a little girl about five years old. She walked straight up to St. Geneviève's tomb, and handed a little silver locket and chain to the black-robed priest who stood at the iron gate of the railed enclosure. To my great surprise the priest, muttering carelessly some Latin words, opened a little door at the end of the tomb and put the chain inside!

The lady knelt down beside the tomb, and repeated some prayers that she had learnt; but she looked about the church all the time that she was doing so. Unfortunately, she thought that it was the saying of the words which made the prayer, whereas we know that if we say no words at all, but speak to God alone in our own hearts when we really need Him, He will hear us.

After a time the priest opened the door of the tomb again, and took out the little silver chain. Again muttering some Latin words, he gave it back to the mother, who immediately fastened it round the child's neck. Then she produced a candle, which she had bought at the door on entering, placed it on one of the spikes, and left it burning while she returned to her carriage with her little daughter.

I was rather puzzled to know what these things meant, but I soon found out that the chain was put into the tomb to touch the bones of the saint, which, being so holy, were supposed to give some mysterious blessing to anything that came in contact with them. The chain was then placed round her child's neck, and would never be removed. And all her life Saint Geneviève would be the child's patron saint, to watch over her and keep her from harm—so the child was taught. This was the belief of that poor mother. How childish it seems to us! It would almost make us smile if we did not feel so sorry that she and so many thousands of others should be so deceived. We know that it is only Jesus Christ who can keep us from harm, and that it is only in Him that we should trust, not in saints, or so called holy relics, which have no power whatever. We must pray for the poor Roman Catholics of France, and of other countries too, that they may be shown the way to Jesus and Him alone.

EDITH M. BELL.

The Boy who Helps His Mother.

As I went down the street to-day
I saw a little lad,
Whose face was just the kind of face
To make a person glad.
I saw him busily at work,
While blithe as blackbird's song,
His merry, mellow whistle rang
The pleasant street along.

Just then a playmate came along,
And leaned across the gate,
A plan that promised lots of fun
And frolic to relate.
"The boys are waiting for us now,
So hurry up," he cried.
My little whistler shook his head,
And "Can't come," he replied.

"Can't come? Why not, I'd like to know?
What hinders?" asked the other.
"Why, don't you see?" came the reply,
"I'm busy helping mother.
She's lots to do, and so I like
To help her all I can;
So I've no time for fun just now,"
Said this dear little man.

"I like to hear you talk like that,"
I told the little lad;
"Help mother all you can, and make Her kind heart light and glad."
It does me good to think of him,
And know that there are others
Who, like this manly little boy,
Take hold and help their mothers.

In Memoriam.

Many of you, perhaps, have seen the name "Lily Kinvig," as you have looked for your own in the lists. You will be sorry to hear that hers will never be seen in the lists again, for she was laid to rest on New Year's Day. She was just thirteen years of age, and her short life, for the last five years, has been one of weakness and sometimes pain. Lily had been a diligent little "Searcher" for two years, and although not successful in gaining prizes, her name was very often in the "Honours List." You will, I am sure, join me in sincere and loving sympathy for her father, grandmother, and little sister Brada, who loved her so well, and who will feel her loss so keenly.

Luke iii. 1-17.

Golden Text.—"Prepare ye the way of the Lord." Luke iii. 4.

Introduction.

THE forerunner of the Messiah comes before us to-day, to prepare for his coming. Suddenly John the Baptist begins to preach to the people in a way they have not heard before. "Repentance," "Confession of sin," "Preparation" for the coming of the Christ are his themes.

Plan for the Blackboard.

Key to the Diagram.—John the Baptist preached "Repentance," telling the people the sins they must put out of their lives before the Messiah could enter. Verse 5. Valley of "Sins of Omission"; mountains of "pride" and "selfishness"; crooked and rough places of "backbiting," "grumbling," "dishonesty," "cruelty," "formalism." Verses 8, 13, 14. All must be cleared out.

The People Mentioned.

Verses 1, 2. Tiberius Cæsar, Roman Emperor; Pontius Pilate, Governor or Procurator; Herod, Philip, Lysanias, rulers over portions of country; Annas, father-in-law of Caiaphas; Caiaphas, High Priest; John, the son of Zacharias.

Who John was: Luke i. 5, 13-17, 57-66—Son of Zacharias and Elizabeth.

Verse 4. "The voice," &c.; Matt. iii. 1, "Baptist;" Malachi iii. 1, "Messenger." His clothes, food, and where he lived are given in Matt. iii. 1, 4.

What he came for: To proclaim the coming of the Messiah; to preach repentance (verses 4, 5).

Verse 5. Jesus Christ, the Great Redeemer of the world, was to come amongst the people; but the people must be prepared for Him, and John the Baptist was chosen by God to be the forerunner (explain, go before, get the way ready for the King) and prepare the people. It is the same now; the Lord Jesus can only come to prepared hearts, and can only walk with those who are going in the way of the Lord, the way of holiness. (Isa. xxxviii. 8-10).

Verse 6. Mr. Moody explained this verse as follows:—"Fill up the valleys, sins of omission, defects of prayer, of love, of work, of faith. Bring down mountains of pride, selfishness, sin, unbelief, worldliness. Straighten out the crooked ways of sin. Smooth the rough places of temper, fault-finding."

Verse 7. Many came; all sorts of people, and amongst them publicans (tax collectors) and soldiers.

Verse 8. There must be no boasting of descent. The Jews were proud of this, but it would not lead them to heaven (John viii. 39).

Verses 10, 12, 14. The cry through all ages and to-day, too, "What shall we do?" Repent and believe (Acts xvi. 30, 31).

11. Be unselfish, be kind, tender hearted. 13. Be honest. 14. There must be no cruelty, no back-biting, no grumbling. 15. Such wonderful things, such a new sort of life John taught, people began to think he was the Messiah. 16. No, indeed! See John's humility (John iii. 30).

Lessons we Learn.

One great point is very clear. Jesus Christ wants to come into our lives, but He can only come to hearts that repent of sin, and long to live a new life—a changed life (2 Cor. v. 17). Need of this even in a child. Verse 16. Fire. He will purify our natures (Malachi iii. 2, 3).

What is Repentance?

"Repentance is a change of mind leading to a change of conduct."

It is giving up sin after confessing it to God (Matt. iii. 6).

Christian Endeavour.

TOPIC FOR JAN. 14.

In the Far Country.—Luke xv. 11-24.

YOU need not travel far to reach the far country, not to Paris, San Francisco, or Rangoon. One thought of sin, the wings of one passionate evil desire, the lightning flash of a look, may land you as far from God as the east is from the west. From where you sit you can reach the far country without leaving your seat.

The essence of the far country is selfishness. See, the stress of the prodigal's emphasis is on himself! Give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. He desired to enjoy the father's goods and gifts apart from the father's person. This is sin. It is not wrong to make use of and enjoy all the good and perfect gifts with which God strews our life, so long as they are held with thankful and devout recognition of Himself. The wrong arises where God's gifts, apart from God, without the thankful recognition of God, are the centre and object of your being, thinking, and acting.

Where God is absent there is waste, for we lack the one object which gathers up all our activities for a worthy focus, and affords a sufficient goal for our endeavours; riot, because in the absence of God there is no sufficient corrective or antidote for strong and masterful passion; want, because the soul was made for God, and can never be satisfied till it rests in Him. Give it what you will, and it turns wearily and unsatisfied away like the moaning ocean when it cannot rest, crying with Solomon, He hath put eternity in my heart—vanity of vanities, all is vanity. Yes, and the want which an ungodly man feels in this life is only the beginning of an eternal want. In Gehenna the rich man lifted up his eyes, being in torment, and asked that Lazarus might bring one drop of water to quench the fire of his thirst.

How absurd it is for a man who to disjoin himself from God and to join himself to a citizen in the Land of Forgetfulness! It is like leaving the fountain of living waters, and hewing out a cistern that can hold none. The citizens of this world have no recipe to give the starving soul of man, save to send it forth to feed the swine, which stand always for the lower desires of our nature. This is the alternative which too many wiseacres suggest, "See life, take your fill of pleasure, indulge yourself, fill the hours with revelry, amusement, companions, dissipation." This is feeding swine. But the hunger of the soul cannot be appeased thus. It arises amid all the scenes of debauchery and revelry to which it has been driven, and would fain fill itself with husks. But though husks are good for swine, they will not suffice for the sons of men. Have you not found it so? You cannot rest in that which contents others. You cannot abide amid scenes that reach their furthest longings. From the stinking candle-dips, you long for the eternal constellation. From the fœtid swine-troughs you pine for the servants' fare at home. From the stagnant pools you thirst for the crystal water, which flows from the Eternal Throne.

Under such circumstances a man will come to himself. There is a better self in most of us which resents the carob-beans, and cries out. When we go from God we go from ourselves. When we come back to ourselves we come back to the Father.

The son thought that he must bribe his father. He wanted to be made as one of the hired servants; that is, he wanted to earn his keep, to merit his maintenance, to induce his father's goodwill by the bribe of service. But his father would have none of it, he stopped his confession when it reached the point of making this stipulation. No, it must be a matter of pure grace from the first kiss of welcome to the reinstatement in the old place at the family board. Oh, believe in the love of God, which yearns after the prodigal in his departure, which never forgets him for a moment during his absence, which even rejoices in the advent of the famine, and contrives it, and which waits in a coign of vantage on the way back, watching to meet the first distant advances in the return! "When ye was yet a great way off, the father saw him."

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOUR NOTES.

In China to-day there are about 400 Christian Endeavour Societies, and more than 10,000 Endeavourers.

Endeavourers in San Francisco organized a society in a regiment just starting for Manilla. Of 110 men over eighty took the pledge, and good results are promised, as they are all of the same company, and can keep together.

Jamaica has just held its seventh Convention—and the best. It has now eighty-eight young people's societies, and thirty-one junior, with a total membership of nearly 7,000. At this Convention the West Indian Christian Endeavour Union was organized, comprising the islands of Jamaica, Cuba, Trinidad, Bermuda, and the other West Indian Islands.

New Year's Day was marked in various places by several Christian Endeavour meetings. This was especially the case at Liverpool, where a "Forward March" meeting was held in St. George's Hall under the leadership of Mr. W. H. Hope. This proved a most inspiring time. Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., was one of the speakers.

A most inspiring Annual Convention has also been held by the Cleveland and South Durham Union, when Miss M. Jennie Street gave a really magnificent address. The whole of the meetings were instinct with holy power, and New Year's Day will be remembered as a very real Pentecost by the many who were privileged to be present.

The Week of Prayer.

FOR many years it has been usual with evangelical believers to devote the first days of the New Year to special prayer, and the gatherings arranged in this connection by the Evangelical Alliance have afforded to many a welcome opportunity to wait unitedly on God. The sense of national need, and the desire so widely expressed for a definite season of humiliation and prayer, served this year to attract greater attention than usual to the meetings.

There was a large attendance on Monday at the noon gathering at Exeter Hall. The spirit evinced throughout was one of earnest desire to be cleansed from individual and national sins, and of thanksgiving for God's goodness. After a few brief remarks by the chairman, Mr. W. H. Seagram, on Daniel ix., Rev. F. B. Meyer addressed the meeting. After referring to the message, "We are hard pressed," recently received from Ladysmith, as typical of the condition of Great Britain, he contended that the national mission was not yet completed. She still stood, in spite of her sins, for progress, good order, and civilization, but needed to be cleansed and purified by passing through the fire. Mr. Meyer pointed out the striking parallel between the call to prayer to-day and that given in Isaiah i. God's answer was that our prayers and offerings would not prevail until we humbled ourselves before Him, and, with earnest hearts, strove to cast from our midst drunkenness, gambling, immorality, pride, love of money, and many other evils. When we sought to do this his forgiveness and strength would rest upon us, and we should come "the city of righteousness, the faithful city."

At Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A., Mr. Basil Hewer presided, and the chief speaker was Rev. H. L. C. de Candole, of St. Paul's, Canonbury, who gave an address on John xvi. 23, 24. He submitted that the great need of the Church and the world was prayer, and lamented the want of importance attached thereto. In considering the suitability of a minister, for instance, people too frequently asked: "Is he a good preacher? Is he attractive?" rather than: "Is he a man of prayer?" Mr. de Candole, remarking on the stress and bustle of modern life, said people appeared to consider it a loss of time to spend time alone with God. He recalled Dr. Pierson's anecdote of the two telegraphists, one of whom stayed in charge of the office, which communicated directly with Scotland, while the other went out to collect items of news. When the latter returned he failed to obtain admission, his friend having, apparently, fallen asleep. Going to another telegraph office, the seeker despatched a message to Edinburgh, asking the clerk in that city to wire back into the office, and thereby awaken the slumbering operator. This was done; the nearest way to that man, so close at hand, was round by Edinburgh, and so the nearest way to the hearts and lives of men and women around us was by the throne of grace. Mr. de Candole concluded with a forcible exhortation to prayer for personal and national shortcomings.

At the Centenary Hall, Mr. Frank Bevan presided, and Rev. Ll. H. Parsons instanced, among many reasons for deep thankfulness to God, the pure life and sweet example of the Queen, and the trend of thought in the churches "back to Christ." At the same time the catalogue of national sins was a terrible one, but God was ready to forgive, plenteous in mercy.

DONATIONS

Received by Messrs. Morgan and Scott, to Monday, January 8th, 1900.

 Will donors oblige by stating explicitly and fully the titles of the institutions to which they wish their donations to be applied? Further correspondence will thus be obviated.

 Cheques, Money Orders, or Postal Orders should be made payable to Messrs. Morgan and Scott, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C., and crossed "London City and Midland Bank, Ltd."; this will effectually prevent loss.

London Lock Hospital and Rescue Home.—An expenditure of nearly £4,000 has been incurred this year, in the reconstruction of the drainage, the improvement in nurses' accommodation, and other things which it was difficult for the Board to avoid. Whilst this necessary outlay has improved the hospital immensely, it has exhausted the funds. The secretary is Mr. A. W. Cruikshank, who may be addressed at the Hospital, Harrow Road, W.

Prince of Wales' Hospital Fund.—Very gratifying is the report of deepened interest in the Prince of Wales' Hospital Fund. An increase in its income of £9,000 over that of last year is itself encouraging. More particularly are we gladdened by the record that the number of hospitals receiving the attention of the visiting committee of the Fund has increased from fifty-eight to eighty-one. Its usefulness is thus extended over a much wider area than heretofore. This also means that a larger number of patients will have derived benefit from the Fund.

Temperance Workers of all shades will welcome the recommendations contained in Lord Peel's Minority Report of the Royal Commission on the Licensing Laws, which should be carefully studied with a view to concerted action thereon. Their issue has well been hailed as "an epoch in the history of the campaign." The principal recommendations, with a valuable contribution from the pen of Mr. James P. R. Lyell, have been published in pamphlet form at 3d. by Mr. Sydney Mayle, of Hampstead, and 20. St. John's Square, E.C.

URGENT.

To complete the Good Samaritan Work of the

"Liberator" Relief Fund.

After seven years' earnest pleading, a further £10,000, or 200,000 shillings, still urgently needed to give relief to hundreds of aged, destitute, and afflicted victims of the great "Liberator" fraud, who were taught and trained in habits of temperance and thrift by their trusted leaders, only to find themselves suddenly robbed of their life-savings, and driven to face the dreaded workhouse, in spite of all their praiseworthy endeavours to make some provision for their old age.

Ninety per cent. of these sufferers are members of some section of the Christian Church.

"Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the Law of Christ.

There are 2,830 cases on the Books of the Fund, of whom 1,500 are Widows or Spinsters. 690 are over 70 years of age. 1,460 are over 60 years of age. Over 300 deaths through the disaster.

THE BITTER CRY FOR HELP

Is still coming to the Committee from sufferers who have bravely borne with their difficulties, till sickness or great destitution has compelled them to apply.

Cheques and P.O.'s should be made payable to the "Liberator" Relief Fund, crossed "The London City and Midland Bank," and sent to the Secretary,

Obituary.

REV. H. L. MACKENZIE, D.D.

THE death is announced, at Swatow, of Rev. H. L. Mackenzie, D.D., senior missionary of the Presbyterian Church of England. Dr. Mackenzie had not been in robust health for some time, but his very presence on the field, his influence amongst the students in the Swatow Theological College, his occasional precious visits to the churches beyond the central station, were an inspiration to his brethren and to the native workers; and the gracious and beloved man of God will be sorely missed. He had nearly completed forty years of service.

MRS. SUSAN DOUGLAS.

We regret to announce the death of Mrs. Susan Douglas, wife of Rev. James Douglas, M.A., who passed away at their residence, 48, Lambert Road, Brixton, S.W., on Sunday morning last. Mrs. Douglas had been the invaluable helpmeet of her husband for nearly twenty-eight years of married life, and throughout his long and eventful ministry.

It is impossible to over-estimate the great loss he and his sorrowing family have sustained in this sudden loss. Mr. Douglas has been pastor of Kenyon Baptist Church, Brixton, for over fifteen years, during which time Mrs. Douglas has, by her faithfulness and co-operation, endeared herself to all.

MRS. A. BOAKE.

The death of Mrs. A. Boake, which occurred on New Year's Day, at Loughton, will be regretted by a wide circle of friends. Mrs. Boake's early married life was spent near Stratford. Subsequently, on removing to Highgate, she took an active part, with her husband, in work at Chomeley Hall. She had more recently laboured in connection with the new hall erected by Mr. Boake, at Loughton. Mrs. Boake was a cordial friend of many missionary undertakings. The Figueras Mission, in Spain, found in her a sympathetic helper, and the needs of young women in Armenia were much upon her heart. The deceased lady will long be remembered for her gracious spirit, her helpful conversation, and her many acts of thoughtfulness towards the poor.

MR. JOHN G. M'VICKER.

Last Friday evening Mr. John G. M'Vicker, of Clapton Hall, N.E., "fell asleep in Jesus." To know him was to know a man who "walked with God." He often expressed the desire that he might, if the Lord so willed, be saved from a lingering illness, and his desire was granted. On the day of his departure he was fully occupied in the blessed ministry of visiting and comforting others. About 7.30 p.m. he retired to his own room for a quiet season with the Lord, and at 8 p.m., "he was not, for God took him."

In England, Scotland, and Ireland, his service for Christ has been greatly valued for many years, and many to-day will feel a distinct sense of personal loss in the removal of one whose life as well as words ministered Grace. All will prayerfully sympathize with his widow, who has been his helpmeet and companion in service for nearly fifty years. Mr. M'Vicker was in his seventy-fourth year.

Ram's Episcopal Chapel, Homerton.—The scheme for providing a parsonage for this place of worship has been brought to a successful issue. The fund was opened in November 1898, and the needed amount was realized within a year. The total expenditure was about £1,120, and the contributions exceeded this by £13. The members of the congregation did their part nobly in this matter, and they were supported by the generous aid of several Protestant and evangelical friends outside. The possession of a freehold residence for the Incumbent will greatly strengthen the position of this historic church in North-East London. During the ministry of Rev. F. J. Hamilton, D.D., it has taken a more decided and aggressive attitude in opposing Ritualism and Romanism, and the remarkable success of this undertaking shows that such decided and uncompromising attitude finds favour with a considerable section of the Christian public.

The Churches.

Church of England.

Mr. Walter Walsh is at work upon a new "History of the Oxford Movement." He has obtained access to a number of manuscripts relating to the early history of the movement.

Archdeacon Eyre has offered the incumbency of St. James's, Sheffield, vacant by the death of Rev. James Battersby, to Rev. E. V. Everard, a son of Rev. George Everard, who is at present in charge of the Navvy Mission at Langsett. Mr. Everard has accepted the offer.

The Bishop of Ballarat has announced his resignation of the See. Dr. Samuel Thornton was in charge of St. Jude, Whitechapel, from 1860 to 1864, and Rector of St. George's, Birmingham, from 1864 to 1875, when he was appointed Bishop of Ballarat. He recently paid a prolonged visit to this country.

The venerable Bishop of Liverpool, now resting quietly at his Liverpool residence, is somewhat feeble in health, but evinces keen interest in all the affairs of the diocese. He received a large number of New Year's letters, couched in appropriate language, and emphasizing the good wishes and esteem of the writers.

The Bishop of Chester has written to the Press expressing regret that, "through a well-meant but most cruel kindness, our Reservists are being tempted at the solemn and touching hour of farewell to become the victims of drink. It is a most unhallowed and ill-omened beginning of what is in itself a noble enterprise."

The Bishop of Ripon, in his pastoral for the new year, urges that the year should be set apart for special intercession and prayer. He says: "I suggest, first, that our people should be invited to pray continuously throughout the year for the outpouring upon the Church and the world of that Divine Spirit who alone can bring peace and concord and the spread of the righteous kingdom of Christ among mankind; secondly, that the first Sunday in each month, together with the Saturday that precedes and the Monday that follows it, should be set apart for special intercession."

Congregational.

Rev. A. Thompson, secretary of Tettenhall College, has accepted the secretaryship of Cheshunt College.

"The story of D. L. Moody," writes Dr. Guinness Rogers, "has a moral for all our churches. If we are to be a power in the world, we must adhere faithfully to this ruling idea of his life. In other words, we must be evangelistic as well as evangelical."

At Golborne Road Church, North Kensington, the pastor, Rev. R. Mackay, recently made special appreciative reference to the life and work of the great evangelist, the late Mr. D. L. Moody, and a resolution of sympathy with the family was passed by the entire congregation, and ordered to be sent to Mr. Moody's son at Northfield, Mass.

On Sunday evening last, Rev. E. M. Edmunds informed the members of the English Congregational Church at Ruabon, where he has ministered for over thirteen years, that he had received a unanimous invitation to become associate pastor to Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, of Tollington Park Church, London, with charge of the church in Caledonian Road, Holloway. Mr. Edmunds added that he had decided to accept the invitation, and would commence his new duties on the first Sunday in February.

Baptist.

At West Green Church (Rev. John Edmonds), a meeting was recently held to take farewell of one of its members, Rev. E. Tomalin, who is leaving to undertake work in China.

Mr. Thomas Spurgeon is expected to be at the Baptist Young People's Union Convention in Cincinnati, Ohio, in July, 1900. The invitation is at the instance of the Business Men's League of Cincinnati.

Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon gets weaker rather than stronger, and her serious and prolonged illness is causing great anxiety to those about her. All that medical skill, loving service, and earnest prayer can accomplish is being done for her.

At Wellington Street Church, Stockton-on-Tees, on Sunday last, Rev. F. J. Feltham announced that, owing to domestic affliction, he had felt compelled to tender his resignation of the pastorate, and that his ministry would conclude on the first Sunday in May.

On New Year's Day the pastor of Northcote Road Church, London, S.W., Rev. J. Felmingham, sat to receive gifts for the Debt Fund from the members of the church and congregation. The donations received amounted to £160. During the past year the church has raised, on behalf of this fund, £836.

A new departure in church building is being effected by the Hanson Place Baptist Church, New York, of which Rev. Dr. A. C. Dixon is the pastor. In the plans for the new place of worship, the church is arranging for an open-air auditorium on the roof, and elevators will be constructed to reach it. Many people, it is believed, might be induced to go to church if they could sit on the roof.

The first interim report of contributions and promises to the Baptist Twentieth Century Fund shows that the total sum already promised is £84,247 10s., including—from churches in the Baptist Union in England, £73,953 14s. 8d.; not in the Baptist Union, £1,850 4s. 8d.; in the Baptist Union of Wales, £1,928 6s. 6d.; in the Baptist Union in Scotland, £273 14s. 6d.; in the Baptist Union in Ireland, £5,599 15s. 6d.

Methodist.

The Wesleyan Conference recommends that on Sunday next special sermons should be preached in every Wesleyan chapel, and special addresses given in all Sunday schools, on the objects of the Twentieth Century Fund. The total number of guineas promised is 663,077, and the total amount actually received up to date is £161,858 2s.

Rev. W. L. Watkinson says that he can only smile at the forebodings of critics who, in pessimistic newspaper paragraphs, proclaim the breakdown of the Methodist Million Scheme. He points with justifiable pride to the amount already paid in, £160,000, and says that those who stand in doubt as to the success of the movement do not yet understand Methodism. He urges the necessity of detailed organization and patient effort, for thousands of members have not yet risen to the occasion.

Presbyterian.

Rev. Dr. Stewart, retiring Moderator of the Free Church of Scotland, has safely reached South Africa, and will soon resume his duties as Principal of the College at Lovedale. Before leaving, fifteen friends united in presenting him with gifts amounting to £1,760 towards his educational and other work.

A new Calvinistic Methodist Chapel has been opened at Carmel, near Holywell, to replace the old and dilapidated one erected nearly a century ago. The chapel is situated on an eminence overlooking the Dee estuary, and presents a handsome and substantial appearance. Seating accommodation is provided for 200 persons. The total cost is about £800.

The induction of Rev. James Nairn (formerly of America, and recently assistant at Prospect Street, Hull) to the pastorate at East India Road, recently took place. There was a good attendance of members of Presbytery. Rev. Duncan Macrae acted as Moderator. He dwelt on the need for personal piety and consecration, for earnest Gospel preaching, and for aggressive Christian work.

Society of Friends.

Charles W. and Annie Goddard have been visiting the meetings in Derby, Lincoln, and Notts quarterly meeting. Three meetings were held in a new mission hall recently built by H. Keymer Burtt in his garden at Brandon Lodge, Broughton, which were blessed. They are visiting meetings in Bedfordshire during the present week.

At Lewes and Chichester monthly meeting, Arthur Dann was cordially liberated to hold series of meetings for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of believers in places where aggressive work is carried on in our meeting-houses, within the compass of London and Dublin yearly meetings. The first mission is arranged for Colchester from the 4th to the 11th of Second-month next.

Charles D. Tearell has visited La Pallice. The people seem very grateful for being thought of, and say that if a regular meeting were held many of them would attend it, there being at present no place of worship at La Pallice. It is intended to open the hall there occasionally as a reading and writing room, especially when the mail steamers are in port, and this would, doubtless, greatly extend its influence.

Fallen Asleep.

Mr. A. H. WILSON, shipbuilder, of Aberdeen, has died at Mentone. He was an attached member of Carden Place U.P. Church, Aberdeen.—The death of Mr. BUCKLEY, Bridgend, Glamorgan, deprives the town of a gentleman who had rendered Methodism valued service. He was highly esteemed for his ability as a lay preacher.—At Dorridge, Warwickshire, MARY WINGATE, wife of Arthur Birt West, and daughter of Rev. Dr. McLaren.—The Baptist church at Leamington mourns the loss by death of Mr. THOMAS WILLCOX, for many years a deacon.—Mrs. JAMES CLARKE, the aged widow of the founder and editor of the Christian World. She had passed her eightieth birthday, and had survived her husband twelve years.—Rev. W. M. BABBOUR, D.D., late Principal of the Congregational College in Montreal.—Rev. GEORGE Y. JEFFREYS, of Cape Town. He commenced his ministry at Glastonbury over fifty years ago. He served the South African Congregational Union as secretary and chairman.—Rev. WILLIAM HEATON, Rector of Morville-with-Aston Eyre, Shropshire, aged sixty-four. Mr. Heaton, who was a staunch evangelical, was a distinguished scholar, and an active worker all his life.—Mr. HENRY SALMON, a well-known worker in Fulham, died on Friday, January 5, of peritonitis, after three days' illness. The deceased, a member and lay preacher in the Wesleyan Church, was a willing and effective helper in Christian work of whatever denomination. He also took a prominent part in temperance, educational, and philanthropic efforts.

Appeals.

Sister Frances, of Victoria Park Wesleyan Methodist Church, asks help to extend a scheme for helping very poor women by giving them plain needlework to do. The garments they make are sold, and fresh material then purchased. The stock of goods on hand must be sold, as the funds are almost exhausted. Ladies are asked to order parcels or otherwise assist. Sister Frances' address is 33, Gore Road, N.E.

Rev. C. P. Baxter would be pleased to hear from a lady or gentleman who would kindly play the American organ and lead the singing at the chapel services at 6 p.m. on Sundays and Fridays at St. Clement Dane's Almshouses, Garratt Lane, Tooting. Also some one who would do the same on Wednesdays at 10.30 a.m. It would be a help and encouragement to the elderly people attending the services. Mr Baxter's address is Catesby, Gleneagle Road, Streatham, S.W.

Personalia.

Mr. CHARLES ANDERSON, whose name is well known in connection with Glasgow Polytechnic Warehouse and Tolbooth Mission Hall, has gone to South Africa, at his own cost, to act as Scripture reader among the soldiers.

Mr. FRANK WEAVER and Miss LALLAY JOHANSEN were united in marriage at the Great Assembly Hall, Mile End, on the 20th ult. The service was conducted by Mr. R. C. Morgan. A considerable congregation gathered to witness the marriage and wish the happy pair every blessing. The wedding breakfast took place in one of the large rooms attached to the hall.

The Committee of the Bible Society have granted six months' leave of absence to Rev. J. G. WATT, the editorial superintendent, who is suffering from serious illness. Canon Girdlestone, who for some years held the post of superintendent of the translating and editorial department, has volunteered to take temporary charge of Mr. Watt's work, and his offer has been gratefully accepted.

Sheffield.—The third annual meeting of the Gospel Protestant Mission has been held at Christ Church, Ecclesall, the new home of the Mission. A satisfactory report of the past year's work was read by Mr. E. T. Hodgson, hon. pastor of the mission, and addresses were given by Rev. A. McKittrick and Mr. E. Redmond. The cost of the new church was £1,382, of which there is still £715 to raise.

Scottish Notes.

LAST week a two days' New Year Convention was held in the Baptist Church, Cambuslang. On the first day addresses were given by Rev. John Urquhart, on "The Grace of God;" Rev. A. Miller (secretary of the Baptist Union), on "The Peace of God;" and by Mrs. Todd Osborne, on "The Gospel of God: its Power in Transforming British Soldiers." On the second day a conference on "Our Standing in Christ" was opened by Mr. W. D. Dunn. Rev. John Harper spoke on "Our Fellowship with Christ;" and the President of the Baptist Union (Rev. P. J. Rollo) on "The Priesthood of Believers."

In the course of a visit to Scotland, Mr. William Forbes invited to luncheon, last Wednesday, in the Christian Institute, Glasgow, the ballet and chorus ladies of the theatres of the city, when addresses were given by himself and Rev. George Gladstone, minister of North Dundas Street E.U. Congregational Church. The ladies present numbered about forty, and the company would have been larger but for an extra performance at one of the theatres.

An hospital ship—to be named the Alpha—was recently launched, and is now being fitted out at Leith, as the gift of an anonymous donor to the Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen.

The Edinburgh Magdalene Asylum is now on a self-supporting basis, and was recently extended by the addition of a new wing. The inmates in December numbered ninety-one; while during the year thirty women had been placed in respectable situations, and twenty restored to their friends.

Professor White's Bible Studies.

DEAR SIR,—Very many of your readers will be interested to learn that arrangements have now been concluded with Professor W. W. White to resume his course of Bible studies in this country from April to July, the details of which will be announced in due course.

The prayers which his sudden illness evoked last year will now doubtless be renewed by all his friends, that in all spiritual and physical health and vigour his addresses may be greatly blessed to his hearers, and the living Word of God, our Lord and Master Jesus Christ, may be glorified.—Yours faithfully,

J. H. Tritton.

Correction.—Our Irish correspondent desires us to say that he was misinformed in stating that the proprietor of the theatre in Limerick was a Roman Catholic, and regrets that this mistake should have occurred.

The Late Mr. H. L. Hastings.—Those who know the grand work done by the late Mr. Hastings will learn with satisfaction that efforts are being made to bring out a large memorial edition of the striking booklet, "The Inspiration of the Bible: Will the Old Book Stand?" It is believed that a million copies could be circulated with advantage, and several English friends have subscribed towards the fund of £1,000 now being raised for the purpose. Communications to Mr. J. K. Hastings, son of the deceased, may be addressed 47, Cornhill, Boston, Mass., U.S.A.

The Boys' Brigade, at home and abroad, has for its object the advancement of Christ's kingdom among boys, and the promotion of habits of obedience, reverence, discipline, self-respect, and all that makes for true Christian manliness. To attain this end, the methods adopted include Bible classes, drills, parades, athletic and other clubs. Thus it is not merely attempting to teach the boy during one or two hours of the week, but to surround him with Christian influences, and provide for his spare time healthy pursuits. The membership of the Brigade is steadily increasing. The roll for the United Kingdom alone comprises 812 companies, 2,889 officers, and 35,148 boys. In addition to these there are now several companies in the Colonies. From this it will be seen that the organization is gaining ground, and although this extension means an increase of expenditure, the executive rely upon the contributions of friends to meet the necessary requirements. The secretary may be addressed at the headquarters, 162, Buchanan Street, Glasgow.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE address of the North East Metropolitan District Union of Y.M.C.A.'s and East London Young Men's Fund is now Hamilton House, Bishopsgate Street, E.C.

At Canning Town Y.M.C.A. the Sunday evening services for the people have been resumed in the large Public Hall, Barking Road. Dr. Anderson, C.B., was the speaker last week. Volunteer canvassers are urgently needed in this district. Apply to Mr. F. L. Porter, Y.M.C.A., Hackney.

The new year's annual reception of Hackney Association has been held at the invitation of Mr. J. E. Vanner, the president. There was a large attendance, and the proceedings were of an enthusiastic character. A hearty welcome was given to the new assistant secretary, Mr. A. E. Shaltock, of Bristol. A warm God-speed was given to Mr. A. N. Salmon, the fourteenth missionary from the Hackney Association, who was bound for work on the Niger under Bishop Tugwell.

Mr. W. Ross is succeeded at Derby by Mr. F. W. White, of Cornhill Y.M.C.A. Mr. J. Palmer Howard, of Hanley, has been appointed to Carlisle; and is followed at Hanley by Mr. F. J. Chamberlain, of Plymouth. Mr. H. D. Barclay, of Dunscore, N.B., has accepted the general secretaryship of the Paris Anglo-American Association.

News is to hand of the safe arrival in Capetown of Mr. A. H. Wheeler and party of workers, representing the Soldiers' Christian Association, auxiliary of the Y.M.C.A., and of their dispersal to various spheres of service. Their equipment consists of tents for use in the day-time as reading and writing rooms for the soldiers, and in the evening for meetings and other purposes. The Association is maintaining in all eight workers at the seat of war.

Rev. G. Soltau's Bible Studies.

THE second course of the winter series of Bible studies conducted by Rev. G. Soltau has been arranged as follows:—

Monday, January 15, Y.M.C.A., Mare Street, Hackney, 8.30 p.m., "The Person and Work of the Holy Spirit."

Tuesday, January 16, Presbyterian Hall, Quadrant Road, Richmond, 3 p.m., "The Person and Work of the Holy Spirit;" 8.15 p.m., "The Four Portraits of the Lord Jesus."

Wednesday, January 17, Conference Hall, Stratford, 8 p.m., "Numbers."

Thursday, January 18, Shaftesbury Hall, Ealing, 3.30 p.m., "The Four Portraits;" Morley Hall, George Street, Hanover Square, 8.30 p.m., "Numbers."

Friday, January 19, 4 p.m., Finsbury Institute, Finsbury Square, "The Four Portraits;" Y.M.C.A., Camden Town, 8.15 p.m., "The Gospel of John."

Full particulars can be obtained from any of these centres.

Caution.

A lady, at Hampton Wick, writes us that she has been victimised by a person who poses as a friend of Miss Agnes E. Weston, but of whom Miss Weston disclaims all knowledge.

Another correspondent desires to warn our readers against a man giving the name of James Anderson, who obtains money on the pretence that he is a deserter from the Sutherland Highlanders, and that if he can get back to Stirling by a certain time will be saved from undergoing imprisonment. He has deceived a number of Christian workers.

Lord's Day Rest Association.—A New Year's Address, issued by this Association, refers to the successful crusade against seven-day newspapers, the opposition to the Crystal Palace Sunday concerts, and the warning given to the directors by the London County Council, as to opening for trade on Sundays being contrary to the terms of the licence. The address points out that although the Sunday concerts at the Crystal Palace and Queen's Hall had been extensively advertised as in aid of the Prince of Wales' Hospital Fund, nothing had been contributed to that Fund from them. The resolution of the London School Board to let Board Schools for public meetings on Sundays was rescinded on December 14. The express Sunday delivery of letters in London had been a comparative failure, the average of such letters each Sunday being eighty-four in six months. At the eight great national museums and picture galleries in London, the attendance on the last Sunday in October was only 7,912, out of a population of some 5,000,000 persons. At Maidstone a proposal to reopen the museum on Sundays was defeated by 20 votes against 10. At Glasgow a resolution in the Town Council to open the People's Palace, Museum and Picture Gallery on Sundays was defeated by 48 votes against 12.

Mr. Charrington's Work.

WITH the month of December closed another wonderful hundred years of our earthly pilgrimage, and another decade of the work so energetically carried on by Mr. Charrington and his devoted helpers for the benefit of the lapsed masses of that part of our vast Metropolis so well known as the East End of London. Always a period of anxiety, the more so this year with families disturbed by the parting of loved ones for the seat of war, and the trying weather that all have experienced in the closing month. These circumstances rendered the average attendances even less than those generally seen at the services of the Great Assembly Hall. It has been the custom always to devote the last month of week days to Gospel Temperance. Mr. George Nokes, a leather merchant, whose business is situated in the very heart of East London, and who is so well known in connection with the theatre, service took the week nights and devoted Thursdays to illustrating his lectures by dissolving views. Few men have a greater hold upon the working classes, and "Gorgie," the Bishop of Whitechapel as he is familiarly styled, has been much blessed.

Mr. J. S. Harrison conducted the Sundays and Wednesday services. His masterly expositions, delivered in an exceedingly fluent manner with great earnestness, has gained for him a reputation which always ensures good audiences upon his visiting the hall, the solid searching Gospel from his lips penetrating many hearts that were strangers to God, and his grace bringing forth the fruit which follows faithful and unvarnished truth in the power of the Holy Ghost. The last Sunday evening service was crammed, an much blessing followed.

Awakening in Chicago.

The gatherings for study of the Scriptures in connection with the Chicago Bible Institute appear to be bearing fruit. Writing on the 27th ult., Professor W. R. Newell said:—"A spirit of increased prayerfulness among Christians is manifest; the sense of individual burdens (for personal blessing, relatives, friends) seems to be swallowed up in an increasing desire for a general outpouring of the Holy Ghost. It is with deep joy that we note this fact. The past week in my Bible classes here has been by far the most marked in apparent results of any since their commencement. Over a hundred, I judge, have confessed Christ for the first time, and I believe there has been very deep conviction among hundreds of others. We beg the prayers of your readers on our behalf, that we may not come short of God's full intention of mercy toward us at this time."

Mr. Richard Spragg has conducted a mission at Camden Hall, Birkenhead. There were signs of blessing, a number of persons seeking the Saviour.

The visit of Mrs. Baeyertz to Bedford will be long remembered as a time of refreshing by many of the Lord's people. Her addresses to believers have been most helpful, and wonderful light has been given on the Word through her exceedingly clear and spirit-taught exposition of the truth. The Gospel addresses have been blessed; many sought salvation, and our hearts are filled with praise to our God.

E. Braggins.

Mr. Jas. Neech, the Lincoln evangelist, has just concluded a fortnight's mission at Old Hay, Paddock Wood, Kent. Despite the unpropitious weather, and a great deal of prevalent sickness, the numbers attending night after night attested to the great interest which was felt on all sides in the simple, earnest, and telling addresses. There is no doubt real spiritual good was done in many instances

Mr. Bob Johnson has concluded a helpful mission in the Tolbooth Hall, Glasgow. The story of his life and conversion proved an attraction to many. Mr. Johnson, it will be remembered, yielded to Christ seven years since at a mission gathering held on the Derby day on Epsom race-course. He still plays the banjo which he used in the old days, accompanying Gospel songs of his own composition.

A correspondent at Coventry writes:—"Mr. Henry Varley's meetings are going on well, increasing in numbers and power. During the past four nights, more than seventy have confessed their reception of the Word of Life. Mr. Charles Inglis did good service in supplying Mr. Varley's place from the 31st ult. to the 2nd inst. On Wednesday evening, 3rd inst., Mr. Varley was able to be present, and spoke to a large audience on "The Wonderful Character of the Love of God." Sunday last was a

WE give this week a further selection of tributes to the late D. L. Moody, with reminiscences of himself and his work. Next week we hope to give other testimonies, and a selection of incidents arising in his fruitful life.

The friends who formed the original London Committee for organizing Mr. Moody's work in the metropolis, together with a number of workers who have been identified with Mr. Moody during recent years, met a few days since at Exeter Hall, when it was decided to hold two large memorial gatherings on the afternoon and evening of Tuesday, February 6, in Exeter Large Hall. At these meetings brief addresses will be given by friends who have been closely associated with Mr. Moody's work both in England and America, and testimony will be given as to the value and permanence of the work in this country. It is proposed that at the evening meeting a lantern exhibition shall be given, showing the buildings, both in England and America, which have been erected through Mr. Moody's instrumentality. The Committee will be glad to receive in writing testimonies regarding results of Mr. Moody's work, and they will specially value any reports of missions and other agencies which have been established as a result of Mr. Moody's campaigns in this country. Communications should be addressed to the hon. sec., Mr. J. H. Putterill, Exeter Hall, Strand, W.C.

In accord with the express desire of the evangelist, a biography is now being prepared by his son, Mr. W. R. Moody. Only work from that source will be regarded as authorized; and in view of the misrepresentations of some publications professing to outline Mr. Moody's life, the family is discouraging unofficial biographical efforts.

As we intimated last week, the official life will do much to help the great institutions reared by Mr. Moody. On this subject Dr. Cuyler writes to us:

> The Northfield Schools will be Moody's permanent monument. To let them die out, would be an incalculable calamity. No truer evidence of grateful love to the mightiest evangelist of this century can be given than by perpetuating those glorious training schools for Christ. Let Britain remember Northfield also.

As will be remembered, an Endowment Fund is to be raised in the interest of these noble institutions.

One of the lessons pointed by the life and work of Mr. Moody was the great importance of Christian workers being grounded in Scripture knowledge. Dr. Witton Davies, of the Bangor Colleges, whose qualified admiration of the evangelist adds to the weight of his words, says in his letter on page 22:

> I am heart and soul with him in the desire to have young men, looking forward to any kind of Christian ministry, all alive in spiritual things, and saturated through and through with the history, prophecy, poetry, &c., contained within the covers of our English Bible.

Yes; and the knowledge, to be of any worth, must be heart-digested as well as head-received. With the Word of God in mind and spirit, the servant of the Lord is "completely furnished unto every good work."

With the view of placing the special monthly part of The Christian—containing the "D. L. Moody Memorial Numbers"—within the reach of everybody, our publishers have decided to issue it at fourpence, instead of sixpence as previously announced. In covers printed in red and black on art enamel paper, and embellished with an exquisite portrait of Mr. Moody, family groups, and views of Northfield, specially reproduced, these numbers will form a fitting memento of the great evangelist and his work. The part, for which it is expected there will be a large demand, will be ready on 25th inst. (post free, 7d.) To prevent disappointment, orders should be given without delay.

The New Year has come in under the shadow of widespread suffering. Even the war is not so fatal as the influenza epidemic which is raging over the whole land, and is claiming a large number of distinguished men and women as its victims. Only once or twice during its history has it reaped such a harvest of death as during the first fortnight of this year. Congregations are greatly lessened, and show the prevalent depression in many ways. It is a time of trial for the faith of many, and in the situation we find a call to earnest prayer and dependence on the divine mercy and love. It is also an opportunity for the exercise of the finest Christian graces—love, sympathy, hopefulness, helpfulness. Outward calamities call for the manifestation of the highest qualities.

However varied may be the opinions of our readers concerning war in general, or this war in particular, there can be no difference of judgment as to the needs of our soldiers at the front, some of whom are undergoing the most terrible sufferings with heroic fortitude upon the practical sympathy of the nation. And never in the history of nations has there been such a spontaneous and universal outpouring of general helpfulness from all classes of the community. The Lord Mayor's Fund has long since passed the half million; most of the newspaper funds have run into many thousands; the collections on Sunday week, as far as results are known, were large and hearty; and offers have come from the Riviera hotels to find room for convalescent wounded soldiers, free of charge. Among the latest items of interest in this direction is the announcement that the Evangelical Alliance proposes to send out 200,000 marked Testaments, bound in red, for distribution among the soldiers.

The following appropriate and touching hymn, which was composed by Sir George Colley, who died at the battle of Majuba Hill, has been printed on a little card and leaflet by Queen Street Baptist Church, Port Elizabeth, for gratis distribution to the forces in South Africa:—

> Lord, ere I join in deadly strife
> And battle's terrors dare,
> First would I render soul and life
> To thine Almighty care.
> And when grim death, in smoke-wreaths robed,
> Comes thundering o'er the scene,
> What fear can reach the soldiers' heart
> Whose trust in Thee has been?

The soldier who enters on conflict with these lines on his lips is far better prepared for the issues of the fight than by the bitter revengeful cry, "Remember Majuba," which has been too prominent in many a desperate charge in this grim war.

That the recent years have witnessed an immense outpouring of worthless and trashy literature from the press, is a too familiar fact. It is cheering to learn from the Christmas Catalogue of Books and Periodicals that one of the most striking phenomena of the times is the deep and enthusiastic interest taken in religious matters by a very large section of the reading community. The immense sale of the Standard Lives of Christ continues with unabated energy. The circulation of the works of Silas Hocking and C. M. Sheldon, both of whom make fiction their medium of teaching Christian truth, is remarkable. As regards the works of Rev. F. B. Meyer, the writer goes on to say:

> During the last few years volume after volume has emanated from his pen, each one of which has commanded a steady and in many cases an enormous sale; so much so, that it is no exaggeration to say that there are very few religious homes in the country that do not possess one or more of his works.

The great output of religious works by such organisations as the R.T.S., the S.S.U., and kindred societies, points the same moral.

Besides these standard works, including a never-ending series of theological works, some of which command very large sales, the circulation of religious periodicals and journals is continually increasing. Many are characterized by literary ability of the highest order. Some of the most gifted of living authors commenced their career, or have made their mark as authors, as contributors to, or as members of, the staff of religious journals. A book or a paper is not to be called good simply because it is professedly religious, but the broad fact remains that there has been a great quickening of the appetite for the better class of literature of late years.

On the other hand, the mixed contents of modern magazines intended for Sunday reading constitute an evil as grave as the foregoing facts are encouraging. The churches are lamenting the dearth of Sunday School teachers and helpers in spiritual work—and no wonder. The appetite for thinly disguised secular reading on the Sacred Day assuredly kills enthusiasm for "abounding in the work of the Lord."

Then again, we have been asked by Christian mothers and workers to protest against the methods resorted to by certain charitable and philanthropic institutions in their endeavour to secure funds. When professed work for Christ and his poor unfortunates takes the form of tableaux, dances, dramatic representations, and so on, in order to raise money for churches, orphanages, missions and charities, it is not surprising that so much distaste is evinced by many of the rising generation for any and every form of purely spiritual work. The excuse, that without resorting to such methods there is no chance to carry on the work, falls to the ground in the face of the experiences of George Müller, and other eminent and spiritually-minded philanthropists, who built their faith on the efficacy of prayer, and never failed of the wherewithal to carry on their noble task of rescue. Many churches sin in the same direction. It would be well for those who do so to remember that the end does not in itself justify the means.

Dr. Barrett believes that the special peril that besets the young life of to-day, and none more than young persons connected with Congregational Churches, is worldliness. He points out with peculiar force that the dread of worldliness is gone, and if the danger is not feared, then the greater it is. Evidences of worldliness are to be seen in the race for social distinction, in amusements, in the books that are read, &c. He pointed out that many young men in the ranks of the Free Churches, while remaining true to the tradition of their fathers, were nevertheless indifferent to everything connected with these churches, though they could be enthusiastic about politics, literature, art, and business. In point of fact, there are no churches which are not gravely threatened by the world-spirit in one form or another. Is it not an old temptation, an abiding, permanent temptation, coming in many forms, but always with the same antagonism to Christ, and with the same intention to destroy the soul? "Love not the world," is an admonition always needed by all Christians, whether old or young.

We hope that much attention has been given to Canon Barnett's remarkable paper in the November number of the Nineteenth Century, detailing the results of an experiment on a large scale at Whitechapel in the direction of the relief of the poor. The entire abolition of outdoor relief has enabled the guardians, even with a reduction in the rates, to expend large sums upon what we have from time to time urged as a pressing necessity—the improvement of the workhouses and infirmaries, making the former a place of refuge and the latter the equivalent of a good hospital. In addition, the children have been sent to training homes and farms away from their unhealthy and unhappy surroundings; and the general result of this consideration and thoughtfulness has been not only an economy, but a reorganization of private charity. Jews and Christians in the district have alike taken upon themselves the task of seeing to the needs of those requiring and deserving assistance outside the municipal arrangements, and also those entitled by age and character to a pension at the rate of seven shillings per week. The necessary funds for these outlays are often the same money which had formerly gone in depressing doles, or it was readily given by new givers who welcomed the promise of a method which would secure to every one that sort of help, indoor or outdoor, which, after kindly thought, seemed the best.

This infusion of friendliness and thoughtfulness has certainly Christianized the application of the Poor Laws in Whitechapel, and all those interested in the well-being of the poor would do well to endeavour to bring about the adoption of similar methods in other localities.

In an interesting paper in the current issue of the same review, upon "The Tinkering of Hymns," a protest is made against the unauthorized alteration of hymns in order to bring them into harmony with a particular theological creed—a protest which, it may be remarked, follows upon the lines of a similar one made by John Wesley a century ago. Of course, it must be admitted that in the case of hymns with obsolete or archaic words some alterations and substitutions may be improvements; but in the majority of instances, such as that of the favourite, "Jesus, Lover of my soul," by John Wesley, which is said to have suffered more from alterations than any other hymn in common use, they are unjustifiable; and perhaps never more so than when hymns, in which the Divinity of the Saviour is the keynote, have been taken and made suitable to the barren negations of Socinianism.

Among the many secondary features of the New Testament which are relevant to the present depressing situation, at home and abroad, is its note of cheery faith in the face of trouble. There was nothing in the lot of the writers to predispose them to a bright view of life. They dealt with the most solemn realities, they were surrounded with the most trying discouragements and persecutions, and yet again and again the restrained gladness of the Christ life in them bursts forth into song. The Bible is the most comforting and strengthening of all books. Those who at this time are weighed down by the prevalent sickness, or by sorrow or suspense for dear ones at the "front," can do no better than bathe themselves in its atmosphere of loving trust. God reigns; God loves; God saves; God comforts—these truths glow bright and clear to the eye of faith, and each sacred page is like a window opening towards one or the other of them.

We often lay stress on our love for God. The New Testament emphasizes his love for us: "We love Him because He first loved us." When St. Paul says, "The love of Christ constraineth us," he does not mean believers' love for Christ, but Christ's love for believers. The distinction is all-important. So long as we measure the possibilities of salvation by our response to the divine appeal, we shall have a very poor conception of either. "Our sufficiency is of God." As the fountain is purer than the stream, as the light of the sun is superior to the pale reflection of the moon, so are the potencies of redemption greater than any results of it we may be able to show in our own life, or in the whole world. It is the light-filled sky, not the shadowy earth, to which we must look. God's riches in giving, not our poverty in receiving, is the measure of the glorious Gospel.

It would be interesting to know what proportion of the lamentable absenteeism from our places of worship, which we so earnestly lament, is due to overwork with its result of utter fatigue on the Sabbath, and also to the compulsory Sunday work which obtains in so many trades. Looked at in this light, it is startling and painful to find that a number of our Monday's necessaries are, for want of better and more Christian arrangements, provided at the spiritual and physical cost of the working classes.

The Positivist "Festival of Humanity" has come and gone, and it would have afforded only food for amusement if it were not so sad a thing to find a number of educated people, with Mr. Frederic Harrison at their head, dismissing the churches and the creeds as unworthy of further consideration, not by reason of the work which they have done and are doing, but because of an omission to utter something which would be in accordance with the views of the handful of Positivists who have adopted that lifeless "faith in humanity" which Mr. Harrison would have us substitute for the living faith in Christ which has done so much to transform the world.

When "some well-known artists, musicians, and playwrights," along with their friends, meet to form an Entertainment Reform League, we know at once that the reform will not be in the sense in which our readers use the word. The object is to obtain an amendment of the law regarding the licensing of theatres and concert-halls, and the transfer of the licensing powers from the London County Council to a judicial body. Such a "reform" would remove these places of amusement from the influence of the public conscience, and place them under that of vested interests. While we object to amusements being made the handmaids of vice, we object also to their control being placed in the hands of an irresponsible body of men.

Two proposed measures, now being drafted by the French Administration, are being anticipated with much anxiety by the Jesuits and other communities in France, as it is considered that they are aimed at the privileges now enjoyed by those bodies, whose development and wealth, as we stated in a recent note, doubtless would cause the Government to consider some means for their repression. The Minister who is dealing with the question of these bills dealing with education and with the congregations has already intimated, in regard to the first one, that parents will retain the right of entrusting the education of their children to what masters they please, only they will bear in mind that three years of University teaching will be a necessary credential for the obtaining of any employment under Government.

This, of course, is equivalent to declaring that the Jesuits and Marists and others will have to give up work as teaching bodies.

"Are the heathen hungering for the Gospel?" is the question which Rev. C. G. Marshall, of Tripatur, Southern India, sets himself to answer, and, on the whole, answers in the negative. The news of salvation by Jesus Christ falls upon ears which are closed, upon hearts that make no response. The souls of the people are "lean and impoverished, and well-nigh dead; but they have no hunger. It has yet to be created." The excuse may be offered that the Gospel is new or foreign; but that is only an excuse.

The nature of the Gospel, its freedom from subtleties and from the piquant stories of the Puranas, its doctrines of God, of sin, of holiness, of salvation and the future life, and its lofty ethics, not only fail to attract, they also repel. Nevertheless, there are many who are restless in their ancient faith, many who are no longer Hindus at heart, and many who are in all stages of progress between turning from dumb idols and really finding the true God. "On the whole, the outlook is decidedly hopeful, and we have every reason to thank God and take courage." It strikes us that it is much the same at home. We need a hunger for the Word.

Why be at any trouble and cost about lepers in the mission field? They are hopelessly diseased, they are cut off from the rest of the community, and they can do nothing to diffuse the Gospel, even if they receive it. The Christian heart at once replies, because they have need of the Saviour who died for them, because their souls are as precious as any, because to go after them is in itself a manifestation of the Spirit of Christ, and because even they can aid in spreading the Gospel by their changed hearts and lives and by their prayers. In all cases of evangelism one answer includes every other—because Christ died for every man.

*The Lord's Prayer.

By Rev. J. R. MILLER, D.D.

VII.—Deliverance in Temptation.

FORGIVENESS does not take us back into Paradise. We must stay yet longer in this world. We must be tempted again. But we should seek to keep the cleansed garments white. Very fitting, then, is this prayer after we have found forgiveness: "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil."

Yet the form of the petition is surprising. It is a prayer to our Father, and we plead, 'Bring us not into temptation." Surely God would not bring his children into temptation. He is good and loving, and his will for us is never our harming, but always the keeping of our life unspotted from the world. We are sure that God never inclines us to do evil. James says, "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, and He Himself tempteth no man."

Yet it is James who also says, "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he hath been approved he shall receive the crown of life." Again James said, "Count it all joy, my brethren, when ye fall into manifold temptations; knowing that the proof of your faith worketh patience." It is clear, therefore, that out of temptation. It is not said that it is blessed to be tempted—the beatitude is for him that endureth temptation. We are not told to count it joy merely when we fall into manifold temptations, but when we have gathered the fruit of the proving in new patience.

It will help us to understand the spirit of the prayer to remember that the word "temptation" does not mean primarily to allure to sin. To tempt is—to try, to test, to prove. New ships are proved before they are entrusted with lives or treasure upon the sea. Anchors are tested before they are allowed to become the only hope of a vessel in the peril of a storm. God proved Abraham, putting his faith and obedience to the test. After the trial, the angel said to him, "Now I know that thou fearest God." Abraham had stood the test. Jesus was tempted before He began his public ministry, that He might be a proved Deliverer.

The temptations to which we are exposed continually are primarily provings, testings, to see whether we will be true to God or not. Indeed, there is no experience that we meet in life which is not,

IN A SENSE, A TESTING.

Every moment we are required to make a choice, and our choices prove us. Here is a duty; shall we do it or not? Here is a call to service; shall we accept it or decline it? Here is an impulse to something worthy; shall we yield to it, or repress it? We have money: shall we use it for God, or shall we clutch it for ourselves? Sickness tries us; shall we bear it patiently, and take from it the gifts of God it brings us, or shall we chafe and repine, and leave our sick room harmed by the experience? Even sweet human love tests us; many are held back by it from self-sacrificing duty. Thus Peter sought to keep Jesus from going to his cross. "Get thee behind Me, Satan," was our Lord's answer. In his love for his Master, Peter had become his tempter.

Thus testing always implies the possibility of failure. There is no experience in which we may not sin. Temptation is an opportunity to overcome, to grow stronger. But if we fail to use the opportunity, we sin. Robert Browning puts it thus:—

> Why comes temptation but for man to meet
> And master and make crouch beneath his foot,
> And so be pedestalled in triumph? Pray
> "Lead us into no such temptations, Lord!"
> Yea, but, O Thou whose servants are the bold,
> Lead such temptations by the hand and hair,
> Reluctant dragons, up to who dares fight,
> That so he may do battle and have praise.

* All Rights reserved in Great Britain and America.

Looking at temptation in this broader way gives a new meaning to the prayer, "Bring us not into temptation." Part of Christian faith is the committing of the life to God's guidance. We sing:—

> Lead, kindly Light, amid the encircling gloom, > Lead Thou me on.

We put our hand into God's in the morning, and we ask Him to lead us through the day. We know not what experiences may befall us, and we ask Him not to bring us into sore testings. The prayer is a request that in the doing of God's will for the day we may not be brought into places where it will be hard for us to be faithful.

Some tell us that it is cowardly to offer such a prayer. A soldier should not shrink from battle, for this is the very business of his life. A soldier who has never been in an engagement may be brave, but no one can be sure of it; his courage has not been tested. An untempted virtue is only a possible virtue. We must meet temptation and be victorious in it which are only for overcomers. Is it not cowardly then to plead with God any morning not to be brought that day into places where we must fight? Are we to wish to be soldiers who shall miss danger and hardship? Is that the kind of heroism Christ would teach his followers? He, Himself, did not seek such a life. He shrank from no conflict, and sought to be spared from no hard battle. And would He have us plead not to be brought into trial?

There is a measure of truth in this. If we are following Christ fully, we will not hesitate to go with Him into any experience, however perilous it may be. "He that saveth his life shall lose it." Yet so much is involved in temptation that we dare not desire to enter into it. More than once Jesus Himself warned his disciples to watch that they might not enter into temptation. He knew how frail they would prove in battle with the evil one. We read of soldiers sick of camp and chafing to be led against the enemy, but the Christian who is impatient to be tempted is very foolish. Temptation is too terrible an experience to be rushed into unled by God.

It is right for us to shrink from sore testings, knowing something of the fearful peril there is for us in them. If Peter had gone to Gethsemane that night instead of boasting that it was not possible for him to fall, he would not have fallen. May we not say that our Lord's own prayer in the Garden was precisely in the spirit of what He taught his disciples in this petition to ask? He pleaded that He might not be brought into the terrible trial on whose dark edge He was then kneeling. Yet He did not plead rebelliously. He did not decline to accept the cup if it was not possible for it to be taken away.

Our prayer should be in the same spirit. While we ask that we may not be brought into trial, we express our readiness to accept God's will. The petition certainly teaches that it would be presumptuous in us to seek temptation, or to rush into it unbidden of God. If we do this, we court peril and we have no promise of divine protection. When God leads us anywhere we go under his sheltering care, but when, without his guidance, we go into places of danger into our own hands. Soldiers led into battle are doing their duty; their place is in the danger. If they fall, they fall at their post. But if one, not a soldier, having no call to enter the battle, presses forward among the fighting ranks, he is without promise of divine keeping, and if he falls he has thrown his life away.

The same is true of all who in any way expose themselves to peril. The mother, the nurse, the physician, whose duty it is to be with the child sick with diphtheria, are not to think of the danger. God has brought them into the place of peril, and they may leave to Him the matter of their keeping. But any one who, uncalled by duty, exposes himself to contagion in the sick-room, is tempting God, and cannot claim the divine protection.

We should shrink from no experience of testing into which duty brings us. If it is the will of God that we should stand where our principles or our character must be tested, we need not hesitate to meet the trial, for we shall have the divine protection.

> Just where you stand in the conflict,
> There is your place!
> * * * * *
> Gird on your armour! be faithful
> At toil or rest,
> Whiche'er it be, never doubting
> God's way is best.
> Out in the fight, or on picket,
> Stand firm and true:
> That is the work which your Master
> Gives you to do.

But if we venture into places of temptation, when duty does not lead us there, we put ourselves outside the divine protection. One of our Lord's temptations was that He should cast Himself down from the pinnacle of the Temple, trusting to the promise of God to give the angels charge concerning Him. But to this suggestion our Lord's reply was, "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." This answer implies that the promise of angel protection avails only when we are walking in the way of the divine guidance.

The second part of the petition, "but deliver us from evil," teaches us that when, following God's leading, we encounter trials, our prayer should be that we may be delivered from the hurt of sin. We ask, not to be kept from temptation, but to be kept in it. In his intercessory prayer Jesus asked, not that his disciples should be taken out of the world, but that they should be kept from the evil.

THERE IS ONLY ONE EVIL.

It is not poverty, nor persecution, nor pain; sin is the only evil in the universe. "One drop of sin hath more evil in it than a sea of sorrow."

There is a keeping which is infallible. We need not fall in the sorest testing. St. Paul says, "There hath no temptation taken you but such as man can bear; but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation make also the way to escape, that ye may be able to endure it." This is a great promise. It is like a castle of infinite safety into which we may flee in every time of temptation.

"Our Father . . . deliver us from evil." We are to turn to God in every stress. In the Revised Version the prayer runs, "Deliver us from the evil one." Terrible as is our adversary, we know that there is One who is greater. We have but to turn to Christ in our weakness and faintness, and in Him we shall find deliverance.

> When the world seems full of evil,
> Lurking near on every hand;
> When I find my strength too feeble
> Its temptations to withstand—
> Then thy strength becomes sufficient
> As to Thee my weak faith clings,
> And I'm kept in perfect safety
> 'Neath the shadow of thy wings.

A Missionary Farewell.—A largely attended meeting was held in Eccleston Conference Hall, Belgravia, on the 12th inst., to take farewell of the Misses Beatrice and Ruth Hurditch (daughters of Mr. C. Russell Hurditch, of the Evangelistic Mission) who shortly leave for the mission field, the former to India, under the direction of the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission, and the latter to Uganda, under the C.M.S. Mr. J. E. Mathieson presided. Rev. A. B. Cavalier gave some vivid details of the work among the women of India, mentioning that there were 38,000,000 girls there, but only about one-third of a million were being educated. He urgently appealed for ladies to offer themselves—as Miss Hurditch was doing—for the work of carrying the Gospel to the women of India. Rev. J. Johnson, D.D., described the missionary outlook in Africa. Revs. F. B. Meyer, Evan H. Hopkins, Frank White, and other friends took part, and the proceedings were of a deeply spiritual and profitable character throughout.

Tired of God.

IF the Bible were a human book, dealing with ordinary human affairs, we should frequently be compelled to accuse it of sensationalism. It is always startling us by asking extraordinary questions, and using extraordinary phrases, and suggesting extraordinary methods.

But being what it is—the voice of God to us—we have to seek another explanation of the startling tone so frequently employed in its pages. This explanation is at hand, and is found in our lack of spiritual sensation. Hence God awakens us by surprising us.

For example, how startling are these words—

Thou hast been weary of Me, O Israel (Isa. xliii. 22).
You said, also, Behold what a weariness is it (Mal. i. 13).
Wherein have I wearied thee? (Mic. vi. 3).

This is astonishing indeed. Men weary of God! Creatures weary of the Creator! Sons weary of their Father! It is enough to awaken the dullest spirit. The converse of this need not surprise us. When we read that God is "weary" of religious formality (Isa. i. 14), and of the numberless sins of men (Isa. xliii. 24), and of the absence of principle in his creatures (Mal. ii. 17), we have no cause to be astonished. The wonder is that He does not go farther and discard us altogether.

Nor need we be surprised that men weary of each other, since the discovery of human inconstancy, weakness, and falseness is so continuous. And frequently we are tired of ourselves—our failures, our unkept promises, our meanness, and our coldness. All this can easily be explained. But that anyone should grow weary of the good God! this is amazing, indeed!

WAS IT TRUE?

Was the charge true of those against whom it was first made? There can be no doubt about it. They had tired of God and his service, and any enterprise for Him had become a drudgery. The proofs of this abound. The prophets, who charged the people with this unnatural fatigue, pointed to the evidences of it which were visible to all. Many of them had ceased to pray (Isa. xliii. 22); others had omitted to offer the prescribed sacrifices (Isa. xliii. 23); others had lost all respect for God (Mal. i. 6); while others kept up the pretence of making offerings, from which the soul had disappeared. They gave their cast-offs to the Almighty — blind, lame, and sick cattle, which would be rejected at the market, rejected for farm purposes, and rejected by the Persian ruler as an insult offered to him (Mal. i. 7, 8). No wonder that the prophet taunts them, and compares their cowardly and mean conduct with the mistaken sincerity of the heathen—to the credit of the latter (Mal. i. 11).

The charge, then, was undoubtedly true of the ancient people against whom it was launched. But is such a charge true of any to-day?

Again, one must reply, there can be no doubt about it. There is no need to "judge:" it is a mere question of witnessing to what is plainly visible. To many at the present hour, churchgoing has become a mere form. It is "the thing" to attend; but the body alone goes, the spirit being occupied in other affairs. To others the service of God has become a drudgery; the hands may do some work for Him, but the heart is with the world. The world receives our gold, and we offer to God our coppers. With many, prayer admittedly has been reduced to its minimum, and sacrifice has not made them "feel" their gifts. Anyone who is widely acquainted with English life must know that indifference in religion is hanging like a horrible fog over the land; and that many who were formerly attendants at church, or who were once Christian workers, have become "weary of God."

The sense of weariness comes to the best of men at times. On account of our physical and mental constitution, it is inevitable that we flag after great pressure of work. Such fatigue, being natural, should not cause any soul a moment's torment. Even our Lord was weary after this manner, and sought repose in the quiet of the desert. It is not this weariness that is the matter of complaint.

THE SECRET OF THE WEARINESS.

Now, in common life, the things of which we weary are artificial, and it is because they are artificial that we weary of them. The child tires of its familiar toys, men and women tire of certain books, of certain styles, of certain arrangements of things. These things are external to us, and form no part of our real life; hence we discard them after a time. But no healthy person wearies of essential things. Food, air, water, light, sleep, green fields, trees, and the spectacles of nature—who wearies of these? They return to us, and we to them, if we are in good health, with perpetual freshness; they always retain their fascination for us, because they are essential to our life and well-being. The sick alone are fatigued with these pleasant things.

Apply these principles to the relation between men and God. Why do men weary of God? Because He is artificial to them. He lacks reality to their spirit. He is not regarded as absolutely essential to their life; they feel no need of Him. In a word, they are sick, and their moral appetites and desires are consequently depraved. This is the radical reason, without doubt. But think of a man regarding God as something artificial! The God of his life becoming, in his estimation, a mere ornament! What a degradation, what a descent to the level of animals!

To those who regard God as essential, as being to our spirits what water, light, and food are to our material natures, He can never become a weariness. The fallen alone view Him as being that.

Is it fair to suppose moral disease in the souls of men who exhibit symptoms of weariness of God? Analogy leads us to this certainly. But the Bible, more surely than any deductions of our own, takes this very line, and declares distinctly that weariness of God proceeds from an inner spiritual malady. This malady it exposes with great faithfulness. There are three phases of it exhibited to us.

TRICKY MERCHANTS.

1. Commercial trickery. The prophet Micah lays bare the reason of his contemporaries' weariness of God in these words:

The scant measure that is abominable.
The wicked balances.
The bag of deceitful weights (Mic. vi. 10, 11).

The picture is quite Oriental, and one can almost see these tricky merchants engaged in cheating. The prophet of to-day simply alters the terms, and speaks against stock-jobbing, unfair speculation, misrepresentation of values, and the like. A man who in any way unfairly enriches himself at his neighbour's expense suffers from a diseased spirit: the wrong spirit precedes the wrong act. Now, if the spirit be wrong towards men, it cannot be right with God, since love of man and love of God proceed from one root. No wonder, then, that men who are tricky in business should also weary of God. The marvel would be if it were otherwise. In our time, when business has largely been prostituted into a game of chance, men need to remind themselves that the following of worldly ways means the abandoning of God.

2. A second phase of this malady is exposed to us in Job xxi. 9-15. There is not space to develop the idea here, but the reader may ponder it for himself with advantage. Prosperity often turns men from God.

FICKLE DISCIPLES.

3. A third thing is the too exacting doctrine of Jesus Christ. Those fickle disciples who deserted Jesus one Saturday morning in Capernaum, did so because they could not "hear" his doctrine (John vi. 66-69). The spirituality of his teaching stumbled them. "Eating his flesh and drinking his blood" was altogether foreign to men whose chief notion of salvation was that of an easy time in national life after the Roman conqueror had been routed. They would never have tired of Christ had He only removed from their necks the yoke of the Roman, and guaranteed to them a prosperous national career. But they grew weary of Him when He taught them the inwardness of religion, and insisted upon union with Himself. These vacillating people are succeeded in our time by that feeble class of men who can only tolerate Jesus Christ when He is presented in a manner enticing to their own ideas. It is "pleasant" religion these seek; and, when this is wanting, they too are wanting. The hardness and the spirituality of Christ's doctrine cause them to weary of Him. These are not all the reasons which might be given for men's weariness of God, but they are the chief ones.

What does God think of man's fatigue of Him? He condescends to reason with us about it. "Wherein have I wearied thee? testify against Me" (Mic. vi. 3). Is the fault in Him? He reminds us of what He has wrought for us. He has redeemed us from the hand of many a cruel foe, guided us by the hand of trusted servants, and protected us in many a danger (vv. 4, 5). He has not failed in his love or in his providence. His mercy has endured ever. Hence men's weariness of Him is not due to anything in Him. He has not ceased to be interesting; the fault is wholly theirs. And every conscience, not wholly benumbed will admit the truth of this conclusion.

Tired of God! How ungrateful, how unjust, how wicked! The contrary of weariness is delight. Delight in God is the goal set before the true heart. It is attainable when the heart surrenders itself to the inundation of Divine love, and not until then. Our natures, penetrated with the spirit of love, will instinctively seek the source of their beatitude. Love must grow until it ends in perfect union.

And they who love God cannot love Him by measure,
For their love is but hunger to love Him still better.

O heart! tired of thy chief Good, and hating thyself, perhaps, for thy sin and shame, turn Thee to the Spirit who yearns for thee, and receive from Him that wonderful flood of life which, filling all thy being, shall bring thee to behold in God thy chief delight.

Lewisham, S.E. Frederick C. Spurr.

Dr. James Martineau.—By the death of this religious philosopher a notable man passes from the scene. Aged ninety-four, he occupied for many years a foremost place in an influential circle. Associated with Unitarians, though disclaiming the name, he had great gifts as a thinker and writer, which won for him the admiration of many who entirely dissented from his distinctive views.

The Week of Prayer.

THE subject announced in connection with the Week of Prayer for the gatherings on Wednesday, the 10th inst., was the timely and important one,

NATIONS AND THEIR RULERS.

At Exeter Hall, Rev. Dr. GRITTON, who presided, said he was glad to note the spirit of unselfishness manifested in the meetings held in connection with the week of prayer. Personal needs were forgotten in the great needs of the nation, whose burden lay so heavily on all hearts at the present time. Speaking of the extension of the empire, he expressed the fervent hope that wherever the British flag waved there might be found the Bible, the observance of the Lord's Day, liberty of worship, family purity and individual holiness. Rev. N. F. DUNCAN, secretary of the Irish Church Missions, addressed the meeting in the place of Major Mackinlay, who was absent through illness. Mr. Duncan gave three illustrations of self-exaltation which ended in failure and shame. Pharaoh exalted himself against the people of God; Nebuchadnezzar's exaltation was the result of national pride; and Capernaum's sin lay in exalting itself against Jesus and his works.

The meeting at Centenary Hall was presided over by Mr. S. GURNEY SHEPPARD. After a few remarks from the chairman, Rev. F. S. WEBSTER gave a stirring address on Amos iii., dwelling especially on the words, "The lion hath roared, who will not fear?" In previous chapters the prophet describes the judgments of God upon the nations round about; then the wave of his indignation sweeps upon Israel itself. In these days of national distress God is speaking to us, and it is for us to listen and profit. Israel might have urged, "We are not worse than other nations;" but God's reply was, "You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore will I punish you for your iniquities." We might say, with the Psalmist, that "God hath not dealt so with any nation" as with us. Yet how little we have realized his goodness! But recently we celebrated the diamond jubilee of a reign notable for its purity and lofty character. Have we, as a nation, profited by our good Queen's example? Revelations of public scandal testify, unhappily, that we have not.

As to the position of the Empire, God has blessed its colonization in a remarkable degree, and Bishop Tugwell recently gave a remarkable instance of the preference evinced by African natives for British rule. When the line of demarcation was being settled between British and French territories, the natives were highly interested—those who found themselves on the British side were delighted, and some of those left on French ground abandoned their homes and crossed over under the British flag. So far, we may be proud of the love felt for our country. Yet our rule is marred by our connection with the opium traffic, and with the supply of alcoholic liquor to native races. What evils have too often followed in the train of the trader! True, there may be much religious profession; our House of Commons may preface its deliberations with prayer; but what of the standing army of drunkards in our midst, what of the gambling spirit which throws every class of society into a fever of greed? See how the mass and the confessional, two great curses to spiritual religion, have crept into the Church of England! Distress is about us; but let us recognise in it the chastening hand of God. "Shall there be evil in the city, and the Lord hath not done it?" Job said, humbling himself, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away?" Do we want to say, on the other hand, "God gave, but the devil or chance took away?" If distress comes it is of the Lord's allowing; it is a call to us to put away sin. Whether or no there be a day of national humiliation appointed, there is much of humiliation at this time in the hearts of Christian people. As a nation we have come to be too flippant and shallow. We have put our trust in patriotic feeling, in the bravery of our troops. Now we come to see how useless and impotent all things are without God.

Mr. Webster went on to give a telling paraphrase of the terrible reproaches, concluding "Yet have ye not returned unto Me," given in Amos iv., substituting modern instances of divine visitation for those which came upon Israel. In conclusion, the speaker urged that there should be, not the mere rending of garments in emotional sorrow, but a rending of hearts, a returning unto God.

OUR FAMILIES AND SCHOOLS

was the topic fixed for Thursday. A large company gathered at Exeter Hall. Rev. Dr. GRITTON presided, and Rev. W. H. GRIFFITH THOMAS made some pointed remarks on 1 Sam. iii. 8: "And Eli perceived that the Lord had called the child." He spoke of the many instances of child-life recorded in the Word of God, and the significance of their meaning and teaching. We are apt, he pointed out, to forget what is the child's place in the Kingdom of God, in his plan of redemption, in his heart of love. We need, too, a deeper belief in the power of the Holy Spirit in the lives of children. Then, we should remember our own relation to the young. Eli perceived at last that the Lord had called Samuel. The perceptions and characteristics of childhood are often disregarded instead of receiving proper consideration. The speaker concluded with a telling appeal for more earnest consideration of the problems of child-life.

At the Centenary Hall Mr. M. H. HODDER presided, and Rev. W. FULLER GOOCH gave an address founded on Ezra viii. 21, laying special stress upon the words "to seek of Him a right way for our little ones." Mr. Gooch made some prefatory remarks on the noble patriotism manifested by Ezra and Nehemiah. They laboured in a spirit of deep concern for the glory of God in their nation, seeking to promote the cause of righteousness. The measure of a nation's security is ever to be found in the rightness of its position towards God. As to this country, we have very much Christianity among us that is merely nominal. It is by no means the case that we are in advance of others in vital godliness. After reviewing a number of national shortcomings, Mr. Gooch went on to tell of a visit paid by a friend to the Queen of a South African tribe. The unhappy potentate was in a state of drunkenness, and when spoken to on the subject, retorted, "Well, I used to drink of kaffir beer, and could take a lot without getting drunk, but since the white man has come I must have his 'white beer.' I am so fond of it I must drink all I can." As to our family life, it should be one of our primary aims, as a nation, to "find a way for our little ones." Shall that way be found educationally? France is attempting to shut religion out from her schools. The reaction from a cruel priestism has led her statesmen to think that the best way to evade superstition is to ignore God altogether. But, though the question is not free from difficulties, those difficulties are not to be dissipated in such a way. Drawing attention to the letter on "Ritualists and the Schools," which appeared in last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN, Mr. Gooch emphasized the need for strenuous action in dealing with the varied forms of error by which it is sought to lure the young from the paths of evangelical truth. Asking if the "way for our little ones" is being found morally, he referred in pathetic terms to the vices of blasphemy, smoking, and, it is to be feared, drunkenness, which characterize to a considerable extent the child-life of the country. In these matters of education and morality, in social affairs and in every way, the spirit and words of Ezra afford an example for us at this time which should not go unnoted. In conclusion, the speaker deprecated the too prevalent neglect of the family altar, and expressed the fervent prayer that these days of national distress may at any rate result in driving the people nearer to God, and causing them also "to seek of Him a right way for our little ones."

was the subject on Friday. At Exeter Hall, the chairman was Mr. J. PATON, who reviewed the progress of the missionary cause during the present century. Rev. J. W. EWING gave a helpful address on the words of our Lord: "Lift up your eyes upon the fields, which are white already unto harvest." Mr. Ewing pointed to various signs of the times, which go to show that the Spirit of God is being poured out to a remarkable degree upon those whose minds are rooted in ignorance of unbelief, that the influence of the missionary cause is telling upon heathendom, and that those who sat in darkness are feeling their way to the light. The speaker remarked on the vast amount of work that remains to be done in order to keep pace with the demands caused by the increasing populations of heathen countries, and went on to remind his hearers of the spiritual power, love, and grace that are entrusted by God to his people in order that they may be fitted for the work of delivering the Gospel message with effect. In conclusion, he called for redoubled effort in seeking, in the strength of God, to bring about the accomplishment of his purposes concerning the human race.

At Centenary Hall, Mr. A. A. HEAD, who presided, gave a stimulating address on Isaiah xliii. 19, "Behold, I will do a new thing." Mr. Head emphasized the willingness of God to give to his people a new equipment of spiritual strength, in order to enable them to go forth to the great work of the world's evangelization. If they would yield themselves to Him, and experience a new power in their own hearts, then would follow the fulfilment of the words full of evangelistic promise, "I will make a way in the wilderness and rivers in the desert."

Meetings were also held each day at Mildmay and other centres. The topics chosen for consideration on Saturday were, at most of the meetings, Home missions and the Jews.

MILDMAY MISSION TO THE JEWS.

The annual meetings for praise and prayer in connection with the Mildmay Mission to the Jews were held, as usual, on the Monday of the Week of Prayer at Mildmay Conference Hall.

At the morning gathering, Mr. JAMES MATHIESON presided, and Rev. JOHN WILKINSON spoke briefly of the work at the Central Hall, and Dr. DIXON gave full statistics respecting the labours of the Medical Mission. A vigorous address on Zech. iv. 11 was given by Rev. W. FULLER GOOCH.

At the evening meeting Colonel MORTON presided, and Rev. SAMUEL WILKINSON spoke on the work. After reviewing, for the benefit of the many workers present, some of the difficulties of the Mission, and suggesting methods to be employed in meeting them, Mr. Wilkinson spoke of the work abroad. He described the labours of Mr. Reitmann at Capetown, where, since the war broke out, large numbers of refugees have been brought under the sound of the Gospel; and of the useful efforts of Messrs. Samuel and Blum in the interior of Morocco. At the various New Testament depôts in Russia, although the direct proclamation of the Gospel is prohibited, an open door is given through the distribution of Scripture. A permission to distribute the Scriptures carries with it the permission "to explain the nature of the contents of the book." Mr. Wilkinson concluded by reading some letters from Mr. Levinski, giving accounts of the work at the depôt at Warsaw, and of conversation with Jews during railway journeys; and observed that the heart of Israel lies in the Russian Empire. The millions are deep in Rabbinism, and when they come out of that they fall into utter worldliness unless they are laid hold of by the Gospel.

"I Shall Not Want."

PSALM XXIII. 1.

"Although . . . yet . . ." (Hab. iii. 17, 18, 19).

RING out this Anthem on the glad New Year,
That ends another century of the age!
Ring out in joy-bell echoes sweet and clear,
"I SHALL NOT WANT," o'er each unwritten page!
"I shall not want," because the LORD is mine,
And I am his by Covenant decree:
Tho' heaven and earth should pass, I'll trust his word;
I am his child, and He's my Lord to me!

When Doubt would darken Faith, then sing aloud
This Hallelujah Chorus of thy Trust!
"I SHALL NOT WANT!" 'twill pierce beyond the cloud,
Return with rich supplies, it will, it must!
The inward, bleeding wound my Lord will heal,
The emptiness of heart his love will fill,
The parting of the clouds will soon reveal
The shining of his Face, in his sweet Will!

Oh! passionate and weary soul, take heart!
Be patient just a little while and see
How thy dear Lord will "satiate" the void,
"Replenish" all that seems so far from thee;
Thy rose will blossom on the thorny bough;
Thy lilies burst the cerements of their tomb,
And all thou longest for, e'en here and now,
If GOOD FOR THEE, will turn to fragrant bloom!

Rise, then, my soul, and tune thy harp in praise,
Fear not the future thro' this coming year,
Commit to God thy purposes, thy ways,
His Name is LOVE, this leaves no room for fear.
Commit thy life, with all its complex folds,
His guiding Hand is ever at thy side;
His "Everlasting Arm" thy weakness holds!
"I SHALL NOT WANT," whatever may betide!

ROSE BENN.

MISSIONARY LITERATURE.—It is significant of the increased interest in Missions that among the announcements in Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier's new illustrated catalogue, No. 1, 1900, there should be five books on the subject. Among these is the third volume of Dr. Dennis's CHRISTIAN MISSIONS AND SOCIAL PROGRESS, the first and second volumes of which have already run into several editions. A translation from the German of the latest edition of Dr. Warneck's well-known HISTORY OF PROTESTANT MISSIONS is also promised. IN AFRIC'S FOREST AND JUNGLE is the title of a book by R. H. Stone, descriptive of his six years' residence among the Yorubans, while MISSIONS IN EDEN, by Mrs. Crosby H. Wheeler, gives an account of the American Missionary Society in the valley of the Euphrates. They have also just issued a book by Arthur H. Smith, the author of "Chinese Characteristics," entitled VILLAGE LIFE IN CHINA: A Study in Sociology.

Other Lands.

A Peep into Benares.

A FEW days ago I went with several friends to see some of the celebrated places in Benares; and I think it may perhaps interest some of the readers of The Christian to hear something about this great Hindu city. It is considered by the Hindus to be the religious metropolis of India.

As we glided slowly down the river Ganges in a large boat, we were reminded of the beautiful hymn we sing in English and in Hindustani,

Like a river glorious
Is God's perfect peace.

The blue water of the river was shining in the brilliant rays of the sun, and the early morning air was very refreshing. The scene was one of great beauty.

Viewed from the river, the city presents a panorama of beautiful palaces, temples, and mosques, surmounted by domes, pinnacles, and minarets. But on the left bank of the Ganges the same sad sight which has been seen for years is still to be seen—men and women of all classes bathing in what they consider to be the sacred water of the Ganges, and vainly endeavouring thereby to wash away their sins. Up and down the ghats, or bathing places, all day long they come, especially in the early morning—of India, wealthy rajahs, or bankers, in gay palanquins, fakirs, beggars, men and women, old and young, are to be seen on the ghats, platforms, and piers which project into the river. Oh, how one longed that they should all know of the true and only way of salvation through Jesus Christ; but, alas! the city of Benares, like Athens of old, still appears to be "wholly given to idolatry."

On my return to India, after four years in England, it is very sad to see the idolatry and superstition which still prevail here and that there is little change in this respect. But we are very thankful to see one here and another there in this great idolatrous city coming out and confessing Christ by baptism, though it is still "the day of small things" in Benares.

After leaving the river and the motley crowd of bathers, we proceeded up a long flight of stone steps to the famous mosque of Aurungzebe, which is built on the site of an old Hindu temple, dedicated to the god Krishna. The minarets rise to about 250ft above the level of the river. At the gate of the mosque there is an old pepal tree, and under its shadow six ascetics are seated, their dirty long hair matted together, and wearing scarcely any clothing. One of these so-called holy men was reclining on but he did not appear to be in pain, and had a calm and peaceful look on his ash-besprinkled face! He thinks he is gaining great merit by doing this. There are many of these men in Benares. I went lately to see one whom my dear husband used to visit—the most revered ascetic at Benares—a man held as divine by zealous Hindus of all ranks of society, from the highest to the lowest, and before whom princes and wealthy men bowed down in adoration and received his blessing. He was sitting in his beautiful garden, and when I entered it he rose to meet me with a look of surprise and joy on his face, as I had not seen him since I left India four years ago. He then led me to a seat under a shady tree and gave me fruit and flowers, and expressed his great pleasure at seeing me again.

I often visited him in former days with my dear husband. We then talked together about the love of Christ for us, and I asked him if he remembered my dear husband's frequent conversations with him on this subject. He replied, "Yes, Jesus Christ was a good man, full of love, like Mr. Hewlett." How much he understood of the Gospel it is difficult to say, but his life was spent in meditation upon God. He died of cholera a few days after my visit.

After a long climb we arrived at the top of one of the minarets, from whence we had a splendid bird's-eye view of Benares, with its and flat-roofed houses. When we were about half-way from the top we stopped to rest, and just below us was a zenana, in the courtyard of which a young Hindu lady was having her hair washed. Two women were engaged in this operation; one was pouring water over the girl's head, while the other was combing her hair, and pulling it so roughly that it came out by handfuls. A clergyman who was with us was very indignant at this treatment of the poor girl, who sat so still and patient. It is what we often see in our zenana visitation. We came to the conclusion that the young lady must be a widow to be treated so roughly.

As we looked down from this lofty eminence and heard the bells from the numerous temples and thought how much remains to be done before Benares is won for Christ, we could not help longing that others should come and share with us in this great work. Thank God there are here in connection with different societies, but still they are very few compared with the great need. As we go through the streets and lanes of the city, and see the crowds of people going to worship at the temples, we are inclined to say "What are we among so many?"

I am living close to a large suburb of the city, where many of the women are very poor, and work hard for their daily bread, but they are always glad to listen when I gather them around me, and tell them of the love of Christ and of the heaven He has prepared for those who love Him. There are also many zenanas which are visited regularly, and we have many tokens of God's blessing. We had a school for Hindu girls for several months, but it has had to be closed lately for want of funds. Many of the girls were very bright and intelligent, and were much interested in the daily Bible lesson.

There are many kinds of work in Benares which I should like to mention, but have not space in this account. One is a Sunday-school for Hindu and Mohammedan young men and boys in the L.M.S. High Schools. About eighty assemble there on Sunday mornings. I have a class of young men who can speak and understand English, and they often ask very intelligent

QUESTIONS ABOUT THE BIBLE LESSON.

It is very encouraging to see so many gathered together for the study of God's Word.

May I ask those who read this little account of God's work in Benares to help us with their prayers and their contributions? There may be some who can come at their own charges and share in this work. I am hoping that soon two ladies from England will come and share my home and work. I promise them a very happy time, though it is not all couleur de rose, and we have some difficulties and trials to encounter, yet the life of a missionary is a truly happy one.

Perhaps there may be some who are waiting for a decided call from God to go to the foreign mission field. To such I would say, "What can constitute a special call more than our dear Lord's last command, 'Go teach all nations,' and the great need of the heathen, who are passing away daily, many without even having heard of a Saviour's love?"

If we have fully consecrated ourselves to the service of Christ, we shall be willing to follow Him wherever He leads us; and when He comes again, how great will be our joy to see many of those among the redeemed whom it has been our blessed privilege to lead to Him!

Dear Master, when Thou callest,
No voice may say Thee nay;
For blest are they that follow
Where Thou dost lead the way.

Famine in East Africa.

WRITING to a friend in England, Mr. Stuart Watt, of the Ngelani Mission, Ukamba, viâ Mombasa, British East Africa, says:—

"Mrs. Watt and I came out here six years ago with four little children, the youngest being only a few weeks old. We had only about £750 of our own money, and this was expended the first year in caravan and building expenses. Since then, we have been depending absolutely upon God supplying all our wants, and since then two children have been added to our family.

"No words of mine could convey to you the awful state in which these poor Masai now find themselves. Having been sustained by leaves and roots for several months, and these edibles being now almost exhausted, there is a terrible collapse, and poor, tottering, bony skeletons are falling continually by the wayside in great numbers. Sometimes it is all but impossible to pass along the beaten tracks or pathways, so great is the stench arising from the numerous ghastly corpses which lie around. Only those who have a few cows left are still able to withstand the deadly famine. Every eighth or tenth day they draw blood from these cows, and cook the blood with any few wild edible leaves which they may still manage to glean.

"There is a wonderful opening now for missionaries. If you know any Christian man and wife, or two Christian men, who are thoroughly given up to God, and who could either pay their own expenses out here or get them paid by friends or by contributions, we would be delighted to receive them, get a house built for them, and be responsible here for their food, &c. Never was there such an open door in Central Africa as now. May God lead his people to give themselves, and to give of their substance, towards this blessed work!

"Though we would be glad to be responsible for the food of any missionaries who would, or could, come here, yet this responsibility would simply be the sharing with them of all that God sends to us. He supplies our every necessary want, and He can just as readily supply the wants of twenty missionaries as of our family of eight persons."

Communications regarding this work, which is not under the protection of any society, may be addressed to Mr. W. Roger Jones, 21 and 22, Exeter Hall, Strand.

Notes from New York.

IN his Thanksgiving Proclamation a few weeks ago, Governor Rollins, of New Hampshire, referred in pointed terms to the decay of religion in his State. He has since then delivered an address before the Union of Congregational Ministers in Boston on "The Decay of Religion in New England." The reason of the decline in religion the Governor considered to be the loosening of faith. "You clergymen are no longer the religious guides of the people. The anchor of the old faith has been pulled up before the sails are set for the new."

Discord between the denominations and neglect of the Sabbath, as also the introduction of European Sunday customs, were mentioned, the governor predicting that in a few years even Boston theatres would be open on the Lord's Day. On the important point of the remedy, Mr. Rollins had little to say, but he thought that gatherings of ministers of different denominations for council were good, and he also appreciated the work of the Y.M.C.A.

The Roberts Investigating Committee has resumed its work this week upon the reassembling of Congress after the holidays, but nothing of special importance has yet been done by it. Next week, however, a decision will probably be reached. Roger Martin.

A Congo Pioneer.

Rev. W. HOLMAN BENTLEY.

THE subject of this sketch is on his way to Central Africa to resume missionary work at Wathen Station, on the Lower Congo River. A few months ago it seemed as though his labours for Christ's sake in the Dark Continent had come to an end; but medical skill, under the "open-air treatment" at Bournemouth, has effectively dealt with the chest trouble from which he was suffering, and now, with his devoted wife, he has embarked once again from Antwerp for the port of Matadi. The life which has thus been spared for further toil may well find a place for grateful recognition in these pages, as the services Mr. Bentley has been enabled to render, through God's blessing, rank him amongst the foremost in the uplifting of the natives of Congoland.

Holman is the son of the late Rev. William Bentley, who for many years was the Secretary of the Baptist Building Fund. He was born at Sudbury, in Suffolk, now forty-four years ago. He was not trained in any theological institution; but his training in the home manse, afterwards in the Nonconformist Grammar School at Bishops Stortford, with subsequent business experience and Christian activity in association with the Downs Church, Clapton, tended in an exceptional manner to fit him for his future important career.

Twenty-one years this month Thomas Comber, just arrived in this country from his preliminary journey to San Salvador, sent forth his fervid appeal for "two earnest and practical brethren, devoted to Christ's great work, and ambitious to do great things for the Master," to accompany him on his return. Not two, but three, volunteers responded, and of these Holman Bentley was one, the other two being John Hartland and Harry Crudgington. No one who was present at the valedictory meeting in the large hall at Cannon Street Hotel will ever forget that thrilling occasion.

In June, 1879, Mr. Bentley, with his comrades, reached Banana. The first main task before the young missionaries, after visiting San Salvador, was to effect a route to Stanley Pool, that being understood to be the point on the mighty water-way where would end the obstructing rapids and cataracts, and beyond which the vast reaches of the river would be found perfectly navigable. The four pioneers divided themselves into two parties; Comber and Hartland attempting to reach the Pool by the south bank, and Bentley and Crudgington the north bank. The immense physical difficulties and the violent opposition from wild savages, which were fearlessly met and marvellously overcome, are now well known matters of African church history; but in passing over, with this bare reference, the initial stages of the Congo Mission, it must not be forgotten that Mr. Bentley's practical resourcefulness, good judgment, and devoted consecration were important factors in the remarkable success achieved.

On this occasion we confine our observations to Mr. Bentley's labours at Wathen Station, where he has been principally located, so called in consequence of the generous interest taken in the mission by the late Sir Charles Wathen, of Bristol. Apart from what may be termed the more official duties of counsel and general responsibility incidental to seniority (for with the exception of Mr. Grenfell he is the oldest member of the staff), the services Mr. Bentley has rendered may, for the purpose of this notice, be considered in their threefold character, viz., educational, linguistic, and evangelistic.

The founders of the Congo Mission could not have pursued a wiser policy than that of endeavouring to win at the very outset the confidence of the children. The opening of a school-house immediately upon the planting of a station was essential to, and prepared the way for, the prosperity now enjoyed. The boys and girls who at first scampered away into the bush, terrified at the sight of a white man, becoming assured of his friendliness, were soon willing, yea eager, to learn from the white man's book; and as a consequence to-day more than 1,500 scholars are receiving regular instruction at various stations. Add to this the most gratifying and encouraging fact that a considerable number have welcomed the truth as it is in Jesus into their hearts.

One of the foremost in promoting this department of missionary labour amongst the young has been Mr. Bentley. Some six years ago he opened up communications with Sir Charles Wathen, which resulted in the erection of larger and more suitable buildings, capable of accommodating 120 boys, and every way fitted for their mental and moral training. As a general rule the Congo boys have shown great aptitude for learning. The curriculum has not only, as far as secular knowledge goes, embraced "the three Rs," but has been extended to industrial pursuits, gardening, brick-making, carpentry, printing, etc., pursuits which Mr. Bentley, with other missionaries, has always been anxious to encourage. But supreme in importance has ever been kept the spiritual welfare of the scholars, and their future co-operation in the evangelization of their fellow-countrymen. Writing four years ago upon the course pursued, he said:

> It has been our policy at Wathen, for a long time, to seek to gather to our station two or three boys from each of the principal towns about us, even to a distance of sixty miles; to educate them, seeking above all to lead them to the Saviour, and then to train them for Christian work; so that, on their return to their towns, they may tell of the Saviour whom they have found, and spread the Gospel among their own people. In pursuance of this we have gathered into our school here some 150 young men and boys and a few girls, and are now beginning to reap the fruits of this policy.

From a photograph by Messrs. Russell and Sons, 17, Baker Street, London, W.

Since these words were written, still more abundant evidence has been given of the wisdom of the lines upon which the educational work at Wathen is being conducted, and for which Mr. Bentley has been so largely responsible.

It is, however, in the second department of missionary toil, viz., the linguistic, that the subject of this sketch has been permitted to render his most important and most distinguished service. To be privileged to give a people in their own tongue the record of God's revealed will and of his redeeming mercy, is surely to confer upon them the highest and most precious possible boon. On his return after furlough in 1893, Mr. Bentley took back with him to Wathen a complete New Testament in the language spoken in the Lower Congo. What that great achievement involved will be in some measure realized when it is remembered that the translator had to create the very tools and material necessary to produce the translation. In other words, he had to collect his vocabulary, and reduce to grammar and dictionary an unwritten tongue, before he could hope to effect his purpose.

In 1887, the dictionary and grammar appeared, a monument of patient labour. This invaluable volume was dedicated to the King of the Belgians. All this toil was undertaken with a view to the translation of the sacred Scriptures—indeed, portions of the New Testament were all along simultaneously in course of preparation, to be finally revised afterwards. As far back as 1888 Mr. Bentley wrote—and this quotation from one of his letters we give to show how conscientiously his work was done—

> The Gospel of Luke progresses, but not so fast as I wished. I could very soon turn out a rough free translation, which would be superseded as soon as it was printed, but am very anxious to do careful work. At the outset a great deal of time is taken up over terminology which, when once settled, will be settled and be no further hindrance. Terms of expression, idioms, require careful attention; nothing can be shirked. This makes the work move slower at first, but it will go quicker later on. I have nearly eight chapters more to do. I am translating carefully from the Greek.

Should his strength and the time to be given to other important duties allow, it is Mr. Bentley's intention to proceed to the translation of the Old Testament, so that the entire Scriptures may eventually be in the hands of the Congo natives.

It only remains to be said in this connection that the King of the Belgians has not been slow to recognize the invaluable services this distinguished missionary has rendered in these literary achievements to the Free State, having conferred upon him the honour of a Chevalier of the Royal Order of the Lion of Congo.

It is a cause for thankfulness to know that what Mr. Bentley has done for the African people in the Lower Congo region is being done by other missionaries for those dwelling in the districts of the upper reaches of the mighty river.

But whilst Mr. Bentley's linguistic labours and his efforts for the intellectual and religious welfare of the young have consumed a large proportion of his time and strength, he has not, by any means, been backward to engage in distinctly evangelistic work, proclaiming the Gospel to the natives at Wathen or in the immediate neighbourhood; neither has he been slow to undertake long and wearisome tours, preaching the Way of Life as circumstances permitted, and opening up fresh regions for those who might hereafter follow in his steps. In looking over the many reports of such itinerancies sent to the homeland, there is much to excite the deepest interest and to awaken feelings of thankful joy in the hearts of the friends of Christian missions.

On one of these journeys he tells us how sick and then how angry he felt when for the first time he saw the fork used, as a man was conducted from one town to another, his neck being made fast in a forked stick. His palavers with chiefs, his encounters with the medicine man, his presence at native funerals, and many other incidents of travel, he has graphically described. But nothing will so interest the readers of The Christian as the accounts Mr. Bentley gives of his endeavours to publish to the natives the good news of salvation. In the outskirts of a certain town he tells how his entrance was opposed. "We had nothing," he says, "to awe the people with; my walking-stick was the only weapon we mustered." As the natives gathered around him, he told them about his work, and how the missionaries had established themselves right away to the far cannibal country beyond the Bayansi.

They wondered at the long distances and such energy, and inquired what on earth we came for and what we were seeking. Could we not buy ivory and rubber on the coast? I assured them we do not trade. "What do you come for, then?" "We have come to teach you about the Saviour Jesus Christ, how He died for you, and opened the way to heaven to all who believed in Him, whether white or black." "If that is your business, you will teach, will you not?" "Certainly, that is what I have come for." Then, when others came, increasing the audience, I told them of the love of Jesus and his work.

This is but a sample of what has occurred on many similar evangelistic tours; thus has the light spread. But it is important to remember that these itineraries have had the ulterior object of discovering suitable outposts where native evangelists might be permanently placed, with a view to regular teaching and preaching. And this method of campaign has been crowned with much success. At the present time, in connection with Wathen alone, four such outposts have been established, the native Christians at the centre being encouraged to meet the expenses incurred, whilst in several other villages good work is being done. It was as the result of one of these journeys the great Zombo country has just recently been adopted as a new mission field.

In all his labours Mr. Bentley has been greatly assisted by his gifted wife, she herself being the daughter of a former missionary in China. It is anticipated that these devoted servants of Christ will be again at their station in about four or five weeks, the journey from the coast up country being so greatly facilitated since the opening of the Congo Railway. May their devoted lives be long spared, and may the Divine blessing continue to rest upon their faithful service!

National Thrift Society. — The annual meeting of the National Thrift Society was held a few days ago, Dr. Greville Walpole presiding. The report for 1899 showed that the progressive character of the Society's work in various industrial centres throughout Great Britain and Ireland had been well maintained. The report was adopted, and various suggestions for increasing the usefulness and efficiency of the work of the Society were discussed.

Protestantism in Austria.—Official reports state that, during the first six months of last year, the Protestant Churches of Austria received 3,446 members, and of these 3,275 were from the Roman Catholic Church. The Lutheran Church, however, has lost 272 members, and the Reformed Church 155. Of these 382 associated themselved with the Romish Church, thus leaving a nett gain to Protestantism of nearly 3,000.

For the Missionary Cause.

WHILE here (in Lausanne) in one of the principal centres of the Protestant Missions from Switzerland to South Africa, I have lately seen Protestants of Paris, connected with the French missions to South Africa.

This is the Week of Prayer in England, and in joining my prayers with those of my dear friends in my own country, I am much impressed by the thoughts which have been conveyed to me by missionaries and friends of missionaries here who have lately returned from South Africa. Though in general they strongly condemn the action of the English Government in entering upon this war, they are unanimous in desiring that the supremacy of England may be maintained or restored in South Africa, on account of the missionary cause which is so dear to their hearts. A friend in Neuchatel, who represents a group thus minded, writes to me, "We are all praying that England may retain her paramount influence in South Africa, else what will become of the freedom to preach the Gospel?"

I do not like to say a word here unfavourable to the Boer Government, lest it should seem to be prompted by a spirit of hostility to the country with which we are at war. My heart bleeds for the sufferings of the Boers as it does for those of our own people. But it is well known—it is a matter of history—that the Boer Government has never been favourable to missionaries; that, on the contrary, in the strong inherited instinct of that people to isolate themselves, and to drive out from among them any foreign element, they have made life very hard, not only for the natives in their midst, but for the messengers of the Gospel who seek to Christianize those natives. A reference to the text of several of President Kruger's laws or edicts fully proves this.

No doubt God has a controversy, more or less severe, with all the nations. Our own national sins are manifest and many. We are now confessing them before Him. But of the Transvaal Government I cannot doubt He must also say, as the Spirit said to many of the churches: "I have somewhat against thee;" and I cannot help thinking that it is a heavy charge which He will, in his own time, bring against Paul Kruger and his ministers on account of their treatment of the native people and their Christian teachers.

There is a bitter cry coming from the large and happy groups of Christian Zulus in Natal. "Save us from falling under the dominion of the Boers," they say. They are in fear lest they should lose the protection of England. The same cry comes from the Basuto Christians. Good King Khama, who came all the way from his country to Windsor to beg our Queen to take his country under her protection, is now looking on, we are told, with deep anxiety lest in this struggle the freedom of Christian tribes and their teachers should be compromised. I beg you, if you can, to give a space to my letter, which brings a voice, not from English, but from Continental Protestant missionaries, on this subject, and to allow me to beseech of friends who are now united in prayer to remember the case of these poor native Christians, and to ask God to bring out of this struggle conditions not less but more favourable to the spread of the Gospel.

There has recently been published the biography of Adolphe Mabille, a French missionary to South Africa. It is written by M. Dieterlen, an Alsatian of a well-known and noble stock. I commend readers to pp. 125 to 128, which refer to this subject.

I have given the opinions of Continental Protestant Christians; and this at a time when England is regarded with no goodwill on the Continent. The feeling against us resembles an epidemic, almost like that of Anti-Semitism; even just and good people appear scarcely able to resist its influence. Perhaps we have deserved this. In any case, we must bear it with equanimity and without resentment "until these calamities are overpast."

The Indian Famine.

THE letters we continue to receive from the famine-stricken districts demonstrate, unhappily, that the distress is greatly increasing. A further communication from Dr. Colin Valentine, of the Agra Medical Missionary Training Institution, dated December 13, says—"The distress is becoming more and more acute. Let Christian friends at home who are able to assist at this time send their contributions to missionaries whom they know, and upon whose judgment they can trust. On Sabbath last we fed 1,872 poor creatures, and preached the Gospel to them."

In a letter from Sholapur, Rev. P. B. Keskar appeals on behalf of the Indian Christians of that district. Mr. Keskar observes—"The Indian Christian Church at Sholapur has started a relief fund, managed by a committee consisting of Rev. L. S. Gates, Mrs. Harding, the pastor of the church, and three church members. Our church is poor; it supports its pastor and manages its affairs without mission help in pecuniary matters. Our rule is to try to secure work for those who are able to work, and help them till they get their first pay." Mr. Keskar, Sholapur, Bombay Presidency, India, is the hon. secretary of the committee.

Rev. F. Stevenson, of Pranty, Gujarat, and a number of other workers, write on behalf of the Irish missionaries in Gujarat. Their letter says: "Five-sevenths of the population of Gujarat fall outside British jurisdiction, and the relief works, hitherto undertaken in most of the Native States, are entirely inadequate to meet the existing needs.

"Now, in what should be the harvest season, barren fields and arid wastes everywhere meet the eye. For want of fodder the cattle have already perished literally by hundreds of thousands. The few that are left will certainly not suffice to do the ploughing for next year's crops. The failure of the grain crops has doubled—in some places trebled—the price of bread, and has thrown nearly all the farm labourers out of employment. The failure of the cotton crop has also had disastrous results.

A letter just received from a trustworthy source tells of several cases of suicide of parents who could no longer bear to see their children starve, and strong men who preferred sudden death to slow starvation. Orphan children are wandering about uncared for, and parents, naturally affectionate, are now offering to sell their children for a few pounds of grain. Others again are known to have starved to death themselves in order to keep their children alive. Let help come quickly, or it may come too late. Two pence will keep a man alive for a day, five shillings will feed a whole family for a week, a pound for a month." Communications may be sent to Dr. D. B. Barkley, 12, May Street, Belfast.

SUNDAY, January 21. Job xix.

THIS is almost the darkest hour with Job. It seems as though for some reason God had taken sides against him, fencing up his path, setting darkness in his way, taking the crown from his head; and those who ought to have given him true help had failed. The sun in mid-heaven was obscured, and the tiny lights that might have cast a gleam were extinguished by the moaning wind. Forsaken by God, abhorred by his inward friends, and despised by even young children, there was nothing worse to fear.

But, from the midst, a song of faith and hope arose. A voice said in his heart, This is not all, there is something beyond the horizon of your narrow life; there is One who lives to be your Goel, your Redeemer, a Kinsman next of kin, a Brother born for adversity, a strong, loving, loyal Friend. He liveth on the other side of death; neither disease, nor change, nor death can affect his glorious life.

The spirit that was in him bore the patriarch forward to words whose full significance must have been hidden from him. But how pregnant they appear to us! He who comes in the clouds for his own will descend with them to stand at last upon the earth; and though the body may have passed to dust, yet from its ashes a new and glorious body shall arise, from the eyes of which, never to be dimmed with tears, or strained with longing, we shall see God for ourselves.

You shall see Him for yourself, and I for myself; and as we behold, we shall be changed. Happy the soul who through the long, dark tunnel can see the glimmering ray which tells him where daylight awaits, and to which he makes his tedious path.

MONDAY, January 22. Job xx.

All that Zophar said is true. The only bitterness of it was in the application. That the wicked enjoys but a short-lived prosperity, which is haunted by dread whilst it lasts, and is succeeded by irremediable sorrow, is only too true; but he had no right to insinuate that Job's sorrows proved him to be a man of exceptional sin.

In his masterpiece of "Faust," Goethe has embodied an old legend which assumes many shapes in the folk-lore of the world,—a sinner that sold himself to Satan for his life. But amid all the roses with which the prince of this world showered his path, there was perpetual reason for heartache, thorns and briars mingling with them all. Every step of his path was overcast by the shadow of his approaching doom. At the moment of death he had no alternative than to fall into the hands of him to whom he had sold himself. Such tragedies are perpetually happening amongst men, and one day the heavens shall reveal the sinner's iniquity, and the earth shall rise up against him (v. 27.)

How tender this should make us in our expostulation and entreaty with those whose treasure is in this world, but who are poor towards God! On a poor woman being asked why she was so sweet and gentle to her husband when he returned at night with his roystering companions, she replied, "I fear me it will go so hard with him in the next world, that I want to be as kind to him as possible in this." That remark led to his conversion. Let us ponder the description of this chapter as it sets forth the portion of a wicked man, and the heritage appointed unto him by God.

TUESDAY, January 23. Job xxi.

It is impossible to determine God's reasons for his dealings with men. "Shall any teach God knowledge? seeing He judgeth those that are high." Why this one dies in his full strength, being wholly at ease and quiet, while another dieth in bitterness of soul and never tasteth of good, is among God's state secrets, of which He giveth no account.

But is there not comfort in the thought that there are reasons for all God's actions which would content us if we knew them? Can we not believe in the sufficiency of those reasons, though we know them not? They are enough for God, and they would be enough for us, if He were to disclose them, as He will some day. This is the discipline of faith: to believe that God's reasons are good and sufficient, and to be as calm about it all as though we knew.

The other day a little canary, belonging to one of my working men, was accidentally killed. His wife met him with the tidings when he went home from one of our services. Instead of losing his temper, as she expected, he was calm and gentle, and quoted the address which he had just heard as the reason for his bearing his trial so equably. It was for Jesus' sake, he said, that he was calm and still. That bird's death was the means of bringing great glory to God in his home, and perhaps through this page. It occurred to me that that bird might have been satisfied to die if it could have known the good which would accrue from its death. Is this a clue to the mystery of suffering? Is it a foil against which God's glory may become apparent? Not unto death, but for the glory of God, that the Son of Man should be glorified thereby.

WEDNESDAY, January 24. Job xxii.

Our blood boils with indignation against Eliphaz. It is altogether too bad. He not only insinuates that Job is guilty, but charges him openly with egregious crimes. More than this, he compares him with those who lived when the world was young, whose sins brought about the Deluge. "They were snatched away before their time, whose foundation was poured out as a stream."

But the advice given is full of beautiful suggestions. That we should acquaint ourselves with God, and receive the laws of our life at his mouth; that we should return to Him, and put unrighteousness far away from us; that we should cease to rely on earthly wealth, laying it in the dust, or among the stones of the brooks (24)—is all excellent advice, as applicable to us as to the olden times in which the words were first uttered.

And the results of such action are very truly and tenderly stated. God becomes a treasure to a man who gives up all for Him. New joy comes into prayer. We lift up our faces to his, to catch a glimpse of his tender, loving eyes; we make prayers, which are certainly heard, because they reflect the Divine thoughts and purposes; success attends our plans and aims, because all are wrought in God; light shines upon our ways; we are able to lift up the downcast and save the humble, and even extend a helping hand to those who are not innocent. Let us ponder these characteristics of a Godly and useful career, and seek that they may be realized in ourselves to the glory of God by the indwelling of the Holy Spirit.

THURSDAY, January 25. Job xxiii.

Wouldst thou know where to find Him? It is not hard to answer that question, dear heart. He is here, "nearer than breathing." He is not even without thee, but within. Turn from the outward courts of the Temple to the inner shrine, where his Spirit dwells—He is there. Or, turn to the Person of the Living Redeemer, as He stands in the midst of the throne, or bends over thee with his matchless tenderness. God is in Christ. He that hath seen Him hath seen the Father. The Father is in Him, and He in the Father. Thou needest not ascend into Heaven, or descend into the depth, He is in thy mouth, and thy heart. Order thy cause before Him, and fill thy mouth with arguments, He will answer thee. Thou needst not fear that He will contend against thee with his great power; He will put his Spirit within thee.

But even better than all—He knows, yes, He knows! He knows the way that we take, how rough, how stony, how the stones burn our bare feet, giving back the heat they have absorbed from the scorching sun. Every step of that way has been anticipated by Him. He has carefully proportioned it to thy strength. It shall not overtask, it shall not overbear. Thou canst not see Him; He seems to be in hiding; but He never takes his eye off thee for a moment. He is only trying thee, burning up thy dross, purging away thy alloy, that thou mayest come forth as gold.

Only don't despair. Hold fast his steps; keep his way; do not go back from the commandment of his lips; treasure up the words of his mouth more than thy necessary food. He will carry his purpose through, and thee also. What if thy heart faint, He will bear thee in his arms through the storm, through the flood, through the dark. See, see, the morning breaketh over the hills.

FRIDAY, January 26. Job xxiv.

The oppressor of the poor, the murderer, the adulterer, are pilloried in this awful chapter. We can see the devastation they cause, and can almost hear their stealthy step. We look around, and behold their inevitable doom. "They are exalted; yet a little while, and they are gone . . . and are cut off as the tops of the ears of corn."

But what a pathetic picture is given of the lot of the poor. The widow's ox taken for a pledge, and the ass of the fatherless driven away. The needy turned out of the way and driven into hiding. No coverlet by night, no shelter from the storm, so that they have to embrace the rock. No deliverer from the oppressor and murderer. All life goes hard with such, and how many are in this sorry plight. Let us think of them with more tenderness, and minister to them more assiduously; the more so as our Master Christ knows the poor man's lot by experience, and has taken the poor specially under his care.

But how many alleviations there are to the poor man's lot. He is not exposed to envy or jealousy. He lies safe in the valley while the storms sweep over him, and beat against the mountain crests. His sleep is not broken by anxiety for the safety of his property, or the cruel detraction of his competitors. He can count absolutely on God, since he has neither help nor hope but in Him. He is able to bend his strength to the acquisition of the eternal riches, which lie beyond the reach of moth and thief. "Did not God choose those that are poor in this world to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which He has promised?"

SATURDAY, January 27. Job xxv.

God's palace yonder is the Home of elect spirits. Dominion is there in the royalty of those whom He hath made kings. Fear is there, for perfect love animates them; and love, though she casts out fear, fears most of all. There is no limit to the number of those bright and celestial armies which follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth. "Is there any number to his armies?"

But how can mortal man be just with God? Bright as the moon is, walking the midnight sky in her chastity, she hath no brightness compared with God's ideal; as the candle flame has none in the glare of the electric light. Pure as the stars seem, they are not absolutely so in his sight. A woman's washing, hung out on the clothes line in her back yard, when contrasted with the dingy street, seems pure and clean, but it looks even grimy when a snowstorm mantles the world in heaven's own whiteness. We may seem clean to ourselves and to our fellows, but how can he be clean who is born of a woman?

What a sight our natures must present to the eye of a Holy God. If unconscious nature, which has never wilfully violated his holy law, is nevertheless tainted and defective, when God's search-light falls upon it, what must not be the spectacle which we present! There is sin enough in the holiest hour ever spent by the holiest man on the earth to condemn him absolutely to exclusion from the Divine Presence. We have an absolute need of the blood and righteousness of Jesus, for He is God, and can clothe us in that which God can accept. Nothing less than a Divine Redeemer can satisfy the absolute holiness of God's great white throne.

The Late D. L. Moody.

REMINISCENCES AND TRIBUTES.

By Rev. W. Hay Aitken.

AS I look back upon the happy days long since past, in which I had the privilege of seeing a good deal of D. L. Moody, the thing that perhaps impresses me most about the man, at this moment, was his perfect modesty and freedom from all self-consciousness of his own greatness. It surely is a very remarkable thing that one, whose success in his own line of work was so unique, should have been so entirely unspoilt by it.

His modesty was all the more impressive, because it was wedded with so much strength of character and decision of will, and because he was so utterly free from anything that could be called mock-modesty. Those who do not carefully distinguish between the genuine and the counterfeit article, especially if they only knew him slightly and superficially, will, perhaps, be disposed to wonder at my saying what I have just said. Perhaps they may have noticed with what and pertinacity he adhered to his own line of procedure, even when his action may have seemed autocratic; and may feel disposed to question how far such "high-handed modes of procedure," as perhaps they would call them, could be compatible with real modesty. But to be thus judged is ever one of the penalties of true greatness, and it was just because Moody was so little self-conscious that he was altogether indifferent to such misinterpretations of his conduct.

He knew what experience had taught him, and he saw no real humility in ignoring the gifts of clear intuition and common sense which God had bestowed upon him; and he valued his work too highly to sacrifice it in any way to an appearance of humility, taking the form of deference to opinions on the part of others which his own judgment condemned.

But who that knew D. L. Moody ever saw him exhibiting anything like the spirit of self-complacency at his great work; about it; how little he seemed to think of his own part in it. Where so many smaller men seem never tired of rehearsing their own exploits, this really great man seemed never to allow his mind to dwell on what God was doing by him, except sometimes when he appeared almost awe-struck at the sense of the stupendous responsibility resting upon him as the result of it.

HOW LITTLE HE SAID

I shall never forgot a solemn time that I had with him long years ago, just after his wonderful work in London in 1875. He and I were talking about his approaching return to America, as we sat together in a summer house in the grounds of Mount Alyn, the home of Liverpool's greatest philanthropist, Alexander Balfour. With an earnestness that I vividly recall, he said: "I want you to pray for me; for the eyes of all the world are on me now, and oh! if I should make any sort of slip! Just think how poor old David gave great occasion to the enemies of God to blaspheme." "Yes," I added, "and they haven't done with blaspheming God about that matter up to this day." "That is so," he replied, and then he added with the deepest feeling—I think the tears were in his eyes as he said it—"Oh! my dear Aitken, I'd RATHER DIE THAN LOSE MY TESTIMONY!"

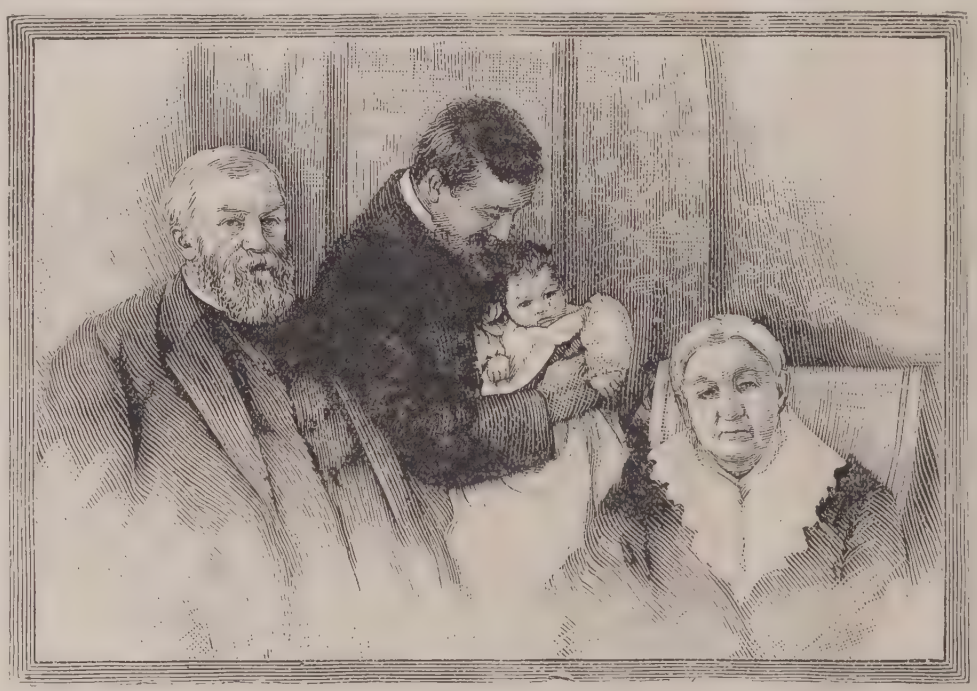
Thank God, he has died without losing his testimony, or even having it in any way impaired by any moral failure or inconsistency; and while, even in those great days, many affected to regard him with suspicion and even contempt, I apprehend that there are few human beings the wide world over of those who have heard his name that do not now regard his memory with profound respect. He has passed from us, leaving an increased weight of responsibility on our shoulders. We cannot be what he was, but we may all the more fully yield ourselves up to the Master to use us in our lesser spheres for his glory, inasmuch as the loss of such a labourer makes the claim for our devotion of ourselves to the cause, that our dear departed friend served so well, all the more urgent.



FOUR GENERATIONS: MR. MOODY, AND HIS MOTHER, WITH SON, AND GRANDCHILD

By Mr. William Noble.

The death of Mr. Moody brings to my remembrance a day spent at Northfield, Mass., in company with my late friend, John B. Gough, in 1885, on the occasion when we spoke at the annual convention. I had often heard Mr. Moody in the early years of his work in England, but I was able more fully to understand the man and his mission from what I saw of him at Northfield and other places.

In 1887, after visiting Australia, I again met Mr. Moody, this time in Chicago. I gave him some messages from friends in the colonies, and pressed upon him the great need of his presence and help in those far-off lands, which he was never permitted to visit. During the day, and at night at the meetings, I was, as before, greatly impressed with the absorbing character of the work to which his life had been given. His knowledge of the workers in different parts of the world, and the nature of their service, were a proof of his wide-spread interest in all that was aggressive in Christian endeavour.

How to reach the drunkard with the Gospel, also the Temperance and drink questions as they affect the Church of Christ and the individual Christian, were problems that weighed heavily upon his heart and mind. Nor did any time-serving considerations close his mouth when he felt it his duty to speak

By Lord Kinnaird.

I knew Mr. Moody intimately for over thirty years, and I suppose I saw as much of his work in this country as any one. I can truly say, without exaggeration, that I have never known his equal for practical ability, whole-hearted consecration, and singleness of aim in Christian work. I suppose few would deny that as an evangelist he occupied in this generation a unique position, similar to that of Charles H. Spurgeon in the pulpit.

With Mr. Moody it was indeed "Jesus only," with or personal ambition. Had he wished to found a sect, or to organize a work which would bring his own name prominently forward, he might have been more universally known, but from the first his determination was to work loyally with all the churches, and not to attract his converts to himself, but at once to get them linked to the work of the churches.

I met Mr. Moody first in my father's house, when he came over soon after the American Civil War; this led to a friendship with myself and family which continued to the last. In evangelistic work I had the privilege of taking part with him in several campaigns in England, Scotland, and Ireland, but personally I know most thoroughly

HIS LONDON WORK.

One of the most remarkable series of meetings for permanent and lasting results was on his second visit to this country, I think, when he took services at Mr. Frank White's Chapel, Chelsea. Several of my co-workers to-day thank God for that Mission. Of the larger gatherings, I suppose the most noted were those held at Her Majesty's Opera House Haymarket—the pity was that Mr. Moody could not go on for another month there.

How constantly one meets with converts brought in at his various missions, still working with zeal and energy, the secret of this being, I believe, because Mr. Moody's labours were founded on belief in the Holy Scriptures from cover to cover, and continual teaching of the need for absolute surrender of the whole being to the Saviour.

This great loss comes as a special blow at the present time, when an increasing number of Christian workers feel that a large united effort should be made; and we naturally turned to Mr. Moody in the hope that he would come to our help in carrying on such a campaign; he was so pre-eminently fitted for directing and energising

LARGE MISSION EFFORTS.

His experience of possibly the most remarkable series of meetings ever held, namely those conducted during the Chicago Exhibition, showed a power and a generalship which I fancy had never been surpassed in evangelistic work.

While we shall ever miss this prince of evangelists, there are all over the world many who have been taught by him, and have learned the art of winning souls, who will earnestly seek to continue his grand work, knowing that soul-winning does not depend on individual rganization, however efficient, but in the pirit of the loved one who has gone, will look o the old Gospel, simply told, as the most owerful means of winning men to our Saviour.

By Mr. Henry Varley.

The last decade of the nineteenth century has een the removal of two of the ascended Lord's ost precious gifts to the Church and the orld — Spurgeon and Moody. Dissimilar nd yet alike, giants yet children, workers ith untiring zeal and boundless energy, ney crowded centuries into decades, and human nfirmities into faith's hold upon the regal orces of God. And these men of God are one from us, their sphere of higher service ntered with abundant welcome and triumphant ong.

Personally, I cannot think of the wonderful fe, so recently removed, without recalling our isit to Mount Hermon and Northfield. It has een a great joy to us to know that, for the ast two years, our beloved daughter has been elping our honoured brother in his literary ork. To use dear Mr. Moody's generous ords, "a God-send to us, and an indispenable helper." A visit to his modest yet eautiful home but a few months since was replete ith refreshing and enjoyment to my beloved ife and myself. Pressure of various kinds, nselfishly and bravely borne, evidently eighted his latest experiences. Work enough o have crushed the strongest men he nobly houldered and carried to the end.

Few people who have not seen Northfield can ealize the extraordinary character of the work. visit to Mount Hermon, Northfield, and Chicago has been a perfect revelation to thouands. Mr. Moody's complex character—so nanly, yet withal so godly—appears to be ranscended by his

ABOUNDING IN THE WORK OF THE LORD.

Evangelist, teacher, Bible student, president, ead of colleges, schools, and homes, he had become the living centre of scores of agencies nd workings. With well-nigh 1,300 students t the Chicago Bible Institute, at Hermon, and Northfield, who can begin to measure his onderful individuality?

My earliest interviews with our beloved rother date back as far as 1867. How well we ecall his first visits to Notting Hill, his reaching at the West London Tabernacle, nd the striking character of the Noon Prayer Meetings in the City.

He changed dead proprieties into living hours f fellowship one with another, and most of all ith God. They were bonnie meetings and oyal days, and to this date the living power nd charm of those prayer and praise seasons bide in the City.

Few of your readers are familiar with the ears that intervened between the evangelist's irst visit to England and the commencement of his third visit, the time of the great Scotch revival. They were wonderful years; n a very real sense, years of preparation at he hands of the living God for the times of evival which followed. Those who can recall he fraternal gatherings, the days of fasting, rayer, and waiting upon God held at the Metropolitan Tabernacle; the times at Mildmay, Oxford and Brighton Conferences, out of which came a deepening of spiritual life that continues to this day; and last, not least, the memorable Believers' Meetings at Dublin, nderstand how the presence and power of God were manifestly there. At the invitation of beloved Henry Bewley, hundreds of us met ear by year in Dublin, and there I renewed

EARLY FRIENDSHIPS WITH MR. MOODY.

Our contact with many brethren, masters in the school of God, was a remarkable education and discipline—the rude awakening that was ours of conscious unfitness for service, our felt ignorance of true conceptions of the meaning of the Sacred Scriptures as these teachers and leaders in Israel held us spellbound by their wonderful expositions of the sacred volume.

I think I see our honoured brother Moody now, with his beaming countenance, penetrating eye, and energetic step. There he stands, note-book in hand, asking any number of questions, bagging thoughts, facts, and illustrations by the score from all comers. How strong his common-sense, how quick his discernment! Every inch "the American," but much more the man of God—tender and sensitive, yet bold and determined. Mark his hold upon his Bible! How the leaves bear testimony that precious truths are furnishing the man of God to every good word and work!

Probably to many of us the most memorable Conference was that which just preceded Mr. Moody's return to Chicago. I think it was in July, 1872. A deep conviction had taken hold of us that if we could but have an accession of the power of God "working in us mightily," the truth, we knew, would intensify so far as its energy through us to others was concerned. To this end a number of us met in a kind of upper room. The meeting at Willow Park was closed. The great company had separated. About thirty of us agreed to spend the night in prayer.

It was just about 11 o'clock, and silence had settled upon the scene. We had no president, no human arrangement. We had come to meet the Captain of the Lord's Host; and He was there. The tides of prayer rolled on. Never while memory holds shall we forget the confessions, tears, and strong cries to God that were then made. Dear Moody was there. Prostrate upon our knees, with faces and foreheads bowed upon the very floor, we passed hour after hour. We had broken clear of which to the natural man is common and to the man spiritual a dread. Yes, we were free, and the wretched incrustation of human nature which makes waiting upon God a weariness was, for the time being at least, crushed, and we were at liberty.

'Twas a night much to be remembered. We were humbled in the very dust before our gracious Lord. If my memory serves me, "the ascending of the morning" saw us separating for a brief sleep. I am not sure that it was a character-making night, for character has a wide and deep meaning; but it was to many of us a time of crisis, of marked submission to our Lord, and, as the sequel showed, a time of rich blessing from Himself.

My soul rejoices in our brother's wonderful work through all the following years, and most of all in his loyalty to

THE WHOLE COUNSEL OF GOD.

His own testimony, and that of his loved co-worker, Mr. Sankey, has been clear and faithful to the end. I cannot say that I was greatly surprised to hear of our beloved brother's failing strength. His natural force evidently was a declining quantity as I saw him at Northfield. For two months it was mine to share in the evangelistic campaign at the World's Fair in Chicago, and to reside beneath the hospitable roof of the Moody Bible Institute of that city, and share almost daily the bright and sunny fellowship of this honoured servant of Christ.

"God is calling me." So he spake on the morning of his departure. In his glorious turn is heard the inspiring word, "For I am ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand." "And I heard a voice saying, Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours, and their works do follow them."

A CAPTAIN of the hosts has gone,
A fearless fighter on the field,
He lies with all his armour on,
His Saviour's name upon his shield.
His worn-out body—let it rest,
A dreamless thing beneath the sod;
Fold softly on the quiet breast,
The hands so often raised to God.

But count him not among the dead,
He joins the deathless—that is all;
"My God is calling me," he said;
And quick he answered to the call.
Thou valiant soul, receive thy crown,
Drink deep from Life's o'erflowing cup.
But Oh, the work thy hands laid down—
A thousand hands shall take it up.

(Mrs.) ELLEN M. H. GATES.

By Mr. J. E. Mathieson.

The writer's first acquaintance with D. L. Moody was during one of his earlier visits to this country in 1872. The evangelist was then little known in our Christian community, which became so familiar in later years with his remarkable personality and "the work of faith with power" which God had in store for him to accomplish. At that period Mr. and Mrs. Moody spent a night at my home in Hampstead, he taking the weekly service in a mission room for the poor, which was favoured from time to time by the presence of many of the evangelists who were raised up in the memorable time succeeding the revival of 1860.

I have no recollection of any very distinct impression of unusual power in the address of that evening, or of the bearing of Mr. Moody, unless it be his simple earnestness. Some of your readers are aware that it was in response to a pressing invitation from three saintly men that Mr. Moody came over in 1873; but the Rev. William Pennefather, of Mildmay; Mr. Henry Bewley, of Dublin; and Mr. Bainbridge, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, were all three taken home to their heavenly rest before he reached London; and then, without the aid of influential friends, there was begun that remarkable campaign whose results, though they cannot be tabulated on earth, were largely manifest in conversions of men and women to Christ culminating in the four months of services in the spring and early summer of 1875, which called forth the willing help of London Christians, brought out into active service many of those who hitherto had shown little activity in the Lord's work, and made a mark in the lives of large numbers of believers by the intensifying of their spiritual life, and enlarging their conceptions of what they owed to their Redeemer and Lord.

It was, indeed, a memorable time; and many Christians in the home fields, and many labouring in distant lands, can testify to the impulse then imparted. Who that witnessed the vast crowds which gathered in the Agricultural Hall; the West Enders in the Opera House, Haymarket; the East Enders in the large temporary Hall at Bow; or the suburban dwellers who filled the similar great hall at Camberwell; can ever forget the intensity of expectation as the people assembled in these halls; the solemn hush when Mr. Moody rose, the thrill of emotion as Mr. Sankey sang one of the solos, then so new to us, now so familiar; the vivid and solemnising impression of the evangelist's brief, incisive, homely, practical address? And what a volume of praise ascended when the audiences (of perhaps 4,000 people) joined in singing the sweet hymns set to simple melodies which have become household words and music all over Great Britain.

AND THE INQUIRY ROOM!

to so many a new experience, and to many amongst these a test of inexperience in dealing with souls about the vast issues of Eternity; but what an education it proved to many who, in their turn, became men of might in handling the Word of Life.

There is a current saying, concerning some wise and gifted men, that "it was a liberal education to have been familiar with them and their converse." Of Moody it might be said it was a true theological training to have become acquainted with him and his method of winning souls for Christ. He was, above all things, practical; and, whilst full of energy, he did not waste energy, but directed it where it was fitted to move, to awaken, to convince of sin, to persuade the awakened that "God is love." He manifested a great capacity as a commander or leader of men; and this was undoubtedly owing to his sincerity of purpose, unselfish aim, and obvious ability to plan and carry out his great mission.

I remember two incidents — one at the meeting of clergymen, ministers, and laymen in Freemasons' Hall in 1875, to hear Mr. Moody about the purpose of his mission to London. One questioner suggested the printing and circulation of a leaflet, specifying the doctrines he proposed to enunciate in his meetings.

The reply came, swift and clear: "It has all been printed already; you will find it in the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah." The whispered comment of the late Principal Chalmers, as we left the hall together, was an application to the evangelist of the word in Isaiah xli. 15—"A sharp threshing instrument, having teeth."

THE OTHER INCIDENT

occurred at a smaller meeting, prior to his London mission in 1884, composed chiefly of the men who had rallied round him in 1875. Suggestions were invited, and a good many were offered; and then our good friend and Moody's friend, Mr. T. A. Denny, rose and said: "Haven't we had as many suggestions as we can make use of; for, when all is said and done, Mr. Moody will just take his own way of putting this business through, and we can trust him to do it better than we can plan for him—" (or words to that effect). I remember no occasion, or no demand for help for specifically Gospel purposes, which obtained so rapidly or more generously the willing response of Christians; as treasurer, I received for the four months' mission over £28,000, no part of that money being given to Messrs. Moody and Sankey, but all disbursed for the very heavy expenses entailed on the committee.

One cannot pen these sentences without recalling one who was inseparably throughout the missions in 1875 and 1884, our lamented brother Robert Paton, to whose skill, energy, and devotion so much of the success of these missions was due. Of the forty-eight members of committee, and the thirty-two members of council, who gave their names, the weight of their influence, and their presence and practical support to the work, I believe about forty have "gone over to the majority," whilst a similar number continue with us until this day. I have their photographs before me now in a greatly-prized volume.

God gave to his beloved servant, whose departure we mourn so much, a helpmeet well fitted to comfort and encourage him in his labours of love. Mrs. Moody is of English birth, bright, cheery, and fully in sympathy with the honoured husband who has been taken away from her side. He had a tender heart, and loved children. After incessant meetings from Lord's day morning till Friday night, there was no one more ready than he for a game with young people on his resting-day, Saturday, and no one more merry. "The joy of the Lord was his strength," else how could he have accomplished these wonderful missions with such freshness of spirit and endurance of fatigue? It is understood that the death of his little granddaughter deeply, very deeply, affected this strong man, this valiant soldier of Jesus Christ; we can well believe it; he was tender, true, and faithful.

"Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

A Message to the Colleges.

Dr. T. Witton Davies, of the Baptist, Congregational, and University Colleges, Bangor, writes:—

"The work accomplished by the late Mr. Moody among young men seeking to be Christian workers, evangelists, &c., seems to me to read to the leaders of our ministerial training colleges a lesson or two, to which it might be well to pause and attend. I crave permission to say a word on one matter, or rather on two matters, though they almost run into each other and make but one thing: I mean he assigned in his instruction to the spiritual side of all Christian effort, and to the careful study of the Bible, and the Bible as a whole.

"With much that Mr. Moody taught, and with many of his methods, I have but little sympathy; but I am heart and soul with him in the desire to have young men, looking forward to any kind of Christian ministry, all alive in spiritual things, and saturated through and through with the history, prophecy, poetry, &c., contained within the covers of our English Bible. Those who know me, and most of all those who have been in my classes, can have no fear that I undervalue the study of Bible languages or of Biblical science in its most advanced stage; but I have pleaded before, and I plead again, for a more comprehensive and systematic study of the Bible than is possible in Hebrew and Greek classes. No student should be allowed to leave any college who has not been guided right through the Bible with the aid at once of modern knowledge and of a sympathetic instructor. The problems of so-called introduction should be dealt with, the principal dates of literary composition and of history, the contents and drift of the several books, and of all the books, should be gone into. Nor do I think the religious aspect should be taken for granted, as it too often is in Germany, and perhaps in Great Britain; rather it should be explicit and very prominent.

"So far as the Old Testament is concerned, it is my intention to offer such a course next session to the Baptist and Congregational Colleges in this city, though my offer may not be accepted. The A.T.S. examinations do not take in the general knowledge of the Bible, for which I plead. A thousand pities they do not, Nothing they do take in is of so much consequence to the future minister, and nothing could be more easily or pleasantly compassed. Our colleges are dreadfully in danger of being killed by traditionalism and routine."

VIEW OF NORTHFIELD.

By Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis (Brooklyn).

The evangelistic church has lost its greatest leader. There will be sincere mourning to-night throughout the length and breadth of the land. Moody's was a religion that appealed to all humanity.

By Dr. T. S. Hamlin (Washington).

I had known Mr. Moody for over twenty years, much of the time very intimately; and I regard him, on the whole, as one of the greatest men of the century—one who could easily have risen to the first rank in any walk of life.

He was a man of singular purity of life—modest, humble, and even retiring by nature, but always ready to undertake any work that came to hand. He has left a deeper and more enduring impression upon the English-speaking world than any other man of his generation.

Mr. Moody's Students.

HOW THEY ARE TRAINED.

ONE splendid characteristic of Mr. Moody's "boys and girls" (of whatever nationality) is their readiness to go at the word of command into church or slum, among oor or well-to-do, thieves or church members, ust wherever, at a moment's notice, they may e required. And a finer training for practical Gospel work at home and abroad than is given t the Bible Institute would be hard to find. Here are a few examples that came under my wn observation during a visit to Chicago at ne time of the World's Fair.

Mr. Moody was holding meetings in a low uarter of the city. "You needn't think you re going to get an audience down there for ne asking," he said to his workers, when the ngagement was first made. "I know the istrict well. The working-men don't get to ed till 1 or 2 a.m., and they are not coming to n 11 o'clock meeting without some pressure. f we want an audience, we'll have to go out nd get it, and that means work. We'll have dmission by ticket only, and you'll have to esiege the side-walk and the back streets, and et the people out."

Then began the work, and the helpers set to with a will. Not that it was an easy task. ne lady, with a heart full of love for the outast, was met at one house after another with othing but curses. At last, after a long limb upstairs, she reached the top of a rickety enement, only to receive more vehement aths than had been cast at her heretofore. hysically spent, and somewhat discouraged, ne boldly tackled her assailant thus: "Now ook here, I've had nothing but curses all this fternoon, so don't you begin. Please get me drink of water instead, for I'm done up!" hat "touch of nature" that "makes the hole world kin" had the desired effect, and esulted in a hospitable reception, that was as efreshing as it was unexpected.

Again, twenty men visited the "back parts" f the city for several hours on the Saturday ight and Sunday morning, distributing tickets f admission from house to house, in drinking nd gambling saloons, and in the lowest byeays of the city

INFESTED WITH HAUNTS OF VICE.

Naturally, a vein of ready wit and tact are aluable, and, indeed, necessary on such casions. An amusing incident occurred uring this district visitation. A saloonkeeper, becoming enraged at the invasion of is premises for such a purpose, tore up the ckets, which he grabbed from the hands of is customers, and summoned a policeman to ject the perpetrator of the outrage. A portly rm in blue promptly seized the offender, who, owever, by dint of some facetious remark, aised a laugh at the officer's expense. This spelled the solemnity of the occasion, and he llowed up his advantage by asking the aloon-keeper whether, as he objected to his stomers going to the meeting, he would not present them by going himself. "Ah," he id, "you wouldn't welcome me if I did!"

"Indeed we would," was the reply. "See, re's a special ticket" (writing a pass to served seat on a visiting card).

"Then I'll go," he responded, "that's a et;" (Nor was it an idle boast; like a man, e kept his word). The visitor was allowed to peat his distribution among the customers, nd the policeman, somewhat disappointed, sumed his beat alone.

In another saloon the keeper, an irascible erman, besought the visitor not to "make fool ut of himself," which gave rise to a diseussion between himself and his wife (who, anding behind the bar, had already accepted a cket), during which the distribution was conued without further interruption.

This class of work, reviewed to-day, throws an teresting sidelight upon the personality of r. Moody himself, whose work has been so reatly blessed for over thirty years. He was onderfully respected in his native land, and in hicago, in which eighteen years of his arliest public life were passed. I spent me considerable time visiting among the saloons and gambling houses of the city, which are frequented by men of various positions in society (and out of it); and it was quite a rare experience to find a man abuse him, or take any serious exception to his work. On the other hand, I have frequently heard such sentiments as these, from those to whom I had handed cards of invitation: "Is this the Moody? Well, well; I heard him ten years ago in Kansas City, and should have been a better man if I had taken his advice." "Hullo!" says another, "our old friend Moody back again! Yes, I guess I'll go and hear him;" another, "Well, Moody's

A GOOD OLD SORT!

I believe in him. He means what he says and lives up to it."

In a large saloon one of the two brothers who owned it said, "We're all saloon folks here, young man, but we like old Dwight, though he does hit us pretty hard sometimes. But we are none of us as good as we ought to be. Yes, give 'em round, and if you like to leave some (tickets) I'll give 'em to those who come in later."

Thus it was especially gratifying to find the unqualified respect in which the evangelist was held by those whose business suffered at his hands. Even more forcible than the individual testimonies to this, were the splendid musters of men of every class who thronged every building in which he was announced to preach. Let this statement go forth in strongest refutation of the assertion that his own countrymen heeded him not.

The calls upon the wisdom and forbearance of these workers are many and varied. They must be "ready for anything," and truly they "live and learn," sometimes in a rather startling way. What, for instance, would some speakers do, if, during a mission hall service, when you had just "got into their subject," clad in their native garb, marched majestically up to the front seat, and after a while rose, and, in the same stately manner, departed? To maintain the interest of the audience in an address under such circumstances was not an easy task.

TWO STALWART ARABS,

The solemnity of a similar gathering was not increased when a drunken Irishman, in a heavy sleep, fell over backwards, chair and all; and when the preacher urged his hearers to "forget the little episode," the subject of his attentions remarked, "D'ye hear that now! It's a little episode he's callin' me!"

Let me give a typical illustration of Mr. Moody's special work as a preacher during the same period. An enormous circus tent was pressed into service. Those who are familiar with the reputed magnitude of "Barnum's Show" as the "biggest on earth" will be able to estimate the size of an audience which can fill another for that is what is practically claimed by the "Forepaugh" proprietors. With no less than 10,000 seats placed round a vast arena capable of holding as many more, it will be readily conceded that a gathering such as would be the envy of every secular entertainer in town could easily be made comfortable. Whether the Gospel was ever before preached under such circumstances I know not, but it was wonderful to ear and eye alike. In the centre of the arena a platform was erected sufficient to seat the speakers and a few of the singers, the rest of whom were ranged immediately around it. Overhead were trapezes and similar paraphernalia appertaining to the show, while close at hand in another tent, forming an annexe, were caravans containing a variety of live animals, fierce and tame, slim or unwieldy, some fascinating to the gaze of such small boys as could bore a hole through the tightly-drawn curtains, and others that could boast of such beauty as lay in their innate ugliness. And there, among the most incongruous surroundings, the voice of praise blended with the occasional roar of the lion and laugh of the hyena, which, though lost to sight behind the canvas sheets, announced their presence in a mildly interested sort of way.

"THE SAME AS HIS, ONLY BIGGER,"

But what a crowd! Men, women, and children, 18,000 of them, and on a Sunday morning too! By half-past nine the choir took their places in front of an audience already vast in extent, although tickets were available for half an hour yet, before entrance was free to all comers. Be it understood, however, that tickets were not in use to keep people out, but to get them in. In other words, they had been placed in the hands of all who would accept them.

After nearly an hour of singing, individual and congregational, which swept like the voice of the ocean across the field of heads, Mr. Moody rose before probably the largest audience he had ever been called upon to face, and delivered one of those addresses, burning with earnestness, pathos, and love, which, owned by the Spirit of God, have drawn so many not only under the sound of the Gospel, but also under its power; and this before a throng which, for diversity of appearance, incongruity of surroundings, but, at the same time, closeness of attention, stood, perhaps, unique in the annals of Gospel work, as he unfolded the ever-beautiful story of the "Son of Man" who "came to seek and to save that which was lost." The following was at that time

HIS FAVOURITE HYMN.

How he loved to hear it sung, and kept time with hand or foot! He couldn't sing a note himself, but his "heart kept singing" all the time. And now that he is gone, how true of him each verse is in the light of his life:—

I would not ask for earthly store—
Thou wilt my need supply;
But I would covet, more and more,
The clear and single eye,
To see my duty face to face,
And trust Thee, Lord, for daily grace.

Then shall my heart keep singing, . .
While to the cross I cling: . .
For rest is sweet at Jesus' feet,
While homeward faith keeps winging.

I care not for the empty show
That thoughtless worldlings see;
But gladly do the best I know,
And leave the rest with Thee;
Well satisfied that sweet reward
Is sure to those who trust the Lord.

Whate'er the crosses mine shall be
I would not dare to shun;
But only ask to live for Thee,
And that Thy will be done;
Thy will, O Lord, be mine each day,
While pressing on my homeward way.

And when at last, my labour o'er,
I cross the narrow sea,
Grant, Lord, that on the other shore
My soul may dwell with Thee;
And learn what here I cannot know
Why Thou hast ever loved me so.

But to return to the students. Year by year there go forth numbers of these young people, whose hearts the Lord has touched, to take the Gospel wherever an opening occurs, in slum or church, in mission or foreign field. Here is solved a principle, the problem of "how to reach the masses," by going to them; and many a hard-worked pastor to-day "thanks God and takes courage" at having such helpers as these at his right hand.

"Small means, but high aims," may be said to be the qualifications for admission of the students of either sex, and the results that have been attained have more than justified the highest expectations. The teachers are efficient and godly men and women, who see in their pupils such great possibilities of future usefulness as to nerve their highest endeavour to "show themselves workmen approved of God," in the training that they impart.

There are no restrictions as to nationality. The fact that all nations need the Gospel is in itself reason sufficient for admitting any suitable candidate, that he may learn to declare in his own tongue the wonderful works of God. In this manner those who have been prospered in earthly things minister to others in heavenly things, by sending to the admirable institutions at Northfield and Chicago young people of spiritual promise whom they are able to support, or the means (£20 a year) for maintaining some of the many applicants waiting to be received.

CONFERENCE AT EXETER HALL.

(Concluded.)

FRIDAY.

THIS was another busy and full day for the Conference. At the morning session "The Spiritual Standard of Giving" was the subject of an address by Rev. E. A. Stuart, of Bayswater. Christian almsgiving was shown to be one of the greatest blessings to the world. The making haste to be rich appeared to be the ruling force of men's lives, and they were in danger of becoming as yellow as their gold. But a great change had been wrought, one of the evidences of which was the magnificent sympathy and generosity which had recently been manifested to servants by employers, who were considered to be only thinking of the

AMASSING OF WEALTH.

Speaking of methods, Mr. Stuart remarked that the Apostle Paul advised systematic almsgiving. Did they sufficiently realize that God had a right to their property? It was a shame, he thought, that there was no single religion in the world whose followers gave so little for the furtherance of religion as those who follow that of Jesus Christ. He believed the idolater and Roman Catholic even gave more than many Christians. If they did not give systematically they would not know how little they gave. He could not conceive how any Christian man could give less than

ONE-TENTH OF HIS INCOME.

Almsgiving was a proof of the reality of our faith. Every Christian could not go out as a missionary, but he should give proportionately to his income to those who went. It was by giving as God prospers us that we can supply what is lacking in the missionary cause. Almsgiving should be an act of worship to God, a means of grace, and for the fulfilment of the commission to preach the Gospel to every creature.

Mr. G. A. King viewed the subject from a business standpoint, and enlarged upon the use of money. It was a means placed in the hands of men by God whereby He may be glorified, and a higher and permanent interest aroused in the work of the Church of Christ.

At the noon session, Dr. C. F. Harford Battersby spoke thoughtfully on the physical preparation of the missionary; and Rev. T. W. Drury followed upon the mental preparation of the student. It was folly, said the latter, to of a young missionary at the expense of the body; and it was not needless to say, even to those training for spiritual work, that bodily exercise might occupy a place disproportionate to other interests. It is not so much the message, as the man, that must be prepared. There have been many cases where the daily life of the missionary has won converts even without the Word. We must so train the mind as to form the character—so apply the discipline of Christ as to mould the habits after his example. "Steep your minds in Scripture" was the advice of a missionary, and he would say, "Learn all you can about the Bible, but, above all, learn the Bible itself, for the Word of God is the sword of the Spirit which you will have to wield."

Dr. R. F. Horton gave some useful hints as to the best spiritual preparation of the missionary, specially emphasizing the position prayer should occupy. The was like that of the human body—intensely interesting, but not indispensable. What they could not do without in the human body was breath—so in the spiritual life there must be the breathing of prayer. Yet there was nothing so difficult as to pray always. He strongly urged upon the students the practice of perpetual intercession as one of the chief elements of spiritual discipline. There must also be fasting from the world, in order to receive the manna which fell from heaven.

In the afternoon the Union was divided into some thirty sections, the majority of which met at the London offices of the various missionary societies to confer upon the best means of preparing for future work in foreign parts.

In the evening the students and delegates were addressed by Mr. Robert E. Speer, secretary of the American Board of Presbyterian Missions. In the course of an earnest and powerful address, he indicated what the means to the world. It is not an outburst of youthful enthusiasm, nor the result of a hasty and impetuous decision, but rather the outcome of the most mature and deliberate steps the students had ever taken. What does it mean to the Church? The departure from her midst of thousands who have taken upon themselves to enter the mission field. He believed that if one-half of the ordained ministers were sent to the mission field it would be the greatest blessing the world and the Church had ever known. Then what does the Union mean to the missionaries? He thought of the companies of workers in foreign lands looking back across the seas for the relief and reinforcements that never came. What does it mean to the little bands converted from heathenism, and to the millions who had never heard of the Saviour of the World? What is life without a knowledge of Christ? Lastly, what does the movement mean to Him who committed to his followers the task of preaching the Gospel to every creature? The and He is still waiting—waiting as yet in vain—to return and claim his crown and throne, for He has said that, when the Gospel had been preached as a witness to all nations, would the end come. Surely He meant that the time of his coming and the evangelization of the world were allied. Christians must fulfil those human conditions on which the return of the Lord and Master is made to depend.

The Bishop of Newcastle followed with some helpful and encouraging remarks on the watchword of the Union, which he thought was neither superficial nor revolutionary, but had been completely vindicated.

WHAT THE CONFERENCE COST.

In the course of the evening, Mr. Tissington Tatlow, secretary of the S.V.M.U., read a financial statement as to the cost of the Conference. This amounted to £1,200. Happily, the speaker was able to add that the whole of this sum had been subscribed. The entire cost of the Union, with its four different departments, for the year ending August, 1900, would be £1,600. Of this sum £600 had already been promised, and in order to raise the remaining £1,000 contributions were solicited.

Subscription forms were handed round, and promises made amounting to £850 towards the expenses of the current year, and £200 to be paid before the end of 1900.

SATURDAY.

"The Need of Thinkers for the Mission Field" was the subject of a stirring address by Dr. Clifford. He was followed by Dr. Richard Glover, who held that the need is for men and women who will do their work in the most thorough way, and bring the intellect thereto as well as the passion of sympathy and pity.

Rev. J. H. Bernard spoke of the "Need of Advance in Missionary Education." There had been a lack of scientific knowledge of missionary needs and methods on the part of those preparing to serve the ministry of the Gospel, both at home and abroad. He confessed that, as things stood, he did not think it possible to find a place in the overcrowded programmes of theological colleges and divinity schools for the history of the work of the Church abroad, even during the past 100 years. They could not teach a young clergyman all he ought to know in one or two years, but if they could bring home principles to the hearts of such as were to teach, they would have done a great deal to prepare them for the study of modern missions.

Rev. George Robson (Perth) presented several pleas for advance in missionary study. Among these was: (1) The royal relation of missions to the progress of the world; and (2) the fact that without the study of missions it is impossible to have a right idea of the position of the kingdom of God in the present age.

A QUESTION MEETING

was held in the afternoon, and a fair number of students attended to hear answers to queries suggested by the various discussions during the Conference. Mr. R. E. Speer, in reply to a query whether there was room for art students in the mission field, declared that there was room, providing their artistic talent were made the handmaid of missionary effort.

Another question referred to the length of time that might elapse before results might be seen of work in the missionary cause. Dr. R. Laws, who replied, gave some of his personal experiences abroad, saying that if God was so patient in the evangelization of the world, human workers must not be impatient. The sowing of the seed was theirs; the issues belonged to God, who had promised that his word should not return unto Him void. Rev. W. T. A. Barber, head master of the Leys School, closed a profitable meeting with an address on personal devotion and consecration.

The closing meeting was undoubtedly one of the most impressive of the week. Although it was Saturday evening, and many of the delegates and representatives had to be occupying pulpits on the Sabbath, there was scarcely any falling-off in the attendance, and one and all were inclined to regret that a week, fraught with such uplifting and inspiration, was about to close.

Mr. S. F. Hawkes, chairman of the General College Department, was the first to give to the students, The Conference had, he remarked, been a time of preparation—life itself was nothing more—and the future would be the testing-time for the strength they had gained by communion and fellowship during the days of the convention. Although their enthusiasm might not remain as warm as it had been during the last few days, there was consolation in the thought that God and his purpose and will concerning them would never fail.

Dr. Karl Fries (Stockholm) also spoke helpful and encouraging words. He voiced the appreciation and gratitude of the foreign delegates towards those who had ministered to their spiritual needs during the days of conference. The farewell message of Miss Effie K. Price was one of beautiful simplicity. Its keynote was "I come to do thy will, O God." The doing of his will was to secure greater joys than had ever been known, and the following of that path which would shine "more and more unto the perfect day." In all circumstances the eternal and irresistible will of God must be done.

Mr. Duncan's parting message was "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." With intense feeling, he urged a continual looking to the One who was able to maintain their daily strength. So would they return to their colleges with stronger determination to meet the trials and problems of life in the spirit of Christ, and with the assurance of victory.

Mr. Speer followed with

to any who had not yet surrendered themselves to Christ. To such the words came home—"Behold I stand at the door and knock." It was, he said, a dreadful thing if any were going from that gathering with hearts and minds steeled towards the Crucified One. Many had seen great visions, formed new resolutions and purposes. To these he would say memories of that wonderful Conference or even Bible study would not keep them from stumbling. Only the Almighty Saviour was able to keep them from stumbling. Mr. Speer exhorted to stedfastness in faith and practice.

The singing of the hymn "O, Jesus, I have promised," was followed by a season of silent devotion, and a few solemn words of prayer from Mr. Duncan. And then the proceedings ended, and the Conference was numbered among past events and experiences; but, by God's blessing, it will never be forgotten by many who attended its sessions.

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

GENERAL RESUMPTION OF MEETINGS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

ON Sabbath evening of last week (January 7) the work of the Evangelistic Campaign was resumed in all the districts. Towards the close of 1899 there appeared to be a slight falling-off in the attendances; but, so far as we have been able to judge, the fresh start was made with larger gatherings. During the holiday season attention was called over and over again, by the secular press, to a remarkable falling-off in the number of arrests for drunkenness and petty offences. This was entirely attributed to the influence of the South African War; but we venture to think that another cause, to which a portion of the charge may fairly be assigned, was the work which the Lord has been doing among our people.

Two old and tried friends—Mr. George Clarke and Mr. Richard Hill—have returned to the meetings after temporary absence. Four new voices are being heard, namely those of Mr. John Climie, Rev. Henry Montgomery (Belfast), Mr. F. Wycliffe Pascoe (London), and Mr. Harry Young. As we go to press Rev. John McNeill is inaugurating his new crusade among the great numbers of respectable young people who spend their evenings sauntering up and down some of the principal streets.

COWCADDENS FREE CHURCH.

As we announced in our last issue, on the closing evening of 1899 a mission was begun in Cowcaddens Free Church by Mr. F. WYCLIFFE PASCOE, which has been attended by many evidences of blessing. The centre was a specially favourable one on account of the continual aggressive work carried on during the long pastorate of Rev. William Ross. Worshipping with the congregation on the two Sabbaths (December 31 and January 7), we were deeply impressed with the thoroughness of the preparation for this special effort.

One evidence of the readiness of the people was the stream of requests for prayer, which began to pour in even before the evangelist arrived. Here, as elsewhere, God's people with one consent united to ask "the God of the households" for their husbands, wives, brothers, sisters, and children—and ere many days passed the supplication was changed to thanksgiving in a number of cases.

Open-air work has always been a special feature of the congregational work, a recess within ear-shot of the great thoroughfare of Cowcaddens affording suitable accommodation for it. The local branch of the Mizpah Band was in strong force, and short, clear testimonies to the of the Lord never failed. The two missionaries, Mr. Alexander Fraser and Mr. P. McB. Stewart, were busy at all times, encouraging and stimulating workers, as well as going farther afield to invite the passers-by to step inside. Special mention was made of the valuable help received also from the workers belonging to the neighbouring mission of Renfield Street United Presbyterian Church.

On the Saturday evenings and Sabbath mornings there were large companies gathered to wait upon God; and during the week gatherings were held every afternoon for Bible reading and prayer. The debaucheries of the immediate neighbourhood led to much special intercession for the victims of the drink sin. These additional meetings were started with considerable misgiving as to attendance, but the spirit of prayer was poured out upon the people, and mothers and wives especially came in encouraging numbers.

From the beginning much blessing followed Mr. Pascoe's Gospel ministry. A regularly-organized band of "soul-winners" took charge of all cases of inquiry as soon as they became apparent, and night after night Messrs. Ross, Pascoe, Fraser, and Stewart, with their helpers, had their hands full of pleasant and fruitful work. On Tuesday evening the Lord was present in power, and when Thursday evening came there seemed to be a culmination. Usually Friday shows a great falling-off in Cowcaddens, but this time at the turn-out and the interest manifested. The regular Campaign meetings were suspended on Saturday, but the men of the Mizpah Band carried on their work, and the blessing continued, there being, as Mr. Ross testified, three of the most satisfactory cases of conversion, so far as man could judge, that had been known in the church for a long time.

THE WORKERS WERE SURPRISED

Many respectable working people were found in the audiences, with a goodly number of who abound on every side. A man who disturbed the meeting much one evening when we were present, remained at the close to pray, after some tactful and patient handling. Another who was anxious, but had not found the light, persuaded a brother and sister to accompany him on his second visit; and all three went home rejoicing in the Saviour. A girl who was converted on the first Tuesday returned on Wednesday with her sister, and she too was saved. Two young couples, newly married, were all led to the cross, starting their new life under circumstances strangely different from what they had anticipated. A woman, who sat in the pew in front of us one evening, had evidently come with her mind quite made up to bring the matter to a conclusion; and, when she came into contact with a wise, gentle sister, was surprised to find the Lord more anxious to receive her than she was to come. A large lodging-house for men close by, supplies a continual stream of hardened cases, and all through the neighbouring slum district the church is a very lighthouse to which those who are in distress instinctively turn.

MR. GEORGE CLARKE IN DENNISTOUN.

Mr. GEORGE CLARKE returned to the Campaign work last week, and began on Sabbath evening in Dennistoun district, where earlier in the winter he had done good work for the Master. The centre chosen was the Free Church, of which Rev. James Barr is minister. The meetings were large and hopeful in appearance. Visitors were at once impressed with the way in which young men and women came out whenever Mr. Clarke's name was announced. Many years ago, when his labours were so much blessed in the West-end, the same charm was noted; and again, when at another time he went to Springburn, God wrought a marvellous work through him among the young workmen.

The excellent arrangements for open-air work made in connection with former missions in the district had not been renewed on this occasion. This lack was cause of deep regret to Mr. Clarke, and he made it his business, from the outset, to stir up the Christians in this matter. Having a deep love himself for work among children, he at once caught the fire on hearing the Monday's reports on work among the boys and girls, and urged parents to bring out the little people, as the meetings would be as suitable for them as for adults.

On Monday evening the evangelist told his audience that, on going home the previous evening, he had prayed much for a message for that service. When the answer was borne in on his heart, he said to the Lord that he could not give it. But every time he prayed the message came back again. He himself wanted to speak upon another subject altogether, and entered the prayer meeting intending to do so.

But while they were praying, the Lord sent the old message home to him: and he "must give it." He would not say that it was not intended for himself; it might be for ministers, elders, or deacons. At any rate he was assured it was for some who thought they were all right.

Reading in Revelation iii. 14-22, he called special attention to verses 15 and 16, and described them as containing "the most extraordinary statement ever made by the Lord to mortal man." Then followed a terrible indictment of the fashionable religion of the present time, which was shown to be exactly the same as the condition of things in the Laodicean Church. "The worst spiritual state a man can be in, in the eyes of Jesus Christ, is the very state the so-called Christian of to-day is most proud of being in."

"Hot" persons were pictured as those who shout texts at the street corners, who talk about religion in their offices, who tackle people about their souls, and who are expected by everybody to be whenever a special mission is announced. "A religion without enthusiasm is worse than none. A red-hot man is one who believes in his heart what lots of people believe in their heads."

There was a hush of deep solemnity all through the meeting, as Mr. Clarke seemed to be tearing aside the veil from the secret places of many hearts; and a special thrill came with the recounting of his own experience when, after telling the story of the Cross, his own brother said, "Well, George, if I believed that in my heart, I would throw up all else and go out to tell others about it." That went home to his own heart, and he came to the same conclusion himself. On the occasion of his first visit to Scotland, Mr. Moody had warned him that the people there knew the Gospel story as well as he did, but what they needed was to have it brought down from the head to the heart.

Among other leading Christian workers present in addition to the pastor we noticed Major Colquhoun (of Corsica), Rev. Thomas Somerville (Blackfriars Parish Church), and Rev. David Lowe (London Road Free Church)

MR. W. D. DUNN AT BETHANY HALL.

The Campaign meetings have now reached Bethany Hall, in Bernard Street, Bridgeton, and Mr. W. D. Dunn is the evangelist in charge. The gatherings have been large from the outset, and testimony abounds on every hand that the Spirit of God has been present in power. Mr. Dunn says he does not remember the same breaking down since "the seventies," when, in company with the late Mr. J. M. Scroggie, he was frequently at work in the neighbourhood.

The open-air work is thoroughly organized, and the companies go farther afield than at any other centre we have visited. An effective novelty is the use of the lantern on the street, with specially striking pictures dealing with wrath, judgment, and salvation. A set of slides vividly illustrating the evils and effects of drink are causing a special stir, and a number of the publicans are openly resenting the exhibition of them. Three bands go to different centres each evening, the enthusiasm of the leader (Mr. Robert Logan) pervading all.

We found the large audience well mixed, the main elements being from the more comfortable working classes and a much poorer labouring section. Mr. Dunn was doing deep foundation work during the first week, night after night emphasizing the absolute ruin of man by nature, but never failing also to preach the blessed fulness of the remedy. At the close there was a soul-stirring manifestation of the depth of the work. Those who had brought unsaved ones with them were first invited to claim an interest in the prayers, then backsliders, and both classes freely responded. A number of backsliders who had been restored on previous evenings bore their testimony openly, and afterwards a number of penitents came out to the front, accompanied by friends and workers. Altogether it was a solemn time, and reminded us more of revival times than most of those we have seen. Old and young are being born again night by night.

"Hildah's Folly."

By Mrs. HARVEY-JELLIE.

"HOW tired the child seems to-day, Frank; yet he wants to go to Sunday school," said a weary-looking woman as she closed the door after seeing a boy of eight years go off. "Poor laddie; ah, wife, if only I could take you and the boys to the sea for one week," said Frank Shalton, and he gave a desponding look out into the narrow street, where the hot sun seemed to focus its fiercest beams.

His wife, was one of those patient women who bear long and much uncomplainingly. Constant drains on the weekly supply, for medicines and extra necessaries in illness, had left her no margin for even ordinary comforts for herself, and, after bearing up cheerfully thus far, it seemed all spirit was going and she must collapse.

"Sometimes I wonder, Frank, how it is many (seemingly worldly people) have all comforts and health-giving pleasure, and so many who are Christ's disciples pine in discomfort, and have no means to enjoy life at all. I feel for you, toiling in that killing office, and for the children." And, sitting one on either side of the small window, two more refined and weary faces could scarcely be found. The hot day passed on, and the boy of five years cried with headache, and Harry told how kind teacher had been to him in school.

"What did she say, Harry?" asked his mother.

"She said I wanted fresh air, mother, and she held my hand when she stood up to sing, 'cos I was tired."

Quite early that Sunday night the four weary lives under that roof lay sleeping—restless, troubled sleep.

. . . . .

In a pretty villa, about a mile away, slept Hildah Ashton. No want or weakness disturbed her; but now and again some wakening thought aroused her, causing sleep to play "fast-and-loose." The Ashtons prided themselves on being a "well-connected family," and it was a study with them how best to maintain their right position with becoming dignity.

Hildah, the second daughter, however, greatly puzzled and perplexed her two sisters and widowed mother.

To her "a right position" meant to be on the side of Christ in the world, and true "dignity" was synonymous with humility and love. Her brightest pastime was in doing kindly deeds in a gentle spirit, and in her Sunday class she had one boy whose delicate features and thin form made the haunting vision of her sleeping hours. She was not neglectful of her charge, and knew more of the secrets of her scholars' home-life than some would trouble about.

One day, unseen by any, she had found her way to the street, amid high houses and low basements, and standing near a barred window she saw Frank Shalton bending over his desk. His face was worn, his eye held a dispirited look as he turned to reach a paper. She knew he had been out of work for some time through illness—knew his wife was troubled about him.

To the three sisters of the Ashton family a "windfall," in shape of a small money gift, had come, and each one had an equal portion. Clara saw the prospect of richer dress and longer travels. Adeline saw a chance to lay by something; but to Hildah the gift opened up a way for blessing and helping.

"Foolish girl! who cares for your sacrifice," said those at home. "Look after yourself, and tell others to do the same," said her sister.

Yet on Hildah's face shone the brightest ray of gratitude, and in her heart dwelt the noblest purposes.

The Shaltons were not altogether unnoticed—one pitied them, another blamed them, and someone even expressed a wish that he could help; but Hildah took up their trouble, and bore it with them. She entered into the details of their suffering, and shared their difficulties. In spite of ridicule and reproof, she went to a country house where she knew it would be a help, engaging board and rooms for a fortnight; and in the evening hour, when Frank would be home, she called. The sight made her long to tell her errand.

"I am rejoicing in prospect of a great pleasure," she said.

"And you deserve it, Miss Ashton, for your goodness in patiently teaching my boy. I want to thank you," said Jennie, with a languid sigh. Hildah noticed the pinched look on the children's faces and the hollow cheeks of the mother, as she replied, "There is a charming spot away in the country, among trees and lanes and shady dells, and I want you all to go and spend a free and restful time there.

Astonishment was crowned by thanks, and tears bathed the teacher's hand as Jennie held it before parting.

Left alone, they looked at one another in blank amazement.

"To think of it, Frank—away from the stifling city, out in God's pure air and sunshine!" And Jennie began to make preparations, while her husband obtained leave of absence.

"What folly!" exclaimed the Ashtons. "Do you suppose those people appreciate all this outlay?"

"Do you think I can appreciate the honour of being able to give this health-restoring pleasure?" was Hildah's answer.

Nearly a week went on, and instead of the worry and care of the close house, and the trying atmosphere of the office, Frank and Jennie Shalton were sitting under a spreading oak tree, and the children playing around them.

In the romantic house their comfort was attended to, and for once they knew the rare luxury of perfect rest of mind and body. Blue sky overhead, green grass beneath, daily they luxuriated in God's goodness to them. The holiday worked wonders, and the Shaltons returned with new energy and restored health.

Months slipped away and summer came again, but Hildah lay dying. Many times Jennie Shalton had called to ask about her, telling often of the new life that had come to them all since the time when they went right away to the glorious country.

"What do you say, now?" asked Hildah of her sisters one day. "Shalton is well, and able to take a better place; his wife is stronger, and the children well cared for. Didn't I put my money to good interest? I wonder if you have as much gladness out of yours?"

The sisters watched her grow weaker, the mother became alarmed, and more than astonished at her daughter's peace. As the days passed, scholars and parents came with entreaties to see the one who had always made their sorrows hers, and their interests her pleasure. "God bless you, miss," said one woman. "You brought life and love into my dark home, and we all thank God for you."

"Oh, teacher, we'll all come to you one day: we'll never forget your lessons. Everybody loves you," said one of her class.

A message of cheer was sent to each from her bed, and Hildah's only regret seemed to be that she had not done more. The last to see her was Harry Shalton. With timid tread the boy crossed the room, carrying a bunch of flowers.

"Teacher, mother says we all send you these flowers; they must remind you of our love and thanks. Father says you saved us, when you sent us away last summer. He doesn't think he would have lived to pick these flowers if it hadn't been for you; and what would mother and us have done without father?"

"Harry, tell them I'll prize these blossoms, because they speak of the joy I had in helping you all!" she whispered.

So they laid her to rest, and instead of calling it "Hildah's Folly" they spoke of her loving deeds and Christian service as "Hildah's Joy."

How happily the working days
In his dear service fly!
How rapidly the closing hour,
The time of rest, draws nigh,
When all the faithful gather home—
A joyful company!
And ever where the Master is Shall his blest servants lie!

"The Real Presence."

Thoughts on the Lord's Supper.

"Do this in Remembrance of Me" . . . "until He come" (1 Cor. xi. 24-26).

LET us, putting aside all teaching of men, and preconceived notions concerning the Lord's Supper, prayerfully "search the Scriptures" to ascertain the teaching of the Word about it. What is the leading thought connected with it?

1. The Romanist will at once say:—The real bodily Presence of Christ, under the appearance of bread and wine. "Body, Blood, Soul, and Divinity" (Council of Trent); or, rather, the real presence of millions of human bodies and millions of divinities of Christ, as every crumb of bread, and every drop of wine contains, under its appearance, a perfect, living Christ—Transubstantiation.

2. The Lutheran, while denying Transubstantiation, still clings to a real Presence, not "in" but "with" the elements—Consubstantiation; and asserts that, in some inexplicable way, Christ is received.

3. Then there are Evangelicals, who, while they reject both the above views, still cling to a real though spiritual Presence, as the leading thought in the Supper, their idea of it being a kind of banquet at which Christ is spiritually present, and to which believers are "gathered" to worship a present, though unseen, Lord. They sing:—

Jesus, Lord, we know Thee present,
At thy table, freshly spread,
Seated at thy priceless banquet,
With thy banner overhead.
(Solomon's Song ii. 4.)

4. What is the Bible view? Exactly the opposite of all these. The real bodily absence of the Lord, rather than his bodily or spiritual presence is the leading thought.

"Do this in remembrance of Me," involves the idea of absence. "Until He come," also fixes the mind on the fact that He is not present.

During his absence Christ has directed his children to meet together from time to time to praise and worship Him, and to call to mind what great things their absent Lord has done for them, especially by dying on Calvary. The very essence of the feast is that our hearts should be centred on Him, while He is absent, "until He come." Of course, as God, Christ is "omnipresent," but that thought is not one to be emphasized in the Lord's Supper.

When the angel at the tomb said to the women, "He is not here," what should we think of Mary Magdalene, had she said, "Jesus, Lord, we know Thee present." Why! that she was bringing in a truth which was singularly out of place at the time.

Let me illustrate my meaning:—Suppose a man had for some reason to live abroad, and to leave his wife and children in England. He wants his children not to forget him, so he tells his wife to put an empty chair, every Monday morning, at the breakfast table, and his photograph in a prominent place; to talk to the children about him, to remind them of his love to them, to explain to them that all they have comes from him, &c.

He agrees to ring the telephone bell during the meal, and directs that one of the children be allowed to listen to the voice of the absent one, and tell the others what he may say to them. All this is to be done "until he comes" home.

This seems to me to be exactly the Bible idea of the Lord's Supper. We come together to talk of the absent One, to listen to his voice speaking through his Word, and to "remember" all He has done and is still doing, and will yet do for us—"until He come." This is true worship! "Come quickly, Lord Jesus."

Islington Clerical Meeting.

THE programme of this annual gathering of clergy, which took place on Tuesday of last week, diverged somewhat from the lines upon which the meetings have hitherto been conducted. There was but little discussion; but the tendency of some of the speeches was suggestive of a desire for a wider and more comprehensive Protestantism than has characterized these Evangelical conferences in the past.

There was a large attendance. Prebendary Barlow, D.D., presided, and in his opening address referred to the subjects for consideration, which were suggested by an address of the late Archbishop Benson, when he described the Church of England as "Catholic, Apostolic, Reformed, and Protestant." He touched briefly upon these distinctions and principles of the National Church. Canon Edmonds opened with "The Church of England: Catholic." The historical and modern interpretation of the word was dealt with at length, as were also the teachings which tended to narrow and specialize the term. It was maintained that the Church of England is Catholic, with all the rights of a National Church. Underlying all methods of worship two things emerge—the one the expression of our deepest thoughts of God; the other finds its law in the highest attainable attitude of the nature of man. The Church's organic independence of the great Western See (Canon Edmonds held) is a question which involves her Catholicity. She lifts up her eyes and looks upon the fields, but is not satisfied with what she sees. The Church is not yet wholly Catholic, but the deficiency is not one that Pope or Primate can supply. We need more of the presence and power of our Lord, for "where Jesus Christ is, there is the Catholic Church."

To Chancellor Bernard was allotted the treatment of the subject, "The Church of England: Apostolic." He pointed out that the Church of England did not make any exclusive claim to the attribute Apostolic. It was which the Lord founded. His method of foundation was to gather and train apostles, not so much as the governors, but rather as the nucleus, of the Church, as the eye-witnesses and expounders of the truth. The speaker dealt with the many beliefs and teachings of the saints and professors of the early centuries, and showed that elements of unscriptural teaching may exist without vitiating the power of a church as an instrument of God's purposes of salvation. While admitting this, with regard to the Catholic Church, they must also admit it as referring to their own branch of it; and the necessary action in withstanding error within it must be tempered by this conviction.

"The Church of England: Reformed," was the basis of a forcible and stirring address by Bishop Barry. How far, he asked, did our English Reformation pursue the ideal of the apostolic exhortation to the Romans? "Be transformed in the renewing of your mind, to prove what is the good and acceptable and perfect will of God."

was not an isolated movement, for in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the idea of Church Reform was in every thoughtful mind. The era itself was one of change and development. The result of the bold, deep inquiry into Catholic truth was that men began to look searchingly into the great system of religious thought known as Scholastic Theology. One of the characteristics of the Reformation was that it was a distinctly national movement, but of the nation as a Church. It was true reformation, and not revolution—not the setting up of a new faith or a new church—but an earnest attempt for spiritual renewal of the old by reversion to "the apostolic doctrine and fellowship." This ideal was not, however, perfectly realized. In the Prayer Book (contended the Bishop) were embodied the permanent spirit and principle of the Reformation; and the claim of independence for self-reformation involved an isolation of the Church of England from the churches which still accept the autocracy of Rome. In conclusion, the Bishop remarked that forms may change, and often ought to change; but principles, if once true, were true for all time.

To Professor Ryle was committed the discourse on the Protestant view of the Church of England. Remarking that the word "Protestant" was in some quarters derided when applied to the Church of England, he said it denoted that the Church of the sixteenth century renounced the supremacy of Rome, and purged itself of unscriptural corruptions in teaching, discipline, and rite. The word, he pointed out, is not merely retrospective or an echo of the sixteenth century, but bears upon the modern life of the Church. He deprecated the Protestantism that spends itself upon the abuse of the Pope, Romish priests, and Catholics.

THE PROTESTANT CHARACTER of the Church was determined by at least three distinctive principles: (1) Holy Scripture as the one absolute standard of Christian doctrine and conduct; (2) complete liberty of conscience and the right of private judgment as the prerogatives of the believer in Christ; (3) the independence of the National Church from foreign control. Protestantism, he maintained, is not dead, but is a living force. Its power and spirit have been absorbed in the life of the country, and have been brought into the conscience of the human race. If the Protestantism of the Church is to retain its hold of the people, it must be true to the traditions of the Reformation, and lead in spiritual and mental movements. The Church has something more to do than go over the ground traversed by our forefathers. Old truths are always truths, but have to be stated in new ways; but old shibboleths lose their power, and are quickly forgotten or relegated to ridicule. It is from a Protestant Church—neither professing infallibility nor acquiescing in corruptions and imperfections—that we look with hope for reform. Professor Ryle went on to denounce attempts at reunion with Rome, declaring that there is more gladness in the English mind at the thought of a better understanding between the Church of England and members of the great Nonconformist and Scotch Presbyterian communions than in the contemplation of any questionable intrigue with the Vatican.

The afternoon session was not so largely attended as usual, but the subjects for consideration were of a more practical nature.

"How can the Church of England faithfully discharge her duties to the nation as a whole?" was dealt with in a paper read by Archdeacon Perowne, who pointed out that the Church still had power and INFLUENCE WITH THE PEOPLE.

He adduced proofs of the intimacy of the relation in which the Church of England stands to the nation as a whole. In spite of the existence of much that is to be deplored, and of what has yet to be achieved, England is, in much more than name, a Christian country. He did not believe that the close relationship to the State was a hindrance to the Church. If Disestablishment came from without, it would be a calamity to the Church and a disaster to the nation; but if it came from within it would be an unmixed evil, would aggravate their "unhappy divisions," and inevitably tend to disintegration and disruption. The Church must faithfully discharge her duties, and not follow, but lead the country in all matters of faith and practice. If the Church was true to the nation, true to herself by being true to God, there would be no need to fear.

Rev. F. S. Webster followed with an impressive discourse, pointing out that God deals with nations as well as individuals, although in a different manner.

PERMANENT BLESSING

to the human race, he contended, does not come by education, social influence, or ecclesiastical operations, but by the personal work of the Holy Ghost. The Church of England best fulfils her duties by seeking to build up the character of the individual, and to supply the nation with salt that has not lost its savour. If this generation is to be judged at all, it must be now. God's dealings with nations are characterized by retribution, swift and exact. Righteousness—which sometimes brings an individual, like John the Baptist, beneath the headsman's axe—exalteth a nation. Sin, though sometimes in the individual it prospers and is preferred, is a disgrace to any people. God keeps shorter accounts with nations than with individuals—the reckoning day comes in the present life. The Church should seek to reform, not follow, public opinion. Personal character should outweigh everything else in estimating men. Mr. Webster boldly denounced any countenancing, on the part of the clergy, of questionable amusements and indulgences.

Prebendary Webb-Peploe defined the methods and principles on which the Church of England should discharge her office to individuals, in an earnest and deeply thoughtful discourse. He spoke of the results which flow from the constitution of the Church. Work for souls must be recognised as the very necessity of its being. Having explained at some length the scriptural significance and the modern interpretation of the words, duty and office, Mr. Webb-Peploe declared that every member of the Church of England has to discharge the evangelistic and pastoral office of the faithful by a clear presentation to others of what the Lord has revealed to them of the unsearchable riches that are in Christ Jesus—the making known in simple terms the good tidings of God's love, grace, mercy and power. We are the media by which the work of the Lord may be carried out. Those who claim to know most of Christ should so live Him that the world may be compelled to acknowledge "God is in those men of a truth." The work of evangelizing and shepherding the people will only be done when each single servant of the Blessed Master—whether clergyman or layman—takes up the high, holy, and heavenly calling that we have received, and is set apart utterly and only for the business of the King. Every idea, aim, action, dream, letter, sermon, conversation, engagement, whether social or public, should be pervaded by the one thought, "God so loved the world that He gave; and I have to pass on, to them that need it, the glorious love of God in Jesus Christ our Lord."

EVANGELISTIC AND PASTORAL

REV. E. A. STUART,

speaking on the same subject, remarked that in dealing with individuals it is necessary to insist upon a conviction of sin. He referred to the opportunity of getting into touch with individual members of congregations, and the necessity of becoming acquainted with the younger members of the Church.

CANON CHRISTOPHER,

who has attended these annual assemblies for fifty years, closed the meeting with a few words of encouragement and counsel. Referring to the fact that High Churchmen had been asked to address them, he heartily welcomed them in the work of resisting the efforts that were being made to undo the Reformation.

Irish Notes.

DURING the past year the Church of Ireland lost by death forty-one of its ministers, including one bishop, two deans, four archdeacons, and two baronets. Eleven of these were over eighty years of age, and two were eighty-nine, while twenty-nine were seventy years or upwards.

The Bishop of Cork seems to be a hardworking man. In his annual charge to the united diocese he says he delivered during the year eighty-three sermons or addresses in fifty-six different churches, and travelled several thousands of miles.

Valuable work continues to be done in Belfast by Rev. Henry Montgomery in connection with the Shankill Road Mission. On Saturday nights special open-air meetings are conducted for the purpose of trying to reach drunken men; while, of course, indoor services of various kinds, including evangelistic addresses and Bible classes, are not forgotten. Besides, the temporal wants of many of the poor are carefully looked after. Nearly all the workers are voluntary, and the mission is practically self-supporting, although there is still a building debt of £4,400 upon it.

Waifs at Work and Play.

MANY a heart must have thrilled at the sight presented at Albert Hall on Saturday last, when Dr. Barnardo's Waifs and Strays entertained the members and friends of the Young Helpers' League. Very good hosts and hostesses they proved too, giving an entertainment as varied as it was delightful. There were no speeches, but during the afternoon Canon Fleming recited, in his own powerful and masterly fashion, "Give us Men!" and the Duchess of Somerset received purses in aid of the work. The songs were well chosen, and capitally rendered by a choir of some 600 voices, accompanied by a fine band.

After reviewing gallant little bluejackets, and khaki-clad lads, our thoughts were brought back to more work-a-day scenes by the appearance of wash-tubs, clothes-lines, mangling machines, &c., the laundry girls doing their work with expertness. Following these came tradesmen bearing trophies of their crafts. They in their turn gave place to dainty maidens and stalwart lads who most creditably engaged in club and wand drill, rhythmical romps and lantern processions. Ten little Chinamen and their quaint action song, the top-boot race, the tugs-of-war, and the dressing-up competition were sources of keen amusement. The entertainment closed with a limelight tour through Slumland, returning by Stepney Causeway, and finally crossing the ocean to the Canadian Homes.

Looking at the bright, healthy faces, and hearing the happy laughter of these once waifs and strays, recalled the lines,

> Ah! what would the world be to us,
> If the children were no more?
> We should dread the dark behind us
> Worse than the desert before.

Surely this work of rescuing the child-life of our cities will be richly blessed, for it is so entirely in harmony with the teaching of One who said, "Suffer the little children to come unto Me." There are many, young and old, who have not yet taken their share in this glorious work. To such Miss Rachel Norton, secretary of the Young Helpers' League, 18, Stepney Causeway, will be glad to make suggestions as to how they too may help.

Pen Pictures from Afar.

VERY many are the instances which missionaries can give of the wonderful transforming power of the Gospel of Christ upon the minds and hearts of the heathen. From every field of missionary enterprise converts have not only given their hearts to Christ, but have felt the Divine call to hand on the torch of truth, lift high its bright light, that they themselves may be missionaries in turn to their own people.

Some of my pen pictures have already sketched native workers whose labours God has greatly blessed. I doubt, however, whether any labourer in the Master's vineyard has done better home-missionary work than the Hunan convert, Li Yiu Ken, of whom I think you will be delighted to read. It is such a beautiful proof of the saving power of the Gospel when converts from heathendom risk the loss of all things—life, property, friends, relatives—all for the great joy of telling their former companions how much God loves them.

Li Yiu Ken came to Hankow from the province of Hunan on a visit. He never dreamt of the infinite blessing that he would carry back with him. He was and had for a companion one who was still more wicked than himself. One day as Li was passing Kia Kiai Chapel, he thought it would be amusing to go in. He had not listened very long before he heard for the first time that there was a God in heaven and a Saviour from sin. He was arrested at once, stayed a long time, and the next day went again. This he did, day after day, for nearly two months, spending much time in the study of the truths of the Gospel. Then he was baptized as a Christian as he was just about to leave for his distant home.

Now the missionary fervour began to burn. He bought a number of Christian tracts and some Gospel portions to distribute among his friends at home. When he first told his own people that he had become a Christian, they were very angry with him for "eating the foreign doctrine," and "selling his heart to foreigners," as they called becoming a follower of Jesus Christ. Threats and scoldings had no effect whatever upon Li. At last his patience silenced the opposition. One after another began to be interested in the new doctrine. They even joined him in worship some of the neighbours also called at his house for a talk about God.

By giving away religious books, and by frequent conversation with his neighbours, this fervid disciple sought to win them to the Lord. He started a free-night school, where he taught a number of children and young people the elements of the Christian faith. For years he held on, in the face of great opposition, nothing daunted. At last his work and faith have been rewarded. Four families in his native place, including his own, have become Christians, and will be baptized as soon as one of the missionaries is able to go up to his village.

Don't you think that is grand? Toiling in faith—scattering the good seed of the Kingdom all those years without a doubt as to the result. And best of all was given him after awhile, when news was brought to him that his former wicked friend, whom he had entreated to serve Christ, gave his heart wholly to God. Will you be surprised to hear that this once bad man, P'eng Lang Sen, is now one of the brightest, bravest, and most earnest Christians in the whole of China? An indefatigable worker he is, too, trying to lead others to the Lord Jesus Christ. A year or two ago Li Yiu Ken came down to Hankow from his far-away home in Hunan, and you may imagine how happy these two friends were to meet as Christian brothers.

Would you not like to know the object which brought Li to Hankow? It was to hand over, as a free gift to the church, a house and land, so that as soon as possible a mission station might be opened in his native village. How I wish I could sketch you his portrait! But this pen-picture is enough to give you an idea of his beautiful character.

What I want all my readers to do is to thank God for raising up such splendid native teachers as Li Yin Ken and P'eng Lan Seng. Then will you pray, too, that multitudes of missionaries to their own people like these may be raised up in all native churches?

MALCOLM FORBES, MURRAY BUXTON, WINNIE GARNHAM, WINIFRED MAUNDER.—I am glad to welcome you as new "searchers," and trust the study will be useful and interesting.

"E.E.C."—Thank you for your letter; I am glad to know the little ones are better again. I shall be glad to have you for a "searcher," and hope you will enjoy the searching as much as the younger ones do.

ALICE HENDERSON (Jamaica).—Many thanks for the card with the group, which I am very pleased to receive.

STANLEY DREW.—I am glad you are better again, and able to do your "searcher."

Domestic Servants' Benevolent Institution.—Since the formation of the Institution in 1846, 326 pensioners have been elected, ninety-four of whom are at present in receipt of £15 and £20 each per annum. Upwards of £50,000 has been given in relief. Just now there are 110 candidates, many of whom are over seventy years of age, waiting in sore need of the pension. In consequence of the great falling off in donations and subscriptions, the committee has issued an earnest appeal for help. Communications may be addressed to the secretary, Mr. Wm. Sly, 32, Sackville Street, Piccadilly, W.

San Fernando, one of the suburbs of Buenos Aires, has not, until recently, received the ministrations of Christian workers. A few months ago Mr. and Mrs. Finkle, and Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Smith, commenced a quiet and unobtrusive work, which already bears promising results. A Sunday school was conducted in a private house for some time, but as numbers increased it became necessary to procure better accommodation. A larger house was taken, and here the school grew in numbers, and became appreciated by the English-speaking families as well as the Spanish. Evangelistic services have also been commenced, and attended with encouraging success. Mr. Torre, of Quilmes, conducts evangelistic meetings in Spanish.

Church of England.

The Bishop of London has offered the living of St. James-the-Great, Bethnal Green, vacant through the recent death, under pathetic circumstances, of Rev. F. W. Wix, to Rev. C. H. Davidson, curate of Stepney Parish Church, who has accepted it.

The secretaries of the Protestant Demonstration, to be held in the Albert Hall on the 30th inst., state that great interest is being aroused in the gathering, and that nearly every Protestant organization in the country will be represented at the meetings. Lord Kinnaird has been added to the list of speakers.

Rev. W. G. Vernon has announced to the Bishop of Worcester his intention of resigning the living of St. John's, Kenilworth. Mr. Vernon is an earnest evangelical, and his loss will be felt. Previous to his going to Kenilworth in 1898, he had been vicar of Penn-fields, Wolverhampton, where he carried on a happy and successful ministry for a period of sixteen years.

It is proposed by the friends of the late Rev. P. B. Power, M.A., and by those who appreciated his writings, to erect a memorial window in St. John's Church, Eastbourne, where he worshipped during his later years, and where his funeral was held. Communications may be sent to Mrs. Power, The Cliff, Eastbourne, or to the Vicar, Rev. W. Talbot Hindley, St. John's, Eastbourne.

The work at St. James's, Hatcham (Rev. E. J. Kennedy, vicar), continues to make progress. In order to reach the lowest section of the people in the poorest portion of the parish, mission buildings are about to be erected in Pagnell Street, New Cross. By means of such a useful building it is hoped to benefit the surrounding inhabitants spiritually, morally, physically.

It is proposed to form the new ecclesiastical district of St. John's, Crawshawbooth, out of the parish of Goodshaw, near Rawtenstall. The population embraced by the new district will be 3,300. Lord Crawshaw has offered a donation of £1,000, and £500 has been offered by the Hons. W. and M. J. Brooks respectively, to be used for the purpose of providing benefactions, to be offered with a view to securing for the living an endowment of at least £150.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has issued a "message for 1900" to his diocese—the words of Paul in Eph. iv. 31, 32 and v. 1, 2:—"Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil speaking be put away from you, with all malice; and be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you. Be ye therefore followers of God, as dear children; and walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us."

The Bishop of Norwich has issued a letter appointing Septuagesima Sunday as the day on which he invites the clergy to call attention to the subject of temperance. "Most of you know right well," he says, "that the house in your village which is the resort of the drinkers is the focus of those influences which are hostile to morality and religion. A poor unhappy young man, who was hanged for murder last month, told me that he had spent 4s. 5d. in drink at the public-house on the night when he committed the crime for which he suffered. Habits of intemperance are hostile to, nay destructive of, habits of worship. Intemperance disposes men to neglect God; nay, to disbelieve in God."

Rev. Prebendary Barlow has received the following reply from the Bishop of Liverpool in acknowledgment of the address passed at the Islington Clerical Meeting:—"I am truly grateful to you for the long and very kind address you have sent to me from the Islington Clerical Meeting. I do not feel that I deserve it at all. If you and your kind friends could only read my heart, and see all that I feel about myself, you would understand a little of my deep sense of unworthiness. But I know you all mean well in what you have said, and if in the course of my ministry I have done and said, and written things which you like and approve, I am very grateful. But I ask you to remember that I only wish to be regarded by you as a debtor to mercy and grace.—Believe me always to be, yours affectionately in Christ, J. C. LIVERPOOL."

Congregational.

Rev. W. J. Woods, B.A., continues to make satisfactory progress towards recovery.

Rev. J. Boughey has resigned the charge of the Dewsbury Unitarian Church, and is seeking to enter the Congregational ministry.

Rev. George McKendrick, minister of the Church at Langholm, has resigned his charge in order to become a medical missionary to Central Africa.

At Princes Street Church, Norwich (Rev. Dr. Barrett), the report on the Twentieth Century Fund shows that 440 subscribers have contributed, the promises amounting to £2,525.

The church at Oakleigh Park, near Barnet (Rev. J. Milnes), a continuation of the church at Totteridge, with which Richard Baxter was connected, was totally destroyed by fire on the 8th inst.

Chapel Street Church, Southport, has held its annual meeting. The minister, Rev. A. Scott, stated that about £2,400 had been raised during the past year, including £1,100 for building purposes, which had entirely cleared their new school premises of debt. As to outside objects, the London Missionary Society had received over £200 from the congregation.

On Sunday last Rev. Dr. Guinness Rogers completed the fifty-fourth year spent in the Congregational ministry. Dr. Rogers has arranged to close his ministry at the Grafton Square Congregational Church, Clapham, on the last Sunday in this month, the thirty-fifth anniversary of the day on which he first preached in the church with a view to undertaking the pastorate. He accepted the invitation in March, 1865, and entered upon his work in May of the same year.

Rev. Stanley Rogers writes: "The war spirit seems to possess the minds and hearts of our children and young people just at present to an amazing extent. May I venture to suggest to parents that an effort should be made in the home to consecrate it to holy uses? In connection with our Congregational Century Thanksgiving Movement, we have issued a booklet containing hymns and tunes full of the marching and militant spirit, and we are advising parents in our Congregational churches to teach these to their children."

Baptist.

Rev. Thomas Phillips, B.A., late of Fuller Chapel, Kettering, has commenced his ministry at St. Mary's, Norwich, as successor to Rev. J. H. Shakespeare.

At a recent special conference in the Kelvinside Church, Glasgow, the services and devotion of Pastor Rev. A. W. Bean were cordially recognised. It was stated, too, that a site had been secured for the erection of a permanent place of worship.

Rev. R. W. Mansfield, after thirty-two years' ministry at Bourton Shrivenham, the last nine years also at Stratton Green, has resigned the pastorate of both churches, and his ministry will terminate on March 11 at Bourton.

Rev. Charles Williams, of Accrington, who writes to a correspondent in reference to the announcement as to his probable retirement: "My sole purpose in referring to the matter in my New Year's letter was to prepare the way, to make retirement easy, and to enable me at any time which might seem to be suitable to carry out a long-cherished purpose. The fact is that I could not, however willing, long continue both church work and work for the denomination. I think that probably I can render better and certainly less exacting service if free from pastoral responsibilities.

Methodist.

Mrs. H. J. Ellis, widow of the late devoted chairman of the Gold Coast District, after a six months' rest in England, is returning to the scene of her former labours with a view to do something more for the people whom her husband loved so well. Her permanent postal address will be Wesleyan Mission House, Cape Coast, West Africa.

The theatre services at Brighton have now reached the fifth of the services in the Alhambra Theatre, King's Road. They are conducted by Rev. J. Gregory Mantle, and they have steadily grown in influence and numbers. On a recent Sunday, a large number responded to the preacher's appeal for immediate surrender. A further addition to these enquirers was made in the after-meeting, the number of young men who rose being a specially gratifying feature.

The "quiet day" for London ministers at Wesley's Chapel was a time of much blessing. How greatly the opportunity was appreciated might be seen from the attendance. Notwithstanding the ravages of the prevailing epidemic, the meetings were thoroughly representative. Circuits, missions, and departments mustered in strong force, and some ministers from the country parts of the three districts were able to attend. At the close of the day Dr. Jenkins voiced the feeling of all when he said, "I shall go back richer than when I came."

Presbyterian.

In the Glasgow U.P. Presbytery, fifty years of ministerial service will this year be completed by two of its members—Revs. James Reunie, St. Vincent Street Church, ex-Moderator of Synod, and Wm. Clark, M.A., Barrhead.

At a recent meeting of Glasgow Established Presbytery, Mr. John Hall, elder, gave notice of the following motion:—"That a special committee be appointed to consider the whole question of Sunday trading, principally the opening of ice-cream, tobacco, newspaper, and other shops on the Lord's Day, such trading being detrimental to the moral and spiritual well-being of the community, and, if so advised, to memorialize the Glasgow Town Council to take such immediate steps as are deemed best for the suppression of this crying evil, and to report to an early meeting of Presbytery."

Society of Friends.

Charles W. Goddard has visited Wellingborough. At the monthly meeting he had considerable service in the meeting for worship, besides offering useful counsel to the members of the meeting on Ministry and Oversight.

Speaking at the adults' school at Selly Oak, Birmingham, George Cadbury remarked that he came before them for the first time no longer as owner of the building in which he was speaking. It had now been handed over to trustees, and was secured for ever to the village. It is provided that when the institution can no longer be made good use of by Friends for the good of the neighbourhood, it shall be handed over to the District Council for a public reading room, or for any such purpose as decided by the governing body of the district.

Fallen Asleep.

The Congregationalists of Manchester district have lost a devoted adherent in Mr. J. BRYSON. He was largely instrumental in securing the Queen's Park Church to the denomination, and in raising £3,000 for the removal of its debt. The church at Newton Heath is also indebted to his energy for its school premises.—The sudden death is announced, of Rev. WILLIAM DODDS, at Dumfries, in his seventy-second year. Mr. Dodds, a minister of the Church of Scotland, held appointments for many years as chaplain to Crichton Royal Institution, the prison, the infirmary, and the poorhouse, Edinburgh.—Mr. JOHN JACOB FLITCH, of Chapel Allerton, Leeds, one of the oldest and staunchest Methodists in the districts.—Rev. WALTER COATES, who entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1838, recently passed away at Tottenham. For some time he had been unable to do more than take a kindly interest in the work.—Mr. CHARLES LILLYWHITE, who passed away on the 10th inst. at Wadhurst, was for a long period actively engaged there in Gospel labour. He was one of the early pioneers to hold open-air services at Bow Common, and was for a many diligent missionary to the workers in the tanyards of Bermondsey.—At St. Albans, aged seventy-one, Mrs. ELIZABETH LITTLE, a worshipper in the Wooden Room, cheerful in good works, and always ready to confess the Master whom she served.—At Lisburn, Mr. EDWARD ALLEN, father of Rev. Samuel Allen, Methodist minister.—At Killybegs, co. Donegal, Mr. B. PRICE, an earnest Sunday-school worker, aged eighty-three years.—Rev. W. E. BATTY, rector of Finchley, aged seventy-seven.—Rev. ROBERT JAMES SIMPSON, a former well-known rector of St. Clement Danes, Strand, and for some years clerical secretary of the South American Missionary Society, aged seventy-seven.—Rev. Canon ANSTEY, who, at an advanced age, recently resigned the benefice of St. John's, Redland, Bristol, to organize and carry on a mission in the populous district of Bedminster.—Mr. C. P. MASON, one of the most distinguished schoolmasters of thirty or forty years ago. He was best known as one of the first schoolmasters to systematize the teaching of English Grammar.—Mr. ALEXANDER INNES, of Tranmere, Birkenhead, long and well-known in connection with his special interest with African Missions.

In an advertisement of a book entitled "Whispers from the Unseen," on page 4 of THE CHRISTIAN for December 21, a wrong quotation was attributed to Professor Handley Moule. The words should have been, "I have read every word of it, and am pleased, more than pleased with it. . . . By all means use any words of mine about 'Whispers.' They are heartily meant."

About Books.

THOMAS ERSKINE AND HIS WORK.

In Erskine of Linlathen: Selections and Biography, by Henry F. Henderson, M.A., Dundee (6s. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier), the present generation is afforded a glimpse of the life and labours of a Scotchman who was greatly distinguished in moral personality as well as in family ancestry. Thomas Erskine was a profound thinker and a mystic; all the same he was a strong believer in practical religion. His views, which were regarded (and rightly so) as dangerously "advanced," were heartily welcomed by prominent contemporaries; and, as is generally the case, they greatly disturbed many devout souls. His name was a synonym for latitudinarian doctrine, though he was ever content to send men to the Scriptures for authoritative teaching. Doubtless his heart revolted against Calvinism as it was enunciated by many teachers in the first half of the century; and in this he was by no means alone. His strong human sympathy led him to indulge universalist hopes, regarding which it is sufficient to say that they are unjustified in sound thought, and lacking in the sanction or support of Holy Writ. The book before us is deeply interesting, and affords ample evidence that, though a "layman," Erskine exercised a strong influence in the theological world. The selections from his various works are well chosen; they are chaste in diction as well as contributions to the discussion of sublime themes. Those who seek explanation of present tendencies in thought will not read Mr. Henderson's book without impressions of a very definite and interesting order.

INDIA AND THE GOSPEL.

Dr. J. Murray Mitchell has long been regarded as an authority on Indian missions; if that were not so, his new book In Western India: Recollections of My Early Missionary Life, would suffice to make him a good reputation. (5s. Edinburgh: David Douglas.) The pages deal with religious thought and feeling in our Indian Empire, and they are readable and instructive in a high degree. Though not strictly an autobiography, the book contains many facts of personal interest, from the time the author entered Marischal College, Aberdeen, at the age of fourteen, now some sixty years ago, till quite recent years.

For the most part, however, the pages deal with the mental state of India, Dr. Murray Mitchell's experiences being given as typical of those of missionaries in general in the country. Missionary tours are described, and particulars are given of the various classes of the community, with their institutions and prejudices. The story of Romish missions, as associated with the name of Xavier, is outlined, also the work of the various Protestant churches. A peculiar interest attaches to the account of the Bene Israel and the remnant of the Syrian Church in Malabar. By the way, we have extracts from the author's journals while travelling outside India, e.g., in Egypt and Palestine; and the names of Havelock and Molesworth, Daniel Wilson and Samuel Gobat, with other worthies, stand out in connection with work and incidents of great significance in the story of missionary enterprise.

The chapter on Higher Education in India is full of important information. The case is thus summed up: "India will have higher education. Chaos is before us if that education be wholly secular. Government cannot give religious education. What remains? The Church of Christ is bound to come to the rescue. Christian schools and colleges ought to be multiplied all over the land." We trust this valuable work will do something to advance the cause which lies so near the heart of its venerable author.

A useful book for the young is Pictures and Stories from the Old Testament, by Kate Thompson Sizer. (1s. C. H. Kelly.)

Dr. J. H. Townsend's contributions to devotional literature have been helpful to many. His latest work, Thoughts for Watchers, is a reverent statement in regard to prophecy and the important bearing thereon of some recent events in Egypt and Palestine. (1s. Marshall Bros.)

Stories of Travel Adventure (1s. 6d.), by George Mundell, is a thrilling and true narrative of remarkable incidents in the lives of well-known explorers of the present century; who, in order to add to human knowledge, have made their way through pathless forests, fever-infested swamps, and barren deserts.

Among recently issued books of reference are those excellent little compilations the Baptist and the Congregational Almanacks. Each contains, as usual, portraits and sketches of leading ministers, and a great amount of useful information, both of a general and special character. (2d. each. R. Banks & Son.)

Mr. J. R. Miller's booklet, Unto the Hills, is a choice meditation on Ps. cxxi. It is beautifully illustrated, and, in every way, sumptuously produced. (1s. Hodder & Stoughton.)

The Awe of the New Century, by Dr. Horton, is a booklet for the hour. It surveys the nineteenth century as regards discovery and diffusion, and educes some stimulating comparisons and contrasts —religious and moral, social and political. (1s. James Clarke & Co.)

Fry's Royal Guide to the London Charities is a clear and accurate reference book. Carefully edited, and containing a great amount of information, the thirty-sixth annual issue is prefaced by a telling appeal from the pen of Mr. John Lane. (1s. 6d. Chatto and Windus.)

A grand book for the young is The Children's Hour. (2s. 6d. Nelsons.) Here are nine short stories by Mrs. Molesworth, with twelve coloured plates and many smaller pictures. What is more, the readings and illustrations are in every way "the very thing" for the young mind and heart.

The Broad and the Narrow Way picture, which is known to many of our readers, still pursues its helpful ministry, and it is desired to make it yet more widely useful. A copy of the beautiful chromo-lithograph, printed in six colours, together with the illustrated explanatory pamphlet, can be obtained from Mr. Frank Cockrem, Secretary, Open-Air Mission, 11, Adam Street, Strand, London. (1s. post free.) The lecture on the large copy of the picture is also still delivered by Mr. Cockrem, in succession to the late beloved Gawin Kirkham.

Miss C. Maud Battersby is well known to our readers, especially by her tender verse. Some of her pieces, chaste in structure and spiritual in tone, are collected in a little volume, entitled Twilight and Dawn: Hymns, Fragments, and Poems. (1s. and 2s. Putney, S.W.: Pearce & Co., 80, Upper Richmond Road.) Whatever their starting point or subject note, these compositions bear definite messages, and God richly blessed them when first published. In collected form, they will be welcome to many weary and tried workers and pilgrims.

A choice little volume of addresses has been issued by Alexander Gardner, entitled The Lilies of the Bible. It is from the pen of Walter R. Paton, minister-emeritus, Free Church of Scotland, who, while laid aside from active service, has endeavoured through the printed page to instruct, console, and guide fellow-pilgrims on the way to Zion. Taking as texts the Scripture references to the Lily, Mr. Paton presents very welcome teaching. He introduces the emblem to enforce the lesson, and from first to last his pages are beautiful and instructive.

Glorious Themes for Saints and Sinners is a volume of wise and striking sayings by C. H. Spurgeon, printed in large type that may easily be read by young and old. It is calculated to console and edify the saint, and to arrest the attention of the sinner. The readings number near four score, and the subjects are alphabetically arranged. To the invalid and aged this volume should convey timely and welcome messages. We recommend it as an ideal present for such as are consciously near the end of life's journey. (3s. 6d. Passmore & Alabaster.)

The reign of Charles the First suggests unhappy memories to English Nonconformists. Baptist history tells of fierce persecution in that bad old time. In a little book entitled In the Days of the Star Chamber (1s. T. H. Hopkins, 16, Gray's Inn Road, W.C.), we of the nineteenth century are reminded of the sufferings of spiritual ancestors in the seventeenth. The names of Kiffin and Jessey flit across the page, and a love story runs through the narrative which illustrates the regard for high principle and devotion to conscience which characterized the Puritan age.

Wayside Angels and other Sermons (1s. nett) is a thoughtful and practical little book, by W. K. Burford, minister of Wicker Congregational Church, Sheffield. The discourses are seven in number. In the series of "Small Books on Great Subjects," Dr. Clifford has issued nine addresses, the first of which provides the propositional and expressive title, Social Worship: An Everlasting Necessity. (1s. 6d.) The pages are a testimony to the author's earnestness and eloquence, though the doctrinal trend is occasionally wide of the historic evangelical position. (J. Clarke & Co.)

The "Useful Arts and Handicrafts" series provides a small, practical handbook weekly. Already several issues are ready—Designing and Drawing, by Charles Godfrey Leland, M.A. (Hans Breitmann); Wood-Carving for Beginners, by C. G. Leland and "Jack-Plane;" Picture Frames by Novel Methods, by C. G. Leland and F. Bolas; Dyes, Stains, Inks, Varnishes, and Polishes, by T. Bolas; Decorated Woodwork; Bent Iron Work; and others. (6d. each, nett. Dawbarn & Ward.) These booklets, with artistically-executed plates, will be welcomed in many a home for use during the winter evenings.

A singularly readable volume is Torch-bearers of the Faith; A Book of Christian Heroes, by Alexander Smellie, M.A. (3s. 6d. Andrew Melrose.) Beginning with the days when Ignatius and Perpetua fought with beasts, this volume sketches the careers of men of light and leading, who counted not their lives dear unto them in the service of Christ. Young people, as well as old, would do well to read the pages, with their story of Tauler, Savonarola, and Coligny, and many others. What lies behind such a title as "How Leonard Dober Embraced Slavery for Jesus' Sake," or "How Ion Keith-Falconer, being perfected in a short time, fulfilled a long time?" The chapters are short, but very readable and well illustrated.

Dr. Edward Clayton has brought out a new and revised edition of his book, The Precious Stones of the Bible: Descriptive and Symbolical—being a treatise on the Breast-plate of the High Priest, and the Foundations of the New Jerusalem, with a brief History of each Tribe and each Apostle. (3s. 6d. Simpkin, Marshall & Co.) It is over twenty years since this very interesting work was first published, and it was speedily out of print. Now, at length, it is re-issued, much improved in form and substance. Under Dr. Clayton's treatment, the gems of Scripture become parables of deep spiritual teaching. The pages give us entertaining dips into history and archæology, combined with emblematical and other instruction that is divinely precious. The breast-plate of the High Priest is admirably depicted in colours on a plate given as frontispiece. We trust the book will have many readers.

Messrs. Nelson have reissued, in handsome form, Robert Bird's book, Jesus, the Carpenter of Nazareth. (6s.) In the words of the preface, "This life is written in short, realistic pictures, endeavouring to avoid theology and sectarianism, that mothers of all creeds may read it to their children, and that children in later life may read it for themselves." Not an easy task to be sure; and a task in which we should obviously find an illustration of the rule, "So many men, so many minds." Nevertheless, Mr. Bird's honest endeavour deserves recognition as a distinct success. He does not attempt to unfold mysteries to the youthful mind; he rather brings to view the Divine Teacher, Guide, and Example, leaving deeper truths to be learnt in after years. The story is divided into incidents, addresses, and lessons, and there are 136 illustrations, from drawings by John Lawson and Archibald Webb.

For experimental teaching, at once solid and tender, we always go with confidence to the writings of the late Dr. James Culross. Whether studying a formal section of Scripture, or merely dealing with a fact of the story, or a point of doctrine, our lamented friend was always thoughtful as an expositor, and true to his life-purpose as a minister of the Gospel. We gladly associate with these thoughts a neat little volume just issued from Drummond's Tract Depôt, Christ's Joy, and other papers. (1s. and 1s. 6d.) While the pages were passing through the press, their author passed into a fuller realization of the theme which furnishes the title, in the light of John xv. 11. Other papers deal with "The Revelation of Jesus Christ" (Matt. xi. 25-30); "Christ our Life" (Phil. i. 21); "Belonging to Christ" (Acts xxvii. 23); and "The Church of Church" (Matt. xv. 18.) There are twelve papers in this little book, and all are well worthy the prayerful study of believers.

Though Egypt boasts a past going back to the beginnings of civilization, it also claims the attention of the present generation as a rising country, with great future possibilities. Hence Mr. John Ward, F.S.A., has given to his volume of sketches from Egypt the very expressive title Pyramids and Progress (7s. 6d. nett. Eyre & Spottiswoode). That is to say, he tells the story of ancient and modern Egypt, giving an account of Pyramid times, also the latest indications of national regeneration and social advancement. The work, which contains upwards of 300 illustrations, is designed both for the traveller on the Nile and the home reader, the aim of the author being to give a popular account of Egypt,—its scenery, history, places of interest, its people and its irrigation works. Much of the work has had the approval of Lord Cromer, to whom it is dedicated; while Professor Sayce writes a cordial introduction. The volume has been produced in a sumptuous manner. It will greatly assist such as wish to study the antiquities of Egypt, while those who intend travelling in the country would do well to digest the pages beforehand, or make the volume a compagnon de voyage.

A striking tract on gambling is BOOKIES AND BACKERS, or What are the Odds? by Chaleureux (2d. G. Stoneman.)

Some useful and common-sense "Talks with our elder girls" appear in Mrs S. Ellen Gregory's THE HEDGE AND THE SERPENT. (4d. C. H. Kelly.)

A committee of Congregational ministers is issuing a series of "Tracts for Congregationalists." The first is devoted to Church MEMBERSHIP. (1d. Alexander & Shepheard.)

Mr. A. Le Lievre, 2, Buckland House, Offord Road, Barnsbury, N., will forward specimens of valuable tracts on Romanism to persons sending stamped addressed envelope.

ANNUAL VOLUMES.

The monthly parts of India's Women and China's Daughters, the organ of the C.E. Zenana Missionary Society, make a very attractive yearly volume. The illustrations afford a good idea of the varied classes among whom the Society works, and the letter-press shows that if there are disappointments, so also are there encouragements. (2s. 6d. Marshall Bros.)

The Sun-Children's Budget, edited by Phœbe Allen and Dr. Henry W. Godfrey, is a quarterly magazine, in which botany is taught in the language and style of childhood. Printed in light blue and tastefully illustrated, the pages are artistic in appearance, as well as instructive in contents. By this volume noble interests are introduced in attractive garb into the juvenile kingdom. (3s. Wells Gardner, Darton, & Co.)

STORY BOOKS.

A charmingly written story of London life, as viewed from a Methodist settlement, is Polly, of Parker's Rents, by G. T. Kimmins (Sister Grace). Pathos and kindly humour are happily blended in this interesting volume, in which restraint and delicacy are found in place of the sordid realism which has unhappily characterized the work of some writers on slum life. The illustrations are by F. Mabelle Pearse. (3s. 6d. Bowden.)

Mr. Ralph Connor has achieved some reputation as a writer on life in the great North-West. His latest volume, The Sky Pilot, is a vivid account of the progress of pioneer religious work among the wildest of cowboys. As a concession to verisimilitude, the character of conversation, in religion as in other matters, is occasionally grotesque. The description of the erection of Swan Creek Church is a pathetic piece of writing. (6s. Hodder & Stoughton.)

Miss Florence Kingsley adds to her works on Bible subjects, Paul, a Herald of the Cross. As readers of Miss Kingsley's previous productions will anticipate, she takes the Biblical record of Paul's career, and weaves it into a fluent and picturesque narrative. Those who care for a scripture paraphrase, characterized by force and earnestness, and somewhat in the style of "Quo Vadis," will enjoy the volume. Miss Kingsley luminously portrays the horrors of paganism. Tiberius and Caligula, Sergius Paulus and Felix, as well as Lydia and Onesimus, live in these vivid pages. (5s. Ward, Lock & Co.)

Recent issues by the Religious Tract Society are: Amy le Feuvre's The Carved Cupboard, which is written with characteristic point and charm (2s. 6d.). A story for girls, mainly connected with Moravian school life, is Rhoda Lethbridge, by Greta Gilmour (2s.). In Small Corners is an interesting moral tale by Flora E. Berry, the title being taken from the familiar words, "You in your small corner and I in mine." Two Little Maidens, by Helen Wilkie, is a story of every-day life, lit up with occasional passages of helpfulness and stimulus, and illustrated by some clever line drawings from the practised pencil of Lancelot Speed (1s. 6d. each). In Bunny's Friends, Amy le Feuvre imagines a little girl, nicknamed "Bunny," falling asleep upon a moor and dreaming that a rabbit, a pony, and a white heather bloom entertain her by "telling stories." The animals appear to speak in a strain somewhat too "grown up" for so tiny a child as "Bunny;" but the flower talks prettily. The playful piece of fiction of which Bunny's father was guilty should have been labelled as such; otherwise tiny readers may conclude that deceit is allowable. (1s.)

In Stray Thoughts, a booklet of poems by "Hibon" and "E. J. W.," there are evidences of high spiritual aim, and, as a rule, the versification is apt. (6d. Stevens & Co., Church Street, Malvern.)

Two little books of great worth are: The Story of a Roman Soldier, by Mark Guy Pearse; and Take Heart Again, by F. B. Meyer. The former is a powerful exposition and application of Luke vii. 2-10; in the latter, helpful words are addressed to the discouraged, aged, weary, sorrowing, and disappointed, and there is a chapter on "Life's Little Worries." (1s. each. Horace Marshall & Son.)

Christian parents will read with deep sympathy a little book just issued by E. Wilmshurst, Blackheath, entitled A Conquest of Grace: Being an Account of the Conversion and the Lord's Gracious Dealings with Alfred Russell, of Wimbledon, who died in June last, aged twenty-three years. The pages should encourage parents to continue in prayer for their children. The story, as told by the young man's mother, is at once unvarnished and pathetic.

Mr. W. R. Bradlaugh will shortly publish his book, The Christian's Armoury, being 300 solutions of infidel objections and scriptural difficulties. This has already appeared in serial form. The answers given to points raised by enemies of the faith are clear, incisive, and conclusive, and for those thrown among infidelity the book should prove a veritable storehouse of facts and information. The price will be 5s. (Geo. Stoneman.)

Many, amid the bustle of daily affairs, will rejoice to turn for spiritual refreshment to Mr. Leonard K. Shaw's Noontide Thoughts for Busy Lives, a helpful little volume of meditations, which is evidently the outcome of an earnest desire to induce habits of prayerful thought and regular worship among those who may be in danger of becoming unduly absorbed in commercial matters, to the exclusion of spiritual considerations. (1s. Marshall Bros.)

Messrs. Williams & Norgate have issued a new and cheap edition of Rev. H. J. Martyn's book, For Christ and the Truth. (2s. 6d.) The pages consider the most sublime themes, and ever in a most suggestive manner. Three chapter headings will show the scope of the volume. "Is Christ a Historic Person?" "Was Christ Sinless?" "Jesus, a Surety of Life Beyond." There are also papers on the Trinity and the Golden Rule.

The Print of the Nails is the title of a small but valuable work by T. H. Darlow, M.A. The paper which yields the title comes first, and among the others are "the Heritage of the Meek," "the Name that is Called Wonderful," and "the Lost Fear of God." This is the most recent of the series of "Little Books on Religion." In wealth of thought and teaching, however, it has the best qualities of a great book. (1s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.)

Mr. W. H. Groser's very useful Sunday School Teacher's Manual, setting forth the principles and methods of instruction as applied to Sunday School work, has reached its sixteenth edition. (2s. 6d. S.S.U.) This fact is sufficient proof that, in the judgment of practical workers the book is of value, and merits recommendation. A glance at the pages confirms the impression that we have here a comprehens ve statement of the whole duty of the Sunday School teacher.

Surrounded as we are by things which are passing away, we need to be reminded with serious persistency of things that will and must of necessity remain. Hence we are thankful for the counsel and stimulus afforded in Abiding Things: A Book for Believers. By Rev. W. Milne, M.A., Montreux. (2s. Nisbet.) We are put in remembrance of the Abiding—God, Christ, Spirit, Union, Word, and Kingdom; also of abiding Work, Graces, and Wrath. The pages are tempting to the spiritual appetite, and should have many readers.

The "Present-Day Preachers" series has included volumes of special excellence; and the latest, by Rev. W. L. Watkinson, is fully up to the high standard of the whole. The title is The Blind Spot, which is the subject of the first of the eighteen discourses. It is founded on Luke xi. 36—"having no part dark." Like the other works of Mr. Watkinson, this is remarkably suggestive. The subjects are uncommon, and the treatment distinctive. Illustrative points from scientific and literary fields greatly enrich the sermons. There is a highly-finished photogravure of the preacher. (3s. 6d. Horace Marshall & Son.)

Sir William Muir invites Moslems to read the Bible in a learned booklet, The Old and New Testaments. (6d. T. & T. Clark). Having been asked to write something for the Moulvies of Persia, who live much in mystic contemplation, it occurred to him that an appeal on the propriety and duty of seeing and reading the Tourât and Gospel—books so highly praised in the Koran—might be profitable and right. Hence these pages, wise and judicious in tone and substance. Mission workers in Mohammedan lands should read the booklet, and consider the method of its learned author.

The Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges is a series of handbooks that have been of great service in private study as well as public tuition. The latest additions to this very useful library are: The Books of Chronicles, edited by W. E. Barnes, D.D. (4s.), and The Proverbs, edited by the Ven. T. T. Perowne, B.D., Archdeacon of Norwich (3s.). The introduction and notes are on the same model as previous volumes, and, in all respects, the work is instructive and suggestive. Here is information such as junior students need, and condensed treatment, with the results of erudition, such as scholars will deservedly value very highly.

The Young Scholar's Illustrated Bible is an edition of the Authorized Version, in ruby type, with thirty-two illustrations, principally drawn from the monuments of the nations intimately associated with the Jews. The selection of illustrations for this purpose has been made by Mr. W. H. Rylands, secretary of the Society of Biblical Archæology, who contributes a very useful introduction. Not one of the pictures is of the imaginary and misleading nature which puzzled young people a generation ago. For the most part, the engravings represent physical scenes or monumental remains. (2s. and upwards. Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

Prayers from the Poets: A Calendar of Devotion, compiled and edited by Laurie Magnus, M.A., and Cecil Headlam, M.A., is a volume of many charms. (W. Blackwood & Sons.) The book presents a poetical selection for every day in the year, the literature of all times and countries being laid under contribution. Some of the translations are original, and the arrangement has been made with a certain regard for special days and events in British annals. Being gathered from all quarters, the contents are varied: here and there one meets with views sadly limited; at other times with the baldest Romanism, as in "O Mary, Mother," given for March 28 (Rafael's birthday), by Alfred Austin.

Evangelical Christians in communion with the Church of England will value a manual just issued by Mr. Thynne. It is from the pen of Rev. F. E. Middleton, M.A., tutor in charge of the Church Missionary Preparatory Institution, and is entitled Lambeth and Trent: A Brief Examination of the Thirty-nine Articles (1s. nett.) The pages expound the well-known Confession of Faith in the language of true Protestantism, the divergence of Romanism from Scripture teaching and wholesome practice, being indicated under various heads. This is a book for all who would understand the questions at issue in modern controversies in the Church of England.

Archdeacon Madden has given us another volume of addresses to men and women. Tombs or Temples? the subject of the opening discourse (founded on Matt. xxiii. 27, and 2 Cor. vi. 16), is the title. (3s. 6d. Elliot Stock.) The archdeacon has had a large experience amongst all classes of men in the north, and here we have a selection of thoughtful, straight, and "up-to-date" addresses, delivered at "meetings for men only." Twenty-one in number, the addresses deal with the following among other subjects:—Sin, the Power of Christ's Resurrection, the Judgment to Come, and Liberty, Equality, Fraternity. A few of the addresses were spoken to women. Christian workers will find this a suggestive book.

In the Life and Letters of the late Bishop Chauncy Maples, a promise was held out that some of his journals and papers might afterwards be published. This promise has been redeemed, and we have before us Journals and Papers of Chauncy Maples, D.D., F.R.G.S., late Bishop of Likoma, Lake Nyassa, Africa, edited by his sister, Ellen Maples. (6s. 6d. Longman & Co.) The pages are of great interest. The journal is that of a keen observer and sincere Christian worker; the papers are the product of a mind that had considered the problems that are encountered in the evangelization of Africa. The Bishop had his own views of things, but his narrative has a value all its own, quite independently of ecclesiastical opinions or associations. Students of foreign missions, and all who follow the opening up of the African continent, should read this book.

Prayer books, and manuals for the help of the devout, are varied and plentiful. Some value such books more than others; there are those who cannot use them, also those who find them of definite service in ordering their desires before God. In this line it would be difficult to suggest a more beautiful volume than A Book of Family Worship, containing Scripture passages and prayers for every day in the year, edited by W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A., LL.D. (5s. Hodder & Stoughton.) The title-page bears the line MORNING, whence it is inferred that a companion volume for the Evening is in preparation. The list of contributors gives the names of twelve ministers, representing various denominations in England, Scotland, and Ireland. There are also Scripture selections and prayers for special occasions.

The Evening and The Morning, by Rev. Armstrong Black (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton) presents us with meditations suggested by "Toward Evening" (Luke xxiv.), "Midnight" (Matt. xxvi.), "the Breaking of the Day" (John viii.), and other time expressions appearing in the Gospel record. Hence the pages relate to occurrences of sublime interest in regard to Christ's communion with his Father in the solitudes of night, to Gethsemane and its sorrows, and to the post-resurrection appearings and sayings. These addresses cover a wide range of stimulating thought. They come from the heart, and to the heart they are directed. The book occupies a place of its own in the literature of spiritual meditation, and its external get-up is in harmony with its intrinsic excellence. Christian people may rely on this proving an acceptable presentation volume to contemplative souls.

The "Midget" series of tiny volumes offer an attractive substitute for the ordinary complimentary and birthday cards. Some time ago we welcomed VICTORIA, THE GOOD QUEEN AND EMPRESS. Now the series has been enriched with THE ENCHANTED DOLL, by Mark Lemon; THE STORY WITHOUT AN END, by F. W. Carové, told in English by Sarah Austin: SONGS OF INNOCENCE, by William Blake; FAVOURITE FABLES FOR TINY TROTS; and THE SEVEN CHAMPIONS OF CHRISTENDOM. These books are curious and dainty, as well as produced in handsome style. The illustrations are numerous and of a high order. The volumes are in boxes, accompanied by appropriately designed adhesive labels, on which may be inscribed the name of the donor and the occasion—Christmas, New Year, or birthday. (1s. each. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.

WORKING LADS' INSTITUTE & HOME

WHITECHAPEL, E.

FOUNDED 1876. TREASURER: F. A. BEVAN, ESQ., D.L.

This Institution provides for the poor but industrious lads of East London who are exposed to the temptations of the low music hall and public-house. It also provides a home for friendless and country lads. Upwards of 7,000 lads have been benefited.

FUNDS ARE GREATLY NEEDED.

The Institute is dependent upon Voluntary Contributions for its support.

THOMAS JACKSON, Superintendent.

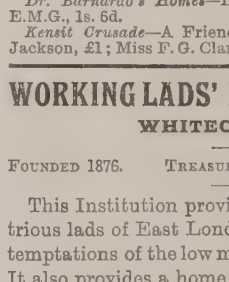
279, WHITECHAPEL ROAD, E.

ROYAL NATIONAL MISSION TO DEEP SEA FISHERMEN.



Patron: HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN. This Society carries on Medical Mission Work amongst the Fishermen on the North Sea and other Fishing Grounds, and in Labrador.

HELP EARNESTLY ASKED

Requires £30,000 per annum.

Treasurer: THOMAS B. MILLER, Esq. (Offices, 181, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C.), to whom contributions may be sent; or to the Office of THE CHRISTIAN.

URGENT.

To complete the Good Samaritan Work of the

"Liberator" Relief Fund.

After seven years' earnest pleading, a further £10,000, or 200,000 shillings, still urgently needed to give relief to hundreds of aged, destitute, and afflicted victims of the great "Liberator" fraud, who were taught and trained in habits of temperance and thrift by their trusted leaders, only to find themselves suddenly robbed of their life-savings, and driven to face the dreaded workhouse, in spite of all their praiseworthy endeavours to make some provision for their old age.

Ninety per cent. of these sufferers are members of some section of the Christian Church.

"Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the Law of Christ.

There are 2,830 cases on the Books of the Fund, of whom 1,500 are Widows or Spinsters. 690 are over 70 years of age. 1,460 are over 60 years of age. Over 300 deaths through the disaster.

THE BITTER CRY FOR HELP

Is still coming to the Committee from sufferers who have bravely borne with their difficulties, till sickness or great destitution has compelled them to apply.

Cheques and P.O.'s should be made payable to the "Liberator" Relief Fund, crossed "The London City and Midland Bank," and sent to the Secretary,

Rev. J. STOCKWELL WATTS,
16, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

EVERYONE SHOULD READ

"Echoes from the Liberator Prison."

Sold on behalf of the sufferers.
16, FARRINGDON STREET. 1s. post free.

The Christian says:—"The third edition of 'Echoes from the Liberator Prison' (1s., Unwin Bros.), by Rev. J. Stockwell Watts, is issued. This well-known and forcibly written book, which gives such heart-breaking accounts of the sorrows endured by those who were robbed of their support by the Liberator crash, should be helped to a wider circulation than it has yet attained."

Scripture Readers' Society for Ireland.

This Society continues to Spread the Word of God in the homes of the people, and never found a more open door, but funds are much needed to extend the Work.

THE MISSIONS TO SEAMEN.

Patron—

ADMIRAL OF THE FLEET, H.R.H. THE DUKE OF SAXE-COBURG AND GOTHA, K.G.

Increased funds are urgently needed to meet the expenditure involved by the recent extensions of the operations of the Missions to Seamen to several new Ports, including Calcutta, Wellington, New Zealand, Cape Town, Portland, Oregon, and Hamburg, where formerly the crews of British ships were destitute of religious ministrations.

A further extension of the work amongst seagoing men in the great Port of London has recently been made by opening a Seamen's Institute opposite the Board of Trade Shipping Office at the Victoria Docks, whilst many urgent appeals cannot be responded to owing to lack of funds.

The Society maintains 190 Chaplains, Readers, Boatmen, &c., working amongst the shipping and fishing vessels in 70 seaports in every part of the world.

Sixty-nine Mission Steamers, Sailing Vessels, and Boats, and 91 Seamen's Churches and Institutes are in daily use, winter and summer.

Expenditure in 1898—£41,025 11s. 7d.

Annual Subscriptions, Donations, Offertories, Drawing Room Meeting Collections, &c., are earnestly asked for to maintain the existing sailor work, and to extend it to other ports. They should be sent to Commander W. DAWSON, R.N., The Missions to Seamen, 11, Buckingham Street, Strand, London, W.C.

TOPIC FOR JAN. 21.

"Send Me" (Isaiah vi. 1-10).

ISAIAH was probably one of the best known men in Jerusalem when the incident described in this chapter took place. He had already made his power felt, accosting sinners in high places, and denouncing the sins of the time. But there was a further and deeper knowledge of God, and of himself, which was both necessary and possible. The counterpart of this happens still. A child of God may be earnest and useful up to a certain point, and then those that watch are conscious of a very decided deepening of character and increase of spiritual power, which are, so to speak, the sixth chapter of their life-story.

It is probable that Isaiah left his home in the early afternoon to attend the service of evening sacrifice and prayer in the Temple. In company with hundreds of fellow-worshippers, he climbed the Temple steps, and finally stood in the great court or enclosure. In a direct line, one behind the other, were the brazen altar, the laver in which the priests washed, and the lofty doors of the Temple itself. On either side, were rows of white-vestured Levites, singing the Psalms of David. Then, suddenly, he ceased to be conscious of his immediate surroundings, for there came in view, in mid-heaven, the throne of the Eternal. Instead of the bands of Levites, he saw the choirs of angels and the worship of the holy seraphim, the sons of fire. Instead of David's Psalms, he heard them crying one to another, "Holy, holy, holy!"

"One cried to another." Learn how we may incite one another to praise and prayer—just as one bird will set off all the feathered songsters of the woods to vie with each other in musical notes, or as one earnest soul may set a prayer-meeting on fire, so one of the seraphims called to the rest, as much as to say, "Higher, brothers, higher, touch nobler chords, reach higher levels of song, give utterance of yet worthier, nobler, chords." Let us so stir one another.

It was the vision of their holy service that convinced the prophet of the sinfulness and unworthiness of his. They had each two wings for reverence, two for modesty, and two for flight on any errands on which God might send them. Two-thirds of their energy given to contemplation, and one-third to service. And when the prophet saw it all, he felt that all he had done and been was unfit to be mentioned in the same breath. It is good to learn how unprofitable and unworthy are our very best attempts. Our holiest service needs forgiveness. Our tears need cleansing. Our songs and prayers require the purifying of God's coals of fire.

But we need more than to be convinced of sin; we require the blood and fire. The blood, because the coal must be taken from the altar where the Lamb has been slain. This stands for the precious blood of Christ, which cleanseth from all sin. The fire, because that is not only purifying, but kindling and quickening. This stands for the Holy Spirit, who came on Pentecost to the Church in dividing flames of fire.

We must seek each of these. Let each examine whether the blood has spoken peace, and the fire of the Holy Ghost kindled the dull and sluggish heart. If so, we shall hear the voice of God calling for servants and heralds, for missionaries and evangelists, and we shall answer, "Send me, send me."

The xiii. chapter of the Acts tells us that Paul and Barnabas were sent forth by the Holy Ghost; but each Sunday school teacher, each Christian worker, may, and should, be conscious of the same commission. Wait before God, crying, send me to whomsoever, whithersoever, and howsoever Thou wilt, only send me. Let me feel that I am in the line of Thy purpose, and commissioned to bear the message of Thy love. And He will bid us go. Always lift your eyes and heart to God before putting your hand to any work for Him, saying, "I will not go, except Thou send me."

The Baptism and Temptation of Jesus (Matt. iii. 13 to iv. 11).

Golden Text.—"This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased" (Matt. iii. 17).

Introduction.

LAST week we saw Jesus Christ as a boy, to-day we find He is grown up and thirty years of age (Luke iii. 23). His life had been lived at Nazareth in Galilee (Matt. ii. 23, iii. 13; Luke iv. 16-22), and his daily occupation had been that of a carpenter (Mark vi. 3).

Now his great life-work begins, the fulfilling of God's plan for the redemption of the world.

He would go every step of the way, preparing a path for man to follow from earth right into heaven (Heb. x. 20). So He was born a little helpless babe at Bethlehem. He grew as other children grow to manhood, and then He gives Himself to service and work for the rest of his earthly life.

Two scenes are brought before us to-day.

1. The approval and blessing of his Father at his baptism by the descent of the Holy Ghost.

2. The temptation, or testing-time, in the desolate, dreary wilderness.

Key to diagram.—Luke says the Holy Spirit descended in the bodily form of a dove upon Christ (Dove, emblem of peace, &c.). God's blessing rested upon Him, and He was filled with the Holy Spirit (Luke iv. 1).

In the Temptation, Jesus uses "the sword of the Spirit" to fight the enemy. To Satan's three "ifs," Christ answers with three: "It is written," and He conquers (Eph. vi. 17).

The Baptism (iii. 13-17).

Verse 13. When Jesus came to John to the River Jordan to be baptized, he did not realize at first who it was (John i. 32-34); and when he understood he did not feel worthy to do it (verse 14), but he humbly obeyed (verse 15) when he knew it was the wish of Christ.

Luke gives us more points (see chap. iii. 21). Christ went alone into the river (how much loneliness all through his life). He was praying (trace how He was a Man of prayer). The Holy Ghost in bodily shape like a dove (fulfilment of prophecy) (Is. xi. 2; lxi. 1-3).

To live the Christ-life we, too, must often be found praying (1 Thess. v. 17).

We may, too, have God's approval and blessing in the fulness of the Holy Spirit (Luke xi. 13; Eph. v. 18).

Verse 17. "Beloved Son" (see John iii. 16), "Only Begotten" (and Col. i. 13), "His dear Son" (margin, "Son of his Love"). "Well pleased!" Three times during Christ's life was God's voice heard in these words from heaven. Let us follow our Great Exemplar (1 Peter ii. 21), and live a life of "well-pleasing" to our God.

The Temptation (iv. 1-11).

Verse 1. After special blessing often comes a testing-time (illustrate ships, ropes, bells, &c., tested). There is no sin in being tempted, the sin begins when we begin to yield. Jesus did not yield, therefore He did not sin, "was in all points tempted like as we are yet without sin" (Heb. iv. 15).

Mark i. 13 says, "wild beasts" were in the the wilderness. Jesus was there forty days and forty nights (verse 2). We know not all He went through, but we know fierce temptations assailed Him. In what form the Devil came to Him we know not, but we do know he tempted Christ just where he thought he could make Him fall, as he ever does to human beings. Satan had his plan of temptation, and he carried it out much the same as he did in the garden of Eden. We shall find it in 1 John ii. 16. Lust of the flesh; lust of the eyes; the pride of life—Eve fell, Christ conquered.

2nd DARING
3rd DISHONOURING GOD

Enlarge on these from verses in lesson-portion. Note verse 11. Angels, Luke iv. 1. "Jesus full of the Holy Ghost;" iv. 14 "Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit."

How beautiful! He went through it all with the Holy Spirit. What a lesson for us in all temptation. 1 Thess. v. 19; Eph. 4. 30; Luke iv. 13 "for a season." This was not the only time Christ was tempted, so He can help us in all our temptations. (Heb. ii. 18).

Lessons We Learn.

If we are willing to serve God all our lives, He will bless us and give us his Holy Spirit in all his fulness.

When we are tempted to do wrong, Jesus is able to help (Heb. iv. 15.) He knows all about it, don't forget "in all points." See James i. 12, 13; also the "overcomes" in second and third chapters Revelation.

Juvenile Emigration to Canada.

IN a very interesting article on Mr. Quarrier's work in The Christian of the 4th inst., the writer speaks of a stop having been put on Mr. Quarrier's emigration work through the legislation of the Ontario Government in 1897, and says: "This law prohibits children from being taken into the province without a descriptive licence, which is degrading to the children, as it reminds them and others of their antecedents."

It is quite a mistake to suppose that "a descriptive licence" raking up an unhappy past is required. In fact, there is no question of licence for the children at all; but the Act provides that only accredited societies, authorized by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, may engage in the work of juvenile immigration, and that each such society shall provide a permanent home to which the children may be returned when circumstances require, and that each child shall be visited at least once a year.

The Act provides that if a child has been returned by an employer for any grave misconduct or immorality, it should be the duty of the Society to acquaint any person about to employ the child again of the nature of such offence. But surely this is only right!

It also makes it unlawful to bring into the Province any child of defective intellect, or unable from physical infirmity to earn his living, or one of habitual criminal propensities.

I can only say that whatever forebodings any had as to this Act have proved groundless, so far as our experience goes, and that, on the contrary, it has given us what we never had before—a legal locus standi—as we are now constituted the lawful guardians of the children we emigrate till they are eighteen years of age.

Personally I am very sorry that our dear friend Mr. Quarrier is not continuing the emigration work in which he was so conspicuously successful, and I hope that he will re-consider his decision, and feel reassured by the experience of others as to the humane spirit in which this Act was passed, and the most courteous spirit in which it is applied. If any of your readers interested in the question would like to read the Act for themselves, I shall be pleased to lend them my copy.

Southsea.—During the year Southsea Common was again the scene of earnest and profitable gatherings. Mr. John Denning and his fellow-workers have, for nineteen summers, pitched their tent for meetings at this centre. The services brought many under the sound and power of the Gospel, and hundreds of souls professed to find peace and forgiveness. By means of visitation amongst God's people, and the reading and expounding of Scripture, believers are edified, and doubting ones have their faith strengthened. There have also been open-air meetings, Gospel services in halls and cottages. The poor are also relieved in various ways. The Mission is conducted on simple, undenominational lines. Communications may be addressed to Mr. John Denning, Shirley Lodge, St. Ursula Grove, Southsea.

Obituary.

MR. W. W. PERKS.

On Tuesday morning, last week, Mr. W. W. Perks, of the Friary, Winchester, and father of the Misses Perks, of the Soldiers' Home, passed peacefully into the glory. He was in his eighty-eighth year, and his testimony to the saving and keeping power of the Lord Jesus was life-long. Perfect peace was the experience of this aged Christian during his last illness, which was only short. He was quite conscious to the last, and dwelt especially on the Scripture, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee." To a friend who came to see him, he said, very emphatically, "Christ is all sufficient."

MR. F. SANDFORD.

Members of the Shrewsbury Y.M.C.A. have to mourn the loss of their president, Mr. F. Sandford, who passed away after a very brief illness on the 10th inst. at the advanced age of eighty-five. Elected president nineteen years ago, he took a deep interest in the work, and was always ready to help forward every movement that had to do with the spiritual welfare of young men.

MISS ELIZA HOLDSWORTH.

The death recently occurred at Ealing, of Miss Eliza Holdsworth, in the 103rd year of her age. Miss Holdsworth, who had always led a very quiet and frugal life, was an earnest Christian and a total abstainer. She was in possession of her mental faculties up to the time when she passed away in perfect peace. Her last words, addressed to her nieces, were "God bless you, my dears. I rest in the Lord Jesus Christ." Some considerable time before her death she gave directions as to her funeral, and desired that on her coffin might be placed the words:

Nothing in my hand I bring,
Simply to thy cross I cling.

MRS. L. J. BROOKE.

The death is announced, at the age of eighty-three, of Mrs. Letitia Jane Brooke, of Westbury, Kingstown, Dublin, widow of the late Rev. Butler Brooke, and sister of the late Mr. Wm. H. M. Archdall. Strong in her religious convictions, and deeply earnest in her piety, the life of the late Mrs. Brooke was a model of unostentatious charity and good works. She lived for God, and the gifts which He bestowed on her were spent and distributed in his service.

REV. J. R. MACDOUGALL, D.D.

The many friends of evangelical work in Italy will hear with regret of the death of Rev. J. R. MacDougall, D.D., of Florence, founder and honorary president of the Free Italian Church. Dr. MacDougall had for some time suffered from pneumonia, with complications, and the end came on the 12th inst.

The lamented minister was well known and esteemed for his devotion to the cause of the Gospel in Italy. He commenced work in Florence in 1857, under the auspices of the Free Church of Scotland, and joined in the evangelical work which was being vigorously carried on in secret (in spite of Grand Ducal threats and Papal bulls) by Dr. Stewart, of Leghorn. Circumstances led him to take up, in 1869, with Gavazzi, the cause of the Italian Evangelicals, and in June, 1870, when they met in synod in Milan and the Free Italian Church was formed, he became their treasurer, and generously undertook to find material support for this friendless Church, in addition to continuing various efforts which he had initiated in the interests of the Waldenses.

The deceased minister's labours for the evangelization of Italy were incessant, even up to the time of his death. He was the chief link, too, between the Evangelical Church and its British and American supporters. His lamented illness and death have necessarily placed the committee in a difficult position, and his old friend, Dr. Alexander Robertson, of Venice, begs that friends of the cause will at this time of mourning pray that the work which Dr. MacDougall so devotedly carried on may be continued in the best possible way.

Mission Work at Evian-les-Bains.

THE report of this well-known Mission for the past year shows hopeful progress. There is certainly a spirit of determined resistance, in some places more marked than formerly, but this is often found to defeat itself. There is now working at this Mission an evangelist who for the last four years of his preparation for the Roman priesthood was racked with doubts which no discussions with professors could ever set at rest. Possessing a Latin Testament, he brought the doctrines of the Roman Church to it, and as he studied the Word he saw they were in contradiction to it. After a struggle he came out, and is now earnestly fighting the errors he once desired to teach.

A small cottage home has just been acquired, half-an-hour's journey above Evian, and a few articles of furniture have been put into it, a Swiss friend having given all necessary for a sitting-room. The sick and convalescent are drafted here as occasion requires and means allow. The difficulties of village work are very trying. One dark winter's evening, as a lady-worker left one village, about fifty young men and children followed her, shouting, ringing bells, and beating old tins; she walked at the head of this troupe till she came to the curé's house. He came out to see what the noise meant, and the lady told him it was his fault the villagers had so insulted her. He took no notice, but said to the crowd, "You have not done well to insult a lady, though it was good to drive her out of the village."

BOVRIL

Influenza.

From all sides come reports of an exceptionally severe visitation of Influenza, the outbreak in many quarters being very serious, particularly in regard to the rapidly-spreading nature of the infection.

BOVRIL

The Resisting Power

required to protect you from an attack of Influenza is provided in an agreeable and convenient form by Bovril. An occasional cup of this stimulating and comforting beverage imparts tone to the system, sets up an immediate glow of natural warmth, and overcomes the exhaustion and numbness due to the penetrating cold and damp. Bovril is at all times the best of restoratives.

A Glance at Spitalfields.

NUMEROUS, varied, and useful are the organizations at work in this parish associated with Christ Church, Spitalfields. The enormous common lodging-house accommodation and the hundreds of free beds in shelters in some measure account for the increase in poor population of the district, and thus the demands made upon the resources of the church become more pressing year by year. The assiduous rector, Rev. Wilfred H. Davies, and his staff of workers have vigorously sustained during the past year many attractive and profitable meetings, clubs, and classes for the poor, and these have formed, as in other cases, counter-attractions to the public-house.

The young are provided for in various ways. The Sunday School, Boys' Brigade, Band of Hope, &c., are means by which the children are brought under Christian influence and teaching. The cry for sympathetic help is not disregarded. Mothers pleading for their children to be sought and found, children abandoned by their parents, drunkards longing to live soberly, professional men and women who have fallen from their estate to the low level of the submerged, some of these have been placed in situations, others helped into better surroundings, and the children placed in homes or refuges.

In the interest of the Jews much has been accomplished; and the agencies of the church have been abundantly blessed in adding joy and beneficence to the lives of the desolate and starving amidst scenes of darkness, difficulty, and depression. Copies of the annual report on these agencies may be obtained from Rev. W. H. Davies, Christ Church, Spitalfields, E.

The Bermondsey Settlement.

IT is gratifying to find that settlements are multiplying both in Great Britain and America, and are becoming recognised as institutions holding a foremost place among the social agencies of these countries. At Bermondsey there is every evidence that the movement is being carried forward to a successful issue, embodying as it does those principles which are vitally important to the effective dealing with social problems. Multitudes are deriving help from this settlement, which exists for no special creed or class, and therefore represents a fellowship in and for a higher life, comprehensively understood, in which all may claim a share.

The Workers' Association has continued to grow both in numbers and efficiency. Amongst the evangelistic efforts must be mentioned the united mission conducted by Mr. W. R. Lane in the Town Hall under the auspices of the local Council of the Free Churches; and throughout the year there have been gratifying signs of sound and steady progress. The Pleasant Sunday Afternoon services, Sunday School, Band of Hope, sewing and other classes and clubs, have also been vigorously maintained. The Rotherhithe Children's Mission has sustained a Sunday evening service, attended by some 400 children.

The lectures and theological classes have been equally well attended, and have proved an important development of the past year. The educational work has also been attended with results highly satisfactory. The students were more numerous, regular, and responsive, and have manifested deeper sympathy with the highest aims of the institution.

The Choral and Orchestral Union has met the needs of musical students, and the performance of oratorios and other devotional works has tended to promote that growing spirit of co-operation between Christians of different churches which the settlement recognises as one of its highest and most important ideals.

The various clubs and guilds associated with the settlement have provided means of self-improvement and recreation for the young, who are thereby both entertained and instructed. The kindly feeling shown towards the settlement, and its activities, by men of different shades of opinion in the neighbourhood is a striking testimony to the efficiency and importance of the institution's efforts to show forth in word and deed the glories of the kingdom of God in the redemption and purifying of social life.

Owing to an increase in general and other expenses, there is a deficiency on the year's working of £581 12s. 9d., notwithstanding an increase in the subscriptions. It is earnestly desired that the annual income shall be sufficient to meet the liabilities. The treasurer, Rev. Walford Green, and the warden, Rev. J. Scott Lidgett, may be addressed at the Settlement, Bermondsey.

The Late Mr. J. G. M'Vicker.

A SCENE of solemn and heartfelt sadness was witnessed at the Clapton Hall, N.E., on Wednesday afternoon last week, on the occasion of the interment of the remains of Mr. J. G. M'Vicker. Those who had known and watched the unremitting devotion, patient and unwavering zeal, and powerful influence of the departed worker, assembled in large numbers, and the hall was crowded.

The service was as simple as it was impressive. The hymn, "For ever with the Lord," was sung, only as it can be, when the heart is burdened with grief. Prayer followed, after which Mr. A. M. Kyd paid a kindly tribute to the memory of Mr. M'Vicker. The twenty years Mr. Kyd had known him had been a period of gracious, tender, and loving ministry. To know him was to love him. In Ireland, and everywhere he was known, he was equally beloved and spoken of in affectionate terms. His words would remain with them until the dawn of the day that would reveal the face, now lost to sight, radiant with glory, in the presence of the Eternal One. To say that he would be missed was to say what all felt who had had happy fellowship with him in his ministry.

Dr. Henry Soltau spoke of his association with the departed, in terms of gratitude and pleasure. He made his life so real to each one that it was hard to think he could possibly love others besides; and the way he took all to his heart was wonderful. Christ lived in him and worked through him. His humility was always manifest; he learnt to follow Christ, and enjoyed unbroken communion with Him.

Mr. Alexander Stewart remarked that a few days before his death Mr. M'Vicker wrote a note deploring the decease of Mr. Moody, and earnestly praying that others might be called and prepared to take his place. After the singing of the hymn, "The countless multitude on high," prayer was offered for the comfort and consolation of the Holy Spirit to be given to the bereaved and sorrowing widow and family.

The interment took place in Abney Park Cemetery, in the presence of a numerous company of relatives and sympathizing friends. Mr. Alexander Stewart read portions of Scripture. Mr. T. Dudgeon engaged in prayer, and after the singing of "On that bright and golden morning, when the Son of Man shall come," the mourners dispersed sorrowfully—it must needs be so—but with the assurance that their beloved friend had entered upon higher and nobler service.

The Albert Hall Demonstration.

SIR,—A very grave statement is being circulated, I understand, on the authority of the committee. It is that the majority have decided to exclude Nonconformists from the platform. If this is true, and my information justifies me in believing its accuracy, how can Nonconformists be asked or expected to swell the audience on the occasion? There is no human possibility of Churchmen ousting Popery from the National Church without the help and co-operation of Nonconformists. To boycott them on political grounds, or those of expediency, seems even worse than the boycotting of Mr. John Kensit at the last demonstration. I do hope that the decision will be annulled, and that all Protestants will be united together in this great and imperative effort to save our Church and our country from being Romanized. What have Nonconformists done to be thus excluded?

A Protestant Churchman

Irish Church Missions.

THE Society for Irish Church Missions to the Roman Catholics for the past fifty years has been doing a great and blessed work in the Sister Island. Some thousands of humble converts in the wilds of Connemara, in the early days of the work, were gathered from the fold of Rome into the flock of Christ. During the past five years 176 adult converts have publicly renounced Romanism in connection with the Dublin mission alone, openly coming forward in the mission church, many more being now under instruction. Considerably over 1,000 children are daily taught the Word of God in the schools and homes of the Mission, many of whom have been led to the Saviour.

Missions have been opened in Cork, Waterford, Belfast, Galway, Dundalk, Drogheda, and Limerick. In each of these workers have been placed, and the Gospel has found entrance into many receptive hearts in these large Roman Catholic centres. In Limerick a medical mission has been at work for some time. Notwithstanding great opposition from the priests, many thousands of patients have attended, and have been pointed to the great Physician. Some, it is a joy to add, have proved His healing power for their sin-sick souls.

A great seed-sowing has taken place by the wayside, and in the scattered hamlets, and cabins of the Irish peasantry. Itinerating evangelists have, during the last five years, visited more than 1,000 fairs and markets. At these the Gospel has been preached, and nearly 50,000 books, chiefly copies or portions of the Scriptures, have been sold. During the same five years, colporteurs have sold to Roman Catholics more than 70,000 books, also for the most part copies or portions of the Scriptures.

Recent extension of work has involved largely increased expenditure, but the ordinary income has remained almost stationary. Only some £12,000 is annually received from ordinary sources to meet an expenditure of £20,000. In dependence upon God, the committee have sought neither to reduce the staff nor to employ worldly means for raising money. God has honoured their faith, and hitherto the needs have been supplied by large and often unlooked-for legacies.

The offices of the Society are 11, Buckingham Street, Adelphi, W.C., the secretaries being Rev. N. F. Duncan and Mr. Wm. Pasley.

The Y.M.C.A.

MANY departments of work are represented in the annual report of the Eastbourne Association. The president, Mr. Steinle, has conducted a Bible Class for German waiters. Many gatherings for Bible study have been held, and a Christian workers' training class has met weekly.

The eight workers who have proceeded to South Africa under the auspices of the Soldiers' Christian Association, equipped with reading, writing, and meeting tents for the use of the troops engaged in the war, have met in conference representatives of the Y.M.C.A. at Capetown. It has been resolved to join forces, and a mutual basis of co-operation has been agreed upon. Work has already been commenced at Queenstown, and two officers have departed with a large marquee for the Orange River. Mr. A. H. Wheeler, General Secretary of the S.C.A., will remain for the present in Capetown. The Pietermaritzburg Y.M.C.A. is rendering valuable help under the direction of its president, the Hon. Henry Bale, Attorney General in the Natal Government.

Mr. Christian Phildius, on behalf of the Central International Committee at Geneva, has completed a tour through Austria, and has formed, during this visit, no fewer than twenty new associations. The most important of these is at Trieste, where a very promising work has been commenced. Mr. Phildius returns from Austria each time more convinced of the needs of that country, and of the good which can be done there by the associations—now ninety-seven in number.

Present Afflictions and Future Bliss.—The reasonableness of present afflictions will appear if we consider that they are the way to the rest; that they keep us from mistaking our rest, and from losing our way to it; that they quicken our pace towards it; that they chiefly incommode our flesh, and that under them God's people have often the sweetest foretastes of their rest.—Baxter

NOW ready, the "D. L. Moody Memorial Numbers" of THE CHRISTIAN, bound together in a beautifully illustrated wrapper. (Price 4d.; post free 7d.) The cover has been specially designed, and contains a lifelike portrait of Mr. Moody, family groups, and views of Northfield. The pages are also embellished with portraits of Mr. Moody and his co-adjutor, Mr. Sankey, numerous engravings, and the tributes and testimonies which have appeared in our pages during the present month. The whole forms an attractive and timely memento of the evangelist and his work.

A book of special interest at the present time is D. L. MOODY AT HOME: HIS HOME AND HOME WORK (2s. 6d. Morgan & Scott), which embraces a full description of the educational institutions established at Northfield and Mount Hermon, with some account of the Christian conferences held, and nuggets from the addresses of D. L. Moody, Dr. H. Bonar, Dr. A. J. Gordon, Dr. Pentecost, Dr. Pierson, Major Whittle, and others.

Not since the day on which the deaths of Mr. Parnell and Mr. W. H. Smith were announced has there been such an extraordinary list of obituary notices as met the eye last Monday. The Duke of Teck, whose position as grandfather of a direct heir to the British throne gave him particular importance, succumbed on Saturday at his Richmond home. The kindly sharer with his genial wife of many a philanthropic labour of love, the Duke became still better known to the public when his only daughter married the Duke of York. It is a coincidence that within a few days of the publication of the "Life of the Duchess of Teck" her husband should have died, after several months of retirement, consequent upon the shock caused by the Duchess' death. Not one of his children was able to be present during the last hours. To the Queen and the Royal Family we tender our sympathy in this time of sudden bereavement.

Mr. John Ruskin's death at Coniston, on Saturday, has removed from us one of the last of the century's great writers. A man whose genius often verged on eccentricity, Mr. Ruskin has served the world by revealing to thousands the handiwork of God in nature and in art. He expressed his opinions on many subjects, including Evangelical doctrine, in terms which showed his slight acquaintance with them; but several of his pages are as eloquent testimonies to the omnipresence of God as can be found anywhere in literature. He much enjoyed the preaching of Mr. Spurgeon, and was a visitor to "Westwood" more than once.

The author of "Lorna Doone," whose death synchronized with that of Mr. Ruskin, was a writer of many wholesome stories. Of Mr. R. D. Blackmore, indeed, one might say "He wrote no line which, dying, he would wish to blot." It would be well if some of our younger authors would strive to earn such a record.

Parliament is called to meet on January 30. If ever there were pressing need for the prayers of all Christians that wisdom may be granted to the Members of both Houses, surely it is at the present crisis in our nation's history. "Fightings without, and fears within," well describes the state of Great Britain, and only the recognition of the Divine rulership—the Imperialism of God—can steady the minds and control the wills of our senators. Each House opens its daily proceedings with formal prayer, too often a period used for the mere purpose of securing a seat. We know there are many Members who are devout men, and private gatherings for prayer have been the rule for many years. But as the representatives of the nation are sent to Westminster by the suffrages of the people, so let us aid them in the performance of their Parliamentary duties by public and private prayer.

"Every idle word"—how little do we consider that injunction as to careful speech. The messages from the seat of war are all placed before the Press Censor, whose work it is to strike out every sentence which would hamper the conduct of the war by giving information of future plans. But the censorship does not apply to the budgets of private letters from officers and privates, and many of these epistles, which were never written for publication, have been sent to the newspapers by indiscreet relatives. Harsh criticisms, unkind insinuations, terrible stories, have been set before the public. Reputations of generals and officers, which have taken a lifetime to build, may thus be blasted by a sentence written hastily on mere hearsay evidence. "Every idle word"—what need there is for all, in every walk of life, public and private, to heed the warning of our Saviour, and to "set a watch" over our tongues.

It is cheering to hear that prayer meetings at the front are not confined to the Boers. A message has been heliographed from Ladysmith that a daily prayer meeting is held in the besieged town, and it is attended by over 1,000 men. Among the most regular attendants is Sir George White, the commanding general, and many of his officers. From other sources we hear that a good spiritual work is being done at other centres. The old "camp-meeting" is being revived to some purpose under the Southern Cross. In spite of the gruesome aspects of war, there is something peculiarly sobering in a soldier's life. He lives literally under the shadow of eternity, and knows not what a day may bring forth. We trust that as good and permanent a work will be done in the British Army in South Africa as was done among American soldiers during the Cuban War.

The way in which the present war is working to undo the results of the Peace Conference is shown with sinister force in the incident of the Bundesrath. This (German) vessel was detained by a British cruiser on the charge of carrying contraband of war for the Transvaal. Strong feelings were aroused in Germany, fed by subtle semi-inspired paragraphs resenting this reflection on the national honour, just at the moment when the Government were anxious to push through a strong Navy Bill. This was the Emperor's opportunity, and he has made use of it to the utmost in forestalling all opposition to his plan of doubling the navy in a few years. The question of the Bundesrath was, of course, settled on its merits, and there is no friction between the two Governments. But the Navy Bill is secure; and that is all the German Government cared for. The incident appears trifling, but it may be fraught with grave issues in the not distant future.

Rev. J. G. Moffatt has been speaking some salutary truths on "Black and White in South Africa." He told the Capetown Christian Ministers' Association that the English, who came later to the Cape than the Dutch, brought with them the results of the great revival of the missionary conscience which took place at the close of the eighteenth century. Yet the English had not always walked in the path of righteousness in dealing with the black man. They must remember this, and speak gently of their neighbours—the Dutch.

> And now (said Mr. Moffatt) comes in the most serious consideration of all. It is a fact that Europeans who come to this country are liable to drop the European view of the native, and to adopt the Boer view, and sometimes, as is the way with converts or perverts, to surpass the Boer himself in selfish injustice towards the black man.

We remember the Bechuanas, whom England drove from their country two years ago, and then "apprenticed" to Boer farmers for a term of years; and we recall the contempt with which we have recently heard in England "the black man" referred to. Behind the question of franchise, and gold, and equal laws for the white man is that of the native for both Boer and Briton to face.

The Angelus, an American monthly, announces the following news:—

> Archbishop Jones, the Anglican Metropolitan of Capetown, South Africa, has lately received the Methodist "Vicar-Bishop" Dwane, "Presiding Elder" Monoke, and upwards of twenty preachers, into the Catholic faith. The Christian Recorder (Methodist) admits the loss of these workers to be a serious blow.

Dwane is a native of South Africa, from Khama's tribe, and had it in his mind quite lately to found a native Church as a protest against the white men, who will not allow the natives to mix with them in church-life and affairs. This idea has evidently fallen through, and all that Dwane and his friends have done—if the report be correct—has been to go from the Wesleyan Church to the Episcopalian.

The City of London Bible Class Union, in connection with which so many useful departments of spiritual work are maintained in the interest of City business men, has arranged for an evangelistic mission to be held at the City Temple on February 5-9 and 12-16 inclusive. Special efforts are to be made to reach the thousands of talented young fellows who occupy so important a position in the commercial life of the Metropolis. Mr. Henry Varley's peculiar gifts and aptitude for dealing with men, mark him as admirably suitable for such work, and he has been wisely chosen to conduct the meetings. In an address to business men, Mr. Varley characterizes some of the aims of the mission:

To build up ourselves in our most holy faith through intelligent study of the Word of God is a principal object. To inquire into the nature and character of some of the fundamental truths of the sacred Scriptures, and to use the adapted means in order to the revelation of Christ in the life and experience of many; these are among the results which we long to see wrought out and effected by this campaign.

While some readers have expressed satisfaction at the article on "The Real Presence" in our last issue, others have hardly appreciated the position taken up by the writer, Deputy Surgeon-General Partridge. "There am I in the midst" is a blessed truth; but the condition is, not that the Lord's Table be spread, but that his disciples be gathered—"Where two or three are gathered together in my name." Dr. Partridge recognises this as fully as the friends who have courteously criticised him; his aim was to show that the Supper was not intended to emphasize that truth, but rather to remind us of One whose return is the subject of prayer and hope. The Holy Spirit was given to realize in the soul of the believer a continual presence of Christ. To some the Supper assists that blessed experience; to others the experience is enjoyed without the Supper. The disciple of Christ is entitled to know, not an occasional but a perpetual presence; and this was not called in question in Dr. Partridge's article.

There is always a mental satisfaction in having the observations and conclusions of ordinary persons on some important moral question verified and confirmed by some one of professional standing, who has the ear of all classes. Any city missionary or Bible-woman could have told us right off that drunken mothers are a physical and social plague; nevertheless we are glad to hear what Dr. William C. Sullivan has to say:

He had conducted his observations in the women's section of the Liverpool Prison, and had selected from the abundant material at hand 100 cases of chronic drunkards who had borne children. His inquiries had been formulated under three heads. Firstly: "Did maternal inebriety produce a high rate of infantile mortality?" Secondly: "With the progressive increase of maternal alcoholism, was there a progressive decrease of infantile vitality?" Thirdly: "Among the surviving children, was there any evidence of unusual frequency of nervous abnormality?" He thought all three questions should be answered in the affirmative. The inquiries he had made furnished abundant evidence of the social gravity of female inebriety.

Yet we allow this physical and moral pestilence to rage among us, and thousands grow rich in promoting it!

In the Revue de Morale Sociale, Dec. 1899, is an article on "The Wages of Women," by Kaethe Schirmacher, in which the writer demonstrates that poverty and low wages are the chief causes of driving women to the streets. In Italy and Austria, as well as in Germany, France, England, and the United States, the working woman receives but two-thirds or half the amount of the wages paid to the man in equal conditions. In many instances, she is not only unable to save a little for a rainy day, but she cannot even keep herself, unless aided by her family. And those who have no family and no well-to-do friends—what of them?

According to M. Charles Benoist, who has made a special study of this subject, the average working woman in Paris earns 2fr. per day. This gives her for 300 working days 600frs. But for her to live in Paris requires the minimum of 850frs. Even then the worker disposes of but 65c. (6d.) daily, and is obliged to live upon a very meagre diet. Taking into account the enforced holiday of the dead season, her income shows a deficit of 250fr. And the agonizing question comes up again: Where to find this sum?—"In the street, mesdames." This miserable phase of our social economy points and drives to one solution. All who have studied the question are agreed on this.

In speaking of the sewing woman, M. Benoist says, with a cruel cynicism:

In every kind of work the time must come, and it does come, when the wages of the worker fall below what is indispensably necessary for her maintenance. It is for her to fill the void by remembering that she is a woman.

No doubt there are other causes beside poverty, but the facts here stated show that of all forms of cruel cheapness the most inhuman is the unjust under-payment of the woman-worker.

Some recent prosecutions of women, with the view of clearing the moral atmosphere of the Metropolis somewhat, will doubtless have a beneficial effect; but the question naturally arises, why, in such cases, the men concerned are allowed to go scot-free, even in cases in which evidence regarding their culpability has been given in court? Such unequal treatment of the sexes certainly tends to give a feeling of impunity to the male offender, and it is desirable that, even as a deterrent, there should be a change in practice, and that these vicious persons should be made to share in the punishments now inflicted only upon their female companions.

The chief indictment against the London County Council in regard to their licensing action appears to be that they have "attempted to dictate a code of morals to the frequenters of places of amusement," a course of action which the soi-disant Entertainment Reform League professes to find intolerable. All those, however, who are familiar with the temptations of modern life in the Metropolis will be thankful to the Council for what they have done, and will hope that their hands may be strengthened in going still further. All licensing work and all legislation in such directions must essentially be in the direction of an attempt to impose a code of morals if it has to be of any value, and if the London County Council have had to deal more largely with the repression of immorality than other licensing bodies have, the responsibility for the necessity is not theirs.

"What is the secret of spiritual strength?" The Methodist Times, in a strong leading article, answers the question by enlarging the two important words, Theological Preaching. Every great age religiously has been an age of preaching. Equally true is it that it has been an age of theological preaching. A great dignitary of the Church of England recently said that people go to church, not to hear sermons, but to worship, and that we ought to have less preaching. "But preaching, real preaching, Scriptural preaching, is of the very essence of public worship." It is the distinctive offering of the intellect to God, as prayer is the offering of the heart. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy mind," and preaching quickens the mind's love for God by feeding it with the truth of God.

And strong, searching, effective preaching must be theological in the best sense of that much-abused term. There is a theology falsely so-called, that is infinitely heavy and dull, and remote from the needs of the soul. That is more honoured in the breach than in the observance. This, however, is no reason why theology, truly so-called—which is the "science of God," i.e., Divine truth applied to human needs—should not be earnestly proclaimed and driven home. It is because this generation has largely lost the secret of this kind of preaching, not because it is out of date, that we have so little of it nowadays. Dry-as-dust dissertations are as out of place as shallow appeals to feelings. What is wanted is the wonderful genius of St. Paul, who in his deepest passages never loses sight of practical applications, and in his minutest directions for conduct always speaks under the inspiration of some great and mighty doctrine. Every great preacher has followed him here, and few preachers could fail of great results if they did likewise.

Walking through a great pottery works the other day, the writer saw some exquisite vases with elaborate designs thereon. He asked about the method of their manufacture, and learned that it was necessary for these particular vases to pass eight times through the furnace. Not until the eighth time did the dull gold of the design shine with all the required brilliance. Some of our readers must have been passing lately through the fires of affliction. Blow after blow of bereavement may have fallen upon them; the furnace has seemed to glow with a heat past bearing. Yet the experience will, if received with patience and faith, result in the dull gold of their life shining with a radiance not human but Divine. The "eighth furnace" must accomplish its work.

Rev. G. B. Berry, an evangelical clergyman at Plymouth, who had arranged an interchange of ministerial service between himself and the Nonconformist brethren of the town, was prohibited by his bishop from permitting a Dissenter to preach in his pulpit, and also from preaching himself in a Dissenting pulpit. In response to the prohibition, he yielded on the former point, but utterly refused on the latter. The law is clear that no layman (under which title, from the Episcopalian point of view, must be included all Nonconformist ministers) can occupy the pulpit of an Anglican church, though he may read the lessons. But the law is not clear that a clergyman of that Church may not preach where he likes in his own parish—or in another, if the resident clergyman in charge of it does not object. The question is an important one, and should be cleared up in the interests of all concerned.

The late Archbishop of Canterbury made a shrewd observation when he said:

It is plain enough to see the difference between worldliness and religion, but unbelief now wears a chasuble. I mean a vestment on which the word religion is joyously worn. And unbelievers pretend that no one is religious except non-Christians.

So it is said that a scientific mind repudiates miracles as the marvellous tales of the world's infancy, and a truly religious spirit has no need of them—is, indeed, somewhat hindered by them. The most religious man is he who keeps on denying and denying, shedding first one "excrescence" and then another, until his Gospel bears to the original as much resemblance as a ghost to a real human being. There is more of this pretentious "spirituality" than we like to think, but we fancy it is somewhat on the wane. The soul wants something to live by, something to believe and to lean upon. Negations are wind, and no soul can live upon that.

Our Lord pointed out the dangers of a conscience manufactured by religious scruples created by the traditions and commandments of men. Thus the true law, to which there ought to be submission, is made vain, and the new law, concerned about trifles, is exalted. Men "strain out a gnat, and swallow a camel." The evil effects assume, in some cases, national proportions. For example, in Italy, says a native minister, the only things recognised as sins before God are those which the human penal code recognises; whilst all sins of thought, bad language, uncharitable judgments, offences, and blasphemies against God and Christ, public scandals, concubinage, usury, selfishness, and such like, are for Italians but trifles or natural defects not worth calling sins.

The true upward trend in a nation is made when the individual conscience is moved by the truth and Spirit of God. "I will give them an heart of flesh." Then laws and all other repressions of the moral sense of a nation assume purer and higher forms, and exert a reflex influence for good.

In illustration of a note in a recent issue, in regard to some of the literature of the day, it may perhaps be pointed out that much of the so-called religious fiction of the day simply deals with Christ from a diluted Socinian point of view; and that, if there is no formal and actual negation of the Divinity, the manhood alone is referred to. In view of this we are glad to see that a daily contemporary, in a forcible review of what it terms "Another Bible Novel," protests strongly against "the undesirable modern fashion of turning the Scriptures into novels." A hope is expressed that the one in question "may kill the Biblical novel," a hope we sincerely join in, for we are satisfied that such books, parodying as they do the Scripture narratives, do not lead to an increased reverence for the Scriptures.

Cardinal Vaughan has put forth an extraordinary and novel argument in favour of an Irish Roman Catholic University. Irishmen, he says, are pouring out their life-blood in defence of the Empire; and therefore Nonconformists, who occupy themselves at home in rejecting the claim and thwarting the conscience of the Irish people, are thus continuing to hold them down in a position of educational inferiority, are unpatriotic! The plea is as inaccurate as it is irrelevant. There is no conceivable connection between loyalty in the field of war and a claim to special ecclesiastical privilege at home; indeed, the loyalty that claims such rewards wears in itself a suspicious look. Nor is there anything unpatriotic in insisting on unsectarian centres of learning, as against such as are sectional and denominational.

The Roman Catholic Bishop of Liverpool, in a recent letter to the priests in that district intimating a day for special prayer in regard to the war, points out that while it is true that the British nation has done much for the extension of the Gospel by furthering the cause of liberty in many lands, if as a nation it has clung loyally to the revelation of God through Christ our Redeemer, YET, on the other hand, there is much in this nation to call down the just anger of God.

In this all thoughtful persons must concur; but we are quite unable to go with Dr. Whiteside when he proceeds to cite in illustration the "harsh treatment" which England has "meted out especially to our Holy Father, whom it has allowed to be despoiled of his temporal sovereignty." The rule of the Pope was notorious by reason of its utter depravity, the simple statement of which, in About's La Question Romaine, obtained for that famous indictment the honour of a place in the Index. The Italian nation adopted the "harsh treatment" none too soon.

The Art of Exclusion.

IT is not always remembered that a telescope shuts out from our sight far more objects than it reveals. By concentration of the vision upon a limited area, it enables us to discover far more about the object of our inspection than could possibly be the case if our eye were roaming over a boundless vista. Is there not a need in these days of comprehensiveness to learn this art of exclusion, so that by concentration of the soul we may discover the manifold lessons which are only waiting to be revealed?

If there is one adjective which Christian people ought to regard with suspicion in the description of their own views and the views of others, we think it is the word "broad." Yet many are more eager to be called broad in their sympathies, broad in their ideas, broad in their tolerance of all manner of doubtful things, than they are to exclude from their life the recognised sins which afflict them. They hate to be thought narrow, and so they do as the world does, forgetting all the while that the broad way leadeth to destruction. They fear to be considered intolerant by their own family and friends, and so they lose their birthright for a mess of pottage. They shudder lest men should see any difference between them and those who do not claim to be religious, and so they hasten to remove all possibility of being called "peculiar people" by claiming to be "broad." They have yet to learn the art of exclusion, and until that lesson is understood, their vision will be as restless as the roving eye of the unsatisfied man of the world.

While admitting that the complexity of modern life has added many a new difficulty to the path of the Christian, we claim that he often creates fresh tests of his faith and new dangers to his safety by failing to exclude the "inexpedient" things which are on the frontier of Christian conduct. If he would be spared many an anxious question, he must limit rigorously his outlook to those objects which he knows can only aid and never hinder his progress. One has seen an island which can be reached, when the waves around it have retired, by walking on stepping-stones. But how few there are whose courage and whose caution suffice to enable the perilous exploit to be accomplished! It is a narrow path, and many shrink from the danger and the difficulty of the wave-lapped stones. In like manner the Christian pathway is by single steps which have to be taken across a perilous sea, where with failing faith we may soon sink unless Christ in the vessel enables us to smile at the storm. The peril of the passage from the shore to the island lies in the temptation to divert the mind from the business in hand. The peril of the Christian life is found in the distraction of the soul from the main road to heaven.

If we applied this law of exclusion to our daily life, we should be amazed to see how it would simplify our difficulties. If we refused rigorously to consider all doubtful views, inexpedient amusements, uncertain tasks, we should find at last the leisure which has always seemed to evade us. We should discover the new duties to be so full of joy that, as the naturalist who has only examined carelessly a flower finds under the microscope unimagined beauties, we should awake to realize that we had been living with blind eyes amid God's garden. If you have grown perplexed with divergent claims on mind and time—if you have been too busy to pray with entire surrender of self—try this divine art of exclusion. Become, for a period at all events, a man of one Book; limit your vision to the things which are on no border-line, but are sure and steadfast; tread the "narrow way," despite the sneers of a world which delights in a breadth that leads nowhere but to destruction; and you will gain at last a peace of God unruffled by the waves of conflict.

With Heart and Hand.

ARE you one of those who are constantly lamenting the wickedness of the world? Take care lest such a frame of mind lead to self-righteousness. The spirit is abhorrent which says: "I thank Thee that I am not as other men."

The other day one of those young fellows, plenty of whom you may see loitering at the street corners, guided two little children across the road. Perhaps no one noticed it but myself. I looked at the young man as he came back. There was no conscious look upon his face that he had done a kind deed, but it seemed to me that his action was as great as, if not greater than, that of a duke presiding over a crowded philanthropic meeting. But the lad was an outcast.

The masses! Sheep having no shepherd. Can you not understand how the loving heart of Christ was moved with compassion when He beheld the multitude? And that heart is the same to-day. We pride ourselves on our Christianity. But may there not be more of the Spirit of Christ in many of those desolate outcasts than in some of us?

Not long ago I had a great misfortune. My heart was hardened, not by my misfortune, but by the unkind charity that was shown me. Do you know what it is to be a helpless recipient of condescending kindness—a charity that puts out its hand from afar off? In many cases it is not so much the purse or the gift that is wanted as the throbbing heart, the moistened eye. I was sitting in my room in the evening, when a single knock came to the door, and the servant ushered in a rough navvy to whom I had been able, on one occasion only, to lend a helping hand. He had heard of my misfortune. He had come to me. We clasped hands, and he got out the words, "Oh, sir, I—" but he could get no further. His strong, rude face was working, his eyes moist; and my heart, which had been like ice, was melted before this true heart, who could give me a hand-clasp, and a heart-clasp, but nothing more. Yet that to me was more than all.

Fold to thy heart thy brother!
Where pity dwells the peace of God is there.
To worship rightly is to love each other—
Each smile a hymn, each kindly deed a prayer.

Not Dark With Jesus.

NOT dark with Jesus—I can trust my Friend;
These eyes are dim, I trust to Him,
Rejoiced, I cannot see the end:
'Tis never dark with Jesus.

Not dark with Jesus; I can leave it there,
This tearful task He would not ask,
Were it not best for me to bear:
'Tis never dark with Jesus.

Not dark with Jesus; for my friends are his,
Tho' far they dwell, He loves them well,
And bids me trust Him e'en to this:
'Tis never dark with Jesus.

Not dark with Jesus; lo, the clouds are gone!
"Child, be of cheer, for I am near!"
My soul shall glory in the sun;
'Tis never dark with Jesus.

The Exercise of Benevolence.—If there be a pleasure on earth which angels cannot enjoy, and which they might almost envy man the possession of, it is the power of relieving distress. If there be a pain which devils might pity man for enduring, it is the deathbed reflection that we have possessed the power of doing good, but that we have abused and perverted it to purposes of ill.—Colton.

The War in South Africa.

By Mr. HENRY VARLEY.

"VERILY there is a God that judgeth in the earth."

There is no platform for the judgment of nations, as such, in the world to come. The coming final judgment in the eternal sphere is of individuals. National judgment, even as national growth and development, must be looked for here. A nation has its birth, childhood, youthtide, manhood, and maturity. Proportioned to its establishment in righteousness and justice will be its continuance. National endorsement of injustice, slavery, and iniquity, by any people, will hasten national judgment and final overthrow. It is but a question of time and of the Divine forbearance. "The mills of God grind slowly, but they grind exceeding small."

The history of Babylon, Egypt, Greece, and Rome are but illustrations and proofs of the fact that the judgment of nations takes place in this present world. The events which have recently transpired in many nations distinctly tell that God's judgments are abroad in the earth; and the crises which have arisen and the events now happening are surely the solemn protests of the Moral Governor of the Universe

AGAINST NATIONAL SIN AND INIQUITY.

The past generation has seen Austria in the throes of judgment by her national corruption. War was the devastating scourge in her case. Next came judgment upon the papacy in Italy in immediate connection with the fearful sin of passing into law the doctrine of the Pope's infallibility. France was compelled to remove her troops from Rome, and the temporal power was overthrown and knew judgment. Next came the tremendous struggle and the sacrifice of life between Germany and France. A few years later Turkey and Russia stood out as examples in regard to the penalties which pertain to despotic and cruel rule. The United States also, with the four years of civil war, was pledged to the judgment which belonged to her guilt in foisting upon the free constitution of the Republic the horrible institution of slavery. France, broken and crushed by Germany, is so weighted with her national licentiousness that her population knows no increase. She is now in process of judgment, and gradually sinking.

Spain came next by reason of her long continued oppressions in Cuba and the Philippines. The United States was evidently God's sword to avenge the millions by this European stronghold of Popery. It was Spain that murdered thousands of God's saints, and subjected them to the horrors and tortures of the Inquisition. It was Spain that fitted out and manned the great Armada designed to crush the Reformation and destroy liberty in England. Turkey just now hangs in the balance. The voice of 100,000 murdered Armenian Christians cries for retributive judgment. Abraham Lincoln, General Garfield, the Czar of Russia, the President of France, and the Empress of Austria, all assassinated, yield fearful proofs of national iniquity, bound up with and evidenced in these terrible events.

Similarly, are not the British nation and the Boer republics at this time standing out as a solemn lesson and warning to the whole civilized world? The war raging in South Africa at the commencement of the year 1900 must not, so far as its causes are concerned, be confined to the past fifteen years, or narrowed to a question of a recent quarrel between Boer and Briton. The roots lie very much deeper down. For three or four generations past the Boers (the Dutch) have been up to their neck in the guilt and villainy of the African slave traffic. Inhuman cruelties were, I grieve to say, perpetrated by Briton and Boer when Central and Southern Africa was for years the hunting ground for tens of thousands of slaves whom our fathers exported to Cuba, the West Indies, and the great slave markets which then existed in the Southern States. The Dutch and the English both as nations were involved in this inhuman traffic.

The question is, are these nations now face to face with part payment of the penalties which necessarily attach to those atrocious crimes? The fact is before us. The two guilty peoples are destroying one another. Are the cries of the hunted and tortured slaves of two, three, and four generations back being recalled and reproduced in the groans and terrible deaths of the Boers and the Britons? There is no room to mistake the solemn words of Divine threatening: "Visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation." My position in this paper is that there is from the penalties which the oppression of the inferior races entails upon the oppressors. The might and arrogancy of Egypt and the Pharaohs could not turn God's judgment aside. The deliverance of 3,000,000 slaves from the house of bondage was the time of the breaking in pieces of Egypt's imperial power.

The United States would not let the African slave go. Wilberforce, Clarkson, and the noble band of the emancipators in the States, pleaded in vain to "undo the heavy burdens, and let the oppressed go free." Judgment came; terrible, prolonged, and effective. One million of the flower of the manhood of the great Republic fell. The Divine judgment, involving four years' civil war, produced "liberty for the captive and the opening of the prison to them that were bound." It will be justly asked: Did not the British people pay £20,000,000 for the emancipation of the slaves in the West Indies? I answer, joyfully, Yes; and that fact in our national history may be said to have stayed the heavy hand of penalty at that time. The British people then were thoroughly loyal and enthusiastic

AGAINST THE INIQUITY OF SLAVERY.

But the question arises, Are they loyal to-day? My feeling is there has been a serious loosening of conviction in regard to this and many other forms of slavery and national iniquity during the past twenty years. The oppression of the South African races, at the hands of the British and the Dutch, are roots which belong to this terrible war. The past generation has seen no less than six South African Wars. It is a humiliating fact, account for it as we may, that the British nation appears to be incompetent, apart from the Gospel of Christ, to raise up what they call the "inferior races." Whether New Zealand, Australia, or South Africa be considered, our relation to the natives has been deplorable. We have plundered them of their lands and possessions, decimated them by our intoxicants, infected their women with disease, driven them back and down, so that

IN MANY CASES THEY ARE DYING OUT.

When I was in Capetown ten years since, the strongest brandy was being sold retail at 4d. per quart, and wine at 1d. per bottle. I shall never forget New Year's day in that city. Hundreds of coloured people, Hottentots and other natives, were to be seen in every stage of drunkenness. When I protested against the iniquity of the Cape Government in furnishing the scandalous facilities for buying these maddening spirits, it might be heard, "Oh, let the natives drink themselves to death, the sooner the better."

Take again the shameful traffic in hollands, and every vile compound in intoxicants which has been carried on for years on the West Coast of Africa.

We are mourning, as well we may, the loss of nearly 2,000 of England's sons, slain recently by the Boers; but who has had a word to say or mourning to make concerning the tens of thousands of Africans slain by this traffic? This has been going on for years amid

SCENES AKIN TO PANDEMONIUM.

Out of this vile traffic English, Dutch, and American capitalists have made, and are to-day making, huge fortunes. I presented the facts of this West Coast crime against the natives some years since to the British House of Commons. It was all in vain, and now, I doubt not, judgment in regard to these slaughtered thousands is being known. How England should hear the voice of righteous indignation was the question. The time, however, has come, and judgment is doing and will do her retributive work.

It is well known that the Boers went to the Transvaal purposely to fashion a Republic in which slavery should have free course. They are now reaping the early harvest of the wrath of God for this fundamental violation of his Word, that "as ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." They have treated the natives as beasts of burden, and have denied them their manhood rights, even the law of marriage. As regards the reverses which have been sustained by our forces, there has been with us a good deal of tampering with slavery in connection with the Kanaka labour traffic from the New Hebrides, and the enormous Chinese coolie traffic, of which Singapore has been for years the great receiving and export centre. Not a single year should be lost in examining and stopping these so-called labour traffics. They are closely allied to slavery.

The woe of the God of heaven is sounding out in notes of lamentation, judgment, and death, to all associations of unprincipled men who have torn the crown and glory of manhood from the native races, in order to make them beasts of burden, to the end that fortunes should be made, and gold and diamond values exalted far above made in the image of God.

In the judgment of many, nothing less than the wars in North and South Africa could have broken in pieces the oppressors. Moral suasion was not in it. As in the United States, war will become the deliverer of the slave. Those who to-day stand firmly for the freedom and protection of the native races are spoken of as "weak-headed sentimentalists," and certainly "not up to date."

Despite the weakening to which I have referred, our Government and our laws have been, and still are, in the main sound and on the side of liberty and righteousness. The throne of our gracious Queen is thus so far established. Herein is our strength and confidence. Though we are knowing rebuke and chastening, the position taken stands for liberty, just government, and peaceful progress in South Africa. In the interests of these foundation principles of freedom, England must be paramount and the Transvaal Republic overthrown.

The early successes of the Boers will turn out to be of exceeding value to the Imperial Government. They prove beyond all question that for years President Kruger and his Government have been arming to the teeth, and were prepared to overthrow the supremacy of Great Britain, even at the price of a distinct declaration of war. When the time of settlement comes, the Imperial Government will have a platform for action and strength, which the Boers themselves have fashioned, and which will stand for ever as a witness, that "there is a God that judgeth in the earth," and that He is against the Transvaal as a stronghold of slavery, cruelty, and oppression, despite the crude appeals of Oom Paul Kruger to the sacred Scriptures in order to find a sanction for holding the natives of South Africa as chattels and slaves.

In conclusion, I have not touched the political aspects of this question, and for this reason: The hand of God is behind all that is transpiring, so that Africa may be delivered from the curse of slavery. It is a well-known fact that for the first two years of the civil war in the States, the emancipation of the slave was not in the political programme. Abraham Lincoln and his Government intended compromise. The Eternal God meant freedom, and when Lincoln and his Government came in line with the will of God in this respect, victory rested with the Federal forces, and the freedom of the slave was the contemporary fact accompanying the overthrow of the Southern Confederacy.

The Indian Famine.

WRITING from the Medical Missionary Training Institution at Agra, Dr. Colin Valentine says:—"The famine is closing more and more tightly around us, and the suffering and misery are increasing. The sad thing is that they will continue to increase until the end of September, 1900. On Sunday, December 24, we had 2,502 poor creatures at our Beggars' Church. Many of them had come from the surrounding Native States. No rains have yet fallen; one looks forward to the hot season. The other day two women came to us and wished us to buy their three children. This, of course, we could not do, but we sent them with a servant to the nearest police station to make a deposition that they were placing the children in our care of their own accord. They grew so alarmed, however, at the inquiries made and the entering of the replies that they took fright and fled away. The examination was, of course, according to law, and the native official was really anxious that we should have the children. How difficult it seems to do good! Hundreds of famine children are picked up and carried away for evil purposes by wicked men and women who hover about these famine districts like unclean birds, and nothing is said about it."

In the Egyptian Delta.

IN a journal giving their experiences during travels in the Delta, Messrs. C. T. Hooper and A. T. Upson, of the North Africa Mission in Egypt, write:—"We left Alexandria on November 6, and after an express run of eighty miles to Tanta, and an additional slow journey of fifteen or twenty miles by local train, we arrived at the enterprising town of Shebin-el-Kom. As is well known, Egypt is divided into fourteen Mudeeriehs (provinces), eight in Upper Egypt and six in the Delta. One of the most fertile and pleasant of these provinces, that of Menoufieh, which we have just entered, lies between the East and West branches of the Nile near the apex of the Delta triangle. Its capital, where are found the Governmental buildings, residence of the Mudeer (governor); large jail, hospital, &c., is the town of Shebin-el-Kom, occupying a central and desirable position.

"Of the 650,000 inhabitants of the Menoufieh Province probably

SEVEN-EIGHTHS ARE MOSLEMS.

The town of Shebin itself contains 21,000, of whom 20,000 are followers of the false prophet, the odd 1,000 being principally representatives of the ancient Copts, with a few Roman Catholics and a fair number of Greeks. It is distressing to see large districts utterly devoid of a single Christian missionary.

"In Shebin there are many sheiks (or Mohammedan teachers), whose principal use to the people consists in their intervention in questions of marriage and divorce. They are utterly unable to render any spiritual help to their adherents, and never attempt any kind of pastoral work, even in their own peculiar tenets. There are also two coptic priests, who 'elevate the host,' or something akin to it, during the Sunday morning Mass at the Coptic Church. There are also two priests of the Greek Orthodox Church.

"We have secured a temporary house in which to receive visitors, and

TALK WITH THEM ON THE GOSPEL.

Here we must quietly live for the present to get better known and trusted by the people. Meantime, we are negotiating for a permanent mission house, which we hope to secure shortly. For the present our operations will consist principally of itinerating in the province. We hope to provide Arabic Gospels for careful distribution. There are sixty-six large villages in the one district of Shebin, each of which can be visited in the day. The question is brought home to us of providing good strong donkeys for this special work."

The Soldier's New Testament.

IN last week's issue, a timely piece of enterprise on the part of the Scripture Gift Mission was, in error, attributed to the Evangelical Alliance. How to secure a New Testament which, by reason of its distinctive features, would be a treasure to the soldier, and, in point of size, would secure the approval of the military authorities—that was the problem. It has been solved by the Scripture Gift Mission, and the resultant volume will assuredly be sought after by English-speaking soldiers and their friends in all parts of the world. The book will be about three-eighths of an inch in thickness, two and three-quarter inches across, and four and three-eighths inches long. The covers will be in red, white, and blue, and of these we give a sketch on a reduced scale.

This is the "Soldier's New Testament;" the name has the highest sanction, for in a prefatory note Lord Wolseley, Commander-in-Chief, writes: "In my opinion there could be nothing more suitable for the spiritual comfort of a soldier on active service than this Testament. The size permits him always to carry it in his khaki jacket pocket, and each soldier who possesses a copy will have something of far higher value to him than the proverbial marshal's bâton." The book is to contain fifty illustrations of Eastern life, of the kind used in the embellishment of all the publications of the Scripture Gift Mission. The undertaking is essentially of a mission character, for Christian workers will have the joy of distributing the books, to begin with, in South Africa among the rank and file of home and colonial forces, doctors, nurses, &c. Full particulars may be had from the secretary of the mission, Mr. W. Walters, 15, Strand, W.C.

Ex-Priests in Rome.

IN Italy, as in France, there are many priests who are ready to give up friends, kindred, position, even means of subsistence, for Christ's sake, in order to find the true light of the Gospel. For the succour of such a Home-Refuge has been opened in Rome. It provides a temporary home for men in soul trouble—a place where the helpless and perplexed may serve God according to their conscience, until suitable employment is found for them.

Encouraging accounts of the work have been sent lately by the acting secretary, Rev. H. Piggott. Every case received hitherto has proved satisfactory; by conduct and life in the Home, the inmates have given proof of sincerity, and, it is hoped, of enlightened conviction. One of these, who was secretary to his bishop, besides giving up, for his faith's sake, all that life held most dear, has had the keen, added trial of being obliged to deprive his aged parents of the assistance they were accustomed to receive from him as the parish priest, living under their own roof.

Mr. Piggott writes: "One great need at present is clothing for the inmates. They come with their priests' vestments on them, and some of them with nothing beside. Most of them have but scant provision to meet the wintry weather. Cast-off garments will be very welcome."

Parcels of clothing, if sent direct, will be gratefully received by the manager of the home (himself a priest thirty years ago), Signor Professor F. Calvi, 28, Via Palermo, Rome. Or they would be gladly forwarded by Miss Ward, Gottesruhe, Montalt Road, Woodford Green, N.E.

"Loved unto the End."

("Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?")

Thy love, O Christ, can never fail or change,
Time cannot lessen its deep, constant flow;
Thy friendship nought can alter or estrange,
"No separation" can thy loved ones know.
John xiii. 1. Romans viii. 35-39.

"Thou art the same"—"thy years shall never fail,"
Though generations rise and pass away;
Man's life is but the "telling of a tale,"
With Thee—"a thousand years are as a day."
Hebrews i. 12. 2 Peter iii. 8.

The century ebbs out: and we who stand
Upon the threshold of the dim unknown
Rest satisfied. Our "times are in thy hand:"
Thy love will "to the end" surround thine own.
Psalm xc. 1, 2. Psalm xxxi. 15.

Thou hast not failed us through the years now fled—
How often have we proved thy love and care!
Through life's deep waters Thou hast safely led,
Our burdens borne, and answered many a prayer.
Genesis xlviii. 15, 16. Joshua xxiii. 14.

We look around and miss the friends of yore
Whose love and kindness cheered us on our way,
Their homes (by strangers filled) "know them no more"—
Ere this year pass, we too may be "away."
2 Samuel xii. 23. Psalm ciii. 15, 16.

"But Thou remainest" ever present Friend,
Our Rock of Refuge when life's storms beat high:
'Tis on thy strength our weakness must depend,
Upon thine Arm thy weary ones rely.
Hebrews i. 11. 2 Chronicles xvi. 8, 9.

Like thy disciples in the days of yore
We oft distrust Thee, or deny thy Name,
Forsake or grieve Thee—and our love grows cold;
And yet, thy love to us remains the same.
Matt. xxvii. 56. John xx. 25-29.

"Thou lovest to the end"—O Saviour dear
We rest upon thy perfect, changeless Love;
Teach us to know Thee better year by year,
As more and more thy faithfulness we prove.
2 Chronicles xiv. 11. Philippians iii. 10, 11, 12.

Constrained by such great love, O may we give
Our time and talents, all we are, to Thee!
Thus be it only "Christ" henceforth "to live,"
And "gain to die," because "with Christ" to be.
2 Corinthians v. 14. Philippians i. 20, 21, 22.

PROFITS IN AID OF A PAROCHIAL FUND.

"Blessed be Egypt."—Under this title a quarterly magazine has recently been issued dealing, as the title may suggest, with Egyptian missionary work. It is admirably edited by Miss A. Van Sommer. The January number, which is the second of this welcome literary venture, contains much valuable information in addition to missionary news of various societies, and a number of spiritual articles. On the cover appears an appropriate and exquisitely drawn design by Miss Lilias Trotter. (3d. Marshall Bros.)

Japanese Sailors.—A number of Japanese sailors are now on their way to England to man and take home a new battleship which is being constructed here. They are due in London at an early date, and Miss McLean, who has so thoughtfully cared for former parties of these interesting visitors to our shores, appeals for further supplies of envelope-shaped book bags, twelve inches by ten, and of comforters and cuffs. Miss McLean has prepared a helpful paper, entitled "The Japanese Seamen's Friend," which will be amongst the contributions to the book bags. Address, Japanese Christian Institute, Dock Road, Tilbury Docks, Essex.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, January 28. Job xxvi.

THERE is a strong vein of sarcasm in Job's opening words. He taunts Bildad with the weakness of his answer, which had failed to bring him any comfort or inspiration. He then enters on eloquent descriptions of God's power, as manifested in the world of the departed (5, 6), on earth (7), in the sky (8-11), and in the heavens (13).

At first sight there may not seem to be much connection between these magnificent outbursts on God's power and the anguish of a breaking heart; and yet there is a very deep and strong connection, because all God's might is pledged on the behalf of his weary and suffering children.

Further, the evidences of God's wonderful working, which come under our cognizance, are only the extremities and circumference of his might; and, compared with the fulness of his power, they are as but a whispered word compared with the roll of the thunder. How obviously unfair it is to judge the part by the whole. The permission of sin and pain, the silence of God amid the blasphemies and contentions of his creatures, the moral problems of which the air is full—these are but parts of his ways, and it would be needful for us to understand all, to see the end from the beginning, to behold the complete pattern, before we could form a true idea of his wisdom, power, and love. Ah, sufferer, this is but part of God's dealings; wait till his work is perfected!

MONDAY, January 29. Job xxvii.

It is a sublime spectacle when a child of God, in the midst of afflictions and temptations which shake the soul to its foundations, still holds fast its integrity. We cannot command prosperity or health or the food of one of our fellows, but we can daily exercise ourselves, so that we may have a conscience void of offence towards God and man. We remember that Paul said that he had lived in all good conscience before God until that day—he held fast his righteousness, and would not let it go.

At the same time, we must ever admit that our own righteousnesses are as filthy rags. Though we may know nothing against ourselves, yet are we not thereby justified. It may be that our vision is very limited, or that we have not caught sight of God's infinite standard of purity. In any case there are sins enough about us in our coming short of the glory of God, which are sufficient to sink us into the bottomless pit, apart from the blood and righteousness of the Lord Jesus. In Him alone can we have a righteousness which shall avail before God.

Job remarkably repeats and endorses the views of Zophar and the rest concerning the Divine judgments which befall the wicked even in this life. There is a great deal which demands the (future) rectification and adjustment before the judgment-seat of God, as Job contended; but even here there is a great deal of just retribution. Job does not hesitate to admit this, though he refuses to admit that special suffering is inevitable and always retributory, or that it indicates the special sufferer as a special sinner.

Through what marvellous alternations the mind of man passes—now on the crest of the wave, and again in the trough, arguing, debating with itself, questioning; now antagonizing the position of its opponents, and again almost prepared to accept their opinions. This is a frequent experience; but be of good cheer, at eventide the light will break. "I have been within the gates," said one brave explorer, "and there is no dark valley."

TUESDAY, January 30. Job. xxviii.

A graphic and interesting account of ancient mining, as in those ancient times it was carried on in Idumea, the peninsula of Sinai, and Egypt. We learn from Genesis that even iron, the most difficult of metals, had been in use before the deluge (iv. 22). This description should be read in the R.V. The shaft into the earth, the miner's exile from the cheerful haunts of human life, the exposure of life to dangers from foul air, water, and the falling-in of the mine, are vividly portrayed. But the miner's search finally conquers every obstacle, and is rewarded by the nuggets of precious ore. Paul was a great miner, who said that he counted all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ. It was as though he went down into mines of pain and sorrow, of deprivation and neglect, that he might bring to light the treasures of God's wisdom and love, which enrich his pages.

But we must distinguish between a mere speculative and a personal knowledge of God. As to the former, it will ever elude us. It is hid from the eyes of all living, and kept close from the fowls of the air. Only God can know God. With whom did He take counsel, and who instructed Him? His ways are past finding out. But there is a practical, personal knowledge of God, which is within the reach of us all. "The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding." Of what use, to adopt the language of the Imitation, is it to be able to discourse profoundly and learnedly concerning the doctrine of the Trinity, if thou art wanting in the character which shall commend thee to the Trinity? Let us arise and mine for those treasures of wisdom and knowledge which are hidden in the Son of God.

WEDNESDAY, January 31. Job xxix.

What an exquisite portraiture of the godly man. Watched over by God, walking through darkness by his light, with his secret in his tent; amongst men, held in high honour and respect; in the council chamber, speaking words of weight and help; in relation to the poor and needy, so assiduous and careful, that the blessing of him who was ready to perish breathed through parched and pallid lips; whilst, in the humble cottage of the widow, songs welled up beneath his kindly touch. The wicked, foiled in his plans and robbed of his prey, might gnash on him with vain disappointment and chagrin; but all good men rejoiced in his growing prestige and power.

Are these traits yours? Why should they not be? If they characterized the patriarch, how much more should they be characteristic of those who live after the Day of Pentecost has given Christ to indwell by the Spirit!

After the course of happy years has sped, we think that we shall have a continuance of our prosperity. We say that we shall die in our nest, and that what has been will be. We have seen something of the same kind in our national life of late, a rooted belief that the prosperity which has attended our country must necessarily be continued. It seems impossible, we say, that a day which has been so unclouded should end in rain and storm. Ah, Lord God, it is only by thy favour that our mountain can stand strong; and if thy face is hid, nothing can stay the avalanche of trouble!

How sad it is when we say with Job, "Oh, that I were as in months past!" or sigh with Cowper—

> Where is the blessedness I knew?

To remember the music of a chord which was struck once, in the vestibule of life, and has been resounding ever since, and to be unable to recover it; to know that the waters no longer touch the rootlet, and the dew does not visit the branch—this is sorrow indeed which incites the prayer for God's reviving grace.

THURSDAY, February 1. Job xxx.

In contrast to the respect with which Job had been treated—the voice of the nobles was hushed when he spake, and the aged rose up and stood when he drew near—he describes the contumely to which he was exposed at the hands of young men whose fathers he would not have thought of employing. In vv. 2-8 he gives a vigorous description of the outcasts who deem themselves at liberty to heap on him their revilement. The common rabble rose against him now, and marred his path, and rolled in upon him as a sea through a wide breach. It is bitter when we lose the respect to which we had been accustomed!

At the sixteenth verse he turns from man to God, and begins again to reason. Disease lay heavy on him: it seemed as though God would not answer his cries. For some reason which he could not fathom, his Almighty Friend had turned to be cruel to him, and there seemed to be but one outlook—the grave. Ah! soul, there is One who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth, who has trodden on these burning cinders. The Man of Sorrows knew the sorrow of feeling forsaken by the Father. But it is only through such paths as this that thou canst reach the throne.

Loneliness is most apparent when we are in the company of those who misunderstand or dislike us. We may be companions of the ostriches of the desert when all around us are human voices. We drink the bitterest cup when the hoarse cry of "Crucify" rises from ten thousand throats. To sit alone is not loneliness; but to be hated by men is loneliness indeed. But even so, thou mayest say: "I am not alone, because the Father is with me."

FRIDAY, February 2. Job xxxi.

In this chapter, Job enumerates the sins of which his friends had accused him, and indignantly repudiates them. First, the sin of impurity or adultery (2-12); then, injustice in dealing with the servant, the poor, or the helpless (13-18); next, failure to minister help to those who needed it (19-23); next, sins of covetousness, idolatry, gladness at the destruction of an enemy, the refusal to welcome the stranger (24-32). One by one he shows that he could not have been guilty of sins like these; they were so utterly abhorrent to his inmost thought. Are we able to say with him, "My hands are clean"? Methinks there are many Christians who are not able to speak with this assurance of their own integrity. And let it be borne in mind that the Patriarch here accounts as sin the not-doing. In this way Job anticipates the words of our Lord, "Inasmuch as ye did it not . . . depart."

In v. 33 Job suggest that to cover our transgression because we fear the multitude, to keep silence and to hide ourselves within the door of privacy, would be an aggravation of our sin. Spiritual snapshots are constantly being taken of us in every attitude and situation of our lives, and there is only one way in which they can be obliterated—namely, by a frank confession to God and man. This wipes the sensitive plate clean, so that our sin is as though it were not.

SATURDAY, February 3. Job xxxii.

Elihu is young, talented, eloquent. He can no longer contain himself. His wrath is kindled against Job because of his persistence in self-justification, and against the friends because their reasonings revolved so small a compass, held by so short a tether. There are many things in his opening words which are well worth pondering by those who have the gift of speech.

First. Silence is golden. Hold back till the moment is ripe. Your turn will come.

Second. Be sure to inbreathe the Spirit of the Almighty. Drink it in as one long imprisoned in a sick chamber inhales the breath of the salt sea. Third. Be humble. Do not vaunt yourself because they who are most sure of having found wisdom are most likely to be vanquished, and shown to be fools.

Fourth. If you desire to be full of words, let the Spirit constrain you. Open heart and mind to the impulse of the love of Christ. Remember, it is written that when the Apostles were filled with the Holy Spirit they began to speak as the Spirit gave them utterance. When the sap is in the branch it will reveal itself in fruit. The important thing is not in the words we may speak, but in the Spirit which is stirring within us. Too many consider the form in which they express the truth, instead of becoming inspired by the truth itself.

Fifth. Be sure not to speak flattering words, or to respect any man's person. Remember how the Apostle reminds us that if we do this we cannot call ourselves servants of God (1 Thess. ii. 4).

The Guild of the Brave Poor Things.

"BUT what is the Guild you talk of?" cry the uninitiated. "What does it mean?" At first it must be owned it does sound rather a strange title; but if we look a little deeper we shall see how apt the name is. The idea is taken from a story by the well-known child writer—Mrs. Ewing.

It tells of a little boy (one of a long line of gallant soldiers) who, when he is about six years old, is fired with the idea of becoming a soldier by the camp settling near their home. He cherishes the hope till one fatal "field day," when he meets with an accident, which makes him a cripple for life. The story goes on to tell of Leonard's bitter disappointment at the failure of all his plans, but at last he learns from his mother that "the courage to bear and the courage to dare are one and the same thing;" and that, if he will enlist in the Army where the Captain is the Lord Jesus Christ, and fight bravely and manfully, despite his pain, it will be even a nobler thing than if he had fought for his country and died on the battlefield.

Leonard makes a "roll of honour" for those who are afflicted in any way, and yet are brave in their sufferings; he has the motto of their house inscribed in it: Lætus sorte meâ (Happy in my lot), and called it the "Book of the Poor Things." Hence the name of the Guild. Sister Grace (now of the Bermondsey Settlement) founded it in the summer of 1894, at the West London Mission. Since then branches have formed in Brighton, Bristol, Grimsby, and many other places. Members are visited in their homes, and helped in times of sickness and need; tickets are given for surgical appliances, and letters for the various hospitals.

The only qualification for membership is suffering in some form—the blind, lame, crippled, or maimed are always welcomed—and to try and lighten the load of these men, women, and children who have thus fallen by the way, is one object of the Guild. The general method of working the Guilds is the same, though the details necessarily differ with the circumstances.

The Tug of War hymn (so-called because in Mrs. Ewing's story the soldiers "pull over" the organ and the choir) is: "The Son of God goes forth to war," and is sung at all Guild meetings.

Indeed, the keynote of the Guild may be said to be struck in the second verse:

> Who best can drink his cup of woe
> Triumphant over pain,
> Who patient bears his cross below,
> He follows in his train.

And some of the very smallest seem to catch the spirit of it. One little cripple girl, who often had to bear terrible pain in her back, was asked what it meant to be "lætus." "Oh, it means I mustn't cry till mother's round the corner!" she replied; and the heroism one sees among these suffering ones is wonderful.

Weekly or fortnightly meetings are held in some bright room, gaily decorated with flags and the banner of the Guild, inscribed with Lætus sorte meâ. The brave, poor things form such a merry party that it is difficult to believe that a great number are blind, others crippled, and all disabled in some way. There being no restriction as to age, there are tiny child members and old men and women on the roll-call, all knit together by the common bond of suffering, showing a very kindly fellow-feeling for each other, for sometimes a blind member will wheel a lame one, thus following out the helpfulness the Guild teaches. The blind are taught different handicrafts, the favourite one being basket-weaving, the children paint, make paper-flowers, or play with toys, while the women knit and talk among themselves.

Shortly before the close, the books and toys are put away, and those who are not too crippled or stiff stand for the tug-of-war hymn. This is followed by a few earnest words from a clergyman, minister, or some friend who is interested in the work, and the afternoon closes with the Lord's Prayer or Benediction. The Guild is entirely unsectarian, and the workers for a time sink their differences of creed; and, in trying to bring out the true notes in the "still, sad music of humanity," the jarring discords, which so often spoil life's music, are not heard.

The Guild days are the bright patches of colour in their very colourless lives, and though the workers are glad enough that they should be so, they would do more for them than give them a pleasant afternoon once a week; they would have them all soldiers of the Cross, fighting under the banner of the Great Captain of our Salvation.

> Oh, may thy soldiers, faithful, true, and bold,
> Fight as the saints who nobly fought of old,
> And win, with them, the victor's crown of gold!

SPHINX.

The Home of Industry.

THE guests at our New Year's gathering were those amongst whom we labour all the year round, claiming the promise, "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy." It was with pleasure that we gazed into the faces of about 200 of our widows and members of our adult Bible classes, and felt that, with many, the teaching of God's Word, "Line upon line, and precept upon precept" had had effect. It was a loud acclaim of praise which opened and closed their happy evening.

The resident workers were fewer than usual, some being away for rest, and others nursing sick kindred, but the Lord supplied the needed service. One kind helper was Mr. George Clarke, from Tientsin, and two others were young missionaries, one a former member of our family at the training home en route from Toronto to Africa, to labour in an industrial mission in the Soudan.

Mr. W. R. Lane, who gave the address, with a tender heart and a burning love for souls, took no deep portion of Scripture to expound, but gave the story of "Christie's Old Organ," singing verse by verse as he told out the story of the Cross. Mr. Clarke followed, in his own original way, bringing his illustrations from the far-away land of China. It was a bright and happy evening, and we had but one wish—that all who had contributed to it could have heard the expressions of gratitude.

"Were there no men present in the audience?" Yes, a few, who with their wives are regular attendants at our Gospel services—some Christians, and others in whom we trust a work of grace has been begun. The last man, on leaving the hall, came up very shyly and offered his hand, introducing his wife. This was indeed a joyful surprise. Tears came to our relief, for memory aided in recalling incidents of thirty years ago, when this man was, while in drink, the terror of Flower and Dean Street. Last May, as he stood one Sunday morning in the open-air service in Bird Fair, listening to the testimonies of our young men as to what the Lord had done for them, the Holy Spirit convicted him of sin. Soon after he yielded himself to the Lord, and desired to live an honest life; but without a character who would give him work? A Christian employer, a large contractor, took him as a stonemason, and now he once more has that sacred spot called "home," and his wife is in our mothers' meeting.

Reduction of Working Hours.—It is interesting to note from the Board of Trade Labour Gazette, just issued, that the tramwaymen in the employment of the London County Council have had their working days reduced from seven to six per week, and that, in the case of the tramwaymen of Liverpool, there has been a reduction of twelve hours per week. The West Ham Corporation, too, have adopted the eight hours day as regards their servants, 600 in number. In the case of close upon 30,000 workpeople throughout the country there has been an average reduction of between three and four hours per week. Undoubtedly all this must lead to a kindlier feeling between employers and employed, and it is hoped that it will be to the spiritual and mental, as well as the physical advantage of the men.

The Welsh Forward Movement.

THE record of the Welsh Forward Movement is one of remarkable spiritual progress. Started, as many will remember, some eight years since, in a borrowed tent, in one of the most neglected districts of Cardiff, its rapid growth, as well as its sound character, is a matter for deep thankfulness.

Within the space of eight years no less than thirty-five mission centres have been established in the midst of thickly-populated districts, reaching and influencing for good very many people whom ordinary church methods left untouched.

From many quarters the directors receive fervent appeals to commence fresh missions. Among the places that have cried loudest and longest is Cathays, a division of Cardiff, and reputed to be growing faster than any other district in Great Britain. It is separated from other parts of Cardiff by the Taff Vale railway on the one hand and the Rhymney railway on the other. Here, it is calculated, there are at least 17,000 non-church-goers. The committee of the movement have been hoping for over seven years to commence work in this neighbourhood, but the lack of funds, and inability to secure a suitable site on which to erect a large hall and schoolroom, have hitherto rendered any action in the matter impossible.

Some fifteen months since, however, an excellent site was secured from a builder on payment to him of his out-of-pocket expenses; for he had already commenced to build. Next, the missioners proceeded to prepare the people for the proposed new hall. "We began," says Rev. John Pugh, the enthusiastic general superintendent, "by securing and fitting up two mission rooms, and engaging part of a house. These places are situate to the east, west, and north of the proposed new hall. For Roath Park we hired and furnished a long room to hold 300, over some stables; for the Heath, a part of a house; and for Lower Cathays we hired, fitted up, and furnished some outhouses connected with the Universal Club, which until recently was one of the most notorious in Cardiff. Thus we have turned a part of the premises that were once a source of evil into a place of blessing. And truly the change has already been marvellous. The club is situated in the darkest spot in Cathays. It has several large rooms, and is considered very suitable for a Home for Friendless Girls. There is sufficient room also to build a Gospel Hall at the rear."

Another very needy district is The Heath, separated from Cathays by the Cardiff cemetery. There is not one place of worship or mission-hall in this working-class district, but there is a huge hotel and a military barracks. At the earnest request of many of the poor neglected people a site has been secured, and it is proposed, if funds are forthcoming, to proceed with the erection of a school-house to hold 350 persons. The cost will be £700. Communications may be addressed to Rev. J. Pugh, 129, Claude Road, Cardiff.

The Churches of New York.—The official reports of the Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, and the Dutch Reformed Churches in New York for 1899 show that all of them lost in membership of both churches and Sunday Schools. In Brooklyn the Presbyterians made a slight gain, but they lost in all the other boroughs, their total falling off being 636. Their loss in Sunday School membership was close on 3,000. The Methodists made all their losses in Manhattan and the Bronx, as they gained slightly in all the other boroughs. Their net falling off was 1,510. The net gain in Church membership of the seven religious bodies in New York last year was 9,139. Sunday Schools in these bodies show a decrease of 3,390, the Lutherans alone making any considerable gain. Congregationalists increased 1,000, but Episcopalians only 300.

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

FOURTEENTH WEEK OF MEETINGS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

ON Sabbath morning of last week (January 14) Rev. John McNeill resumed work in connection with the campaign, preaching in St. Vincent Parish Church (Rev. J. Bell Henderson). When intimating the arrangements for the mission, he called on Christians to let everything else stand that could be made to stand. The need was great. Every part of the city must be rising or sinking; and there could be no denying that whole parts of Glasgow are sinking. "We cannot," he said, "allow that to go unchallenged, and our challenge is the meaning of the campaign. It is a challenge to the unbelief, the ungodliness, the prayerlessness, the materialism, and the animalism which are threatening to sink us. The Church, in one sense, stands defeated. . . Positions are not being carried. I am not speaking with one atom of despair; but it is the part of true wisdom to face facts, and the facts of Glasgow to-day are dismal enough."

The subject of the sermon was, "The Woman who Touched the Hem of his Garment" (Mark v.). Pointing out that this wonderful chapter contains an epitome of the whole problem represented by human sin, and the power of Jesus Christ to solve it: "In the beginning you have the madman; in the middle this woman with the weary, wasting trouble; and in the end the little girl who was dead altogether." "Sin in some is like in others it is like the death of the little girl. But in most it is represented by this woman. They are not notorious sinners, not abandoned. Like this woman's trouble, it is a secret, hidden, clinging curse, which they cannot laugh, or dance, or dream away, or drown in business."

Mr. McNeill makes a practice, in common with the other evangelists, of preaching on Sabbath mornings to the congregations in whose churches he is advertised to speak during the week. These opportunities are carefully taken advantage of for the stirring up of the members to service, and for dealing with any who may have back-slidden; but in addition they enable the mission preacher to reach with his Gospel call a number who cannot or will not attend the special services. In the evening Mr. Bell Henderson improved the occasion by speaking on "The Evangelistic Compaign: what it is, and how to profit by it."

YOUNG MEN AND WOMEN.

The meetings for young men and women in Renfield Street United Presbyterian Church, at nine o'clock in the evening, began on Monday, and were crowned with success from the very outset. Open-air meetings in the ordinary sense were impossible in front of the Church, on account of the constant traffic; but a small choir took up a position on the steps, and attracted many by their singing, while at intervals invitations were given to all within hearing. When the meeting opened, there was a large gathering of what Mr. McNeill described afterwards as "the right sort." The audience was mixed, but young men were in an overwhelming majority—a well-dressed, well-mannered, careless crowd. We do not remember seeing so few Bibles in use at a Scottish religious service—only three or four, one of which was in the pulpit. But canes and walking-sticks filled the stands, and the naturalness with which certain utterances were applauded proved how many were more accustomed to gatherings different from church services.

As Mr. McNeill had another meeting at St. Vincent Parish Church each evening at eight o'clock; the minister of the church (Rev. Andrew Forrest) conducted the opening exercises. A deep hush fell on the audience as Miss Gladstone sang "There is a green hill far away." When Mr. McNeill arrived he expressed his pleasure at the excellent start that had been made. He intended, he said, to preach each evening from 9.15 to 9.50, and he hoped they would make this known among young men who perhaps had to long sermons. The Christians were asked to busy themselves for half an hour before each meeting along the line from Charing Cross to Argyle Street, inviting the strollers to come.

The opening subject—"The Story of the Three Crosses" (Luke xxiii.)—carried the work at once into the heart of the Great Theme—Sin and Salvation; and without preliminary the preacher struck right into his subject: "I. The Left Hand Cross—with the thief dying in his sin. II. The Right Hand Cross—with the thief dying out of his sin. III. On the Central Cross—the pale, pinched Man dying for sin." Mr. McNeill gained the ear of the meeting when he declared that, as in the case of the impenitent thief, the crowning sin of to-day is unbelief—cold-blooded rejection. Picturing the terrible scene, with its lights and shadows, he showed that the turning point in the penitent man's career came when he revolted at the blasphemy of his companion, and denounced vehemently the use of foul language, which is such a blot on our commercial and manufacturing life. The point appealed so directly to the hearers that they almost unconsciously broke out into

A ROUND OF APPLAUSE.

Many heard the Gospel preached that evening who had not done so for long. At a short after-meeting, Mr. McNeill asked the workers to be much in prayer for him in this special effort. When we left, at a late hour, he was still busy trying to make the way more plain to three gentlemanly young fellows who had remained for the purpose.

Tuesday evening proved that there were greater things to follow. Besides the idlers on the streets, it began to be apparent that a mission at that hour would appeal to and reach the great class of shopkeepers, who cannot attend under ordinary circumstances except on Sunday. There was great power in the gathering. One young man seated near us, much to their surprise, declined to leave with two lady friends beside him, and kept his seat until an elderly worker was able to reach him, when he immediately showed that he was determined there and then to close with the offer of salvation. Others were scattered over the church, and there was no lack of experienced leaders to help them.

REV. HENRY MONTGOMERY (BELFAST).

On the Sabbath evening we joined the congregation of the Evangelical Union Church (Rev. William Dunlop) in Nelson Street, where the evangelist was Rev. Henry Montgomery, of Belfast. Rev. Dr. James Wells (Pollokshields Free Church) presided, and Gospel songs were sung by Miss Montgomery.

At the opening Mr. Montgomery addressed the Christians on the present condition of our large cities. There might not be very much pronounced infidelity, but there was a very great deal of practical heathenism. "What is wanted is a quickened church, with the sympathy of the Lord Jesus Christ for the lapsed multitudes." He felt the importance of stirring up the Christians wherever he went. "If the half-blessed Christians were awakened, there would be a revival of which both heaven and hell would hear." After having walked through the district surrounding the church, he declared that he had never seen a neighbourhood in any city in the world more needy yet more hopeful. The sermon was on

BLIND BARTIMEUS.

I. "He knew he was blind." The scene was vividly pictured, and the application of it to sin was faithfully made. "II. He wanted to get rid of his old life. Many are kept back now, because they are not willing to have done with the old life. III. There is still the multitude, not to help but to hinder."

An after-meeting was held for the fresh surrender of God's people, and nearly 200 remained behind. Dealing first with anxious inquirers, Mr. Montgomery told in simple words the story of his own coming to know the Lord Jesus Christ. He owed nearly everything to his mother's prayers; but the text most used was John iii. 36. The thought came to him that he must be at one part or other of the verse. After nearly two years of darkness, he saw that salvation was not by feeling but by faith. A friend had asked him if this verse were not a fact, whether he believed it or not, and he assented. Then seeing that he was seeking salvation, and believed that Jesus was able to give it, his friend asked again if it did not seem pretty plain that he must have it. Some time later he saw a man who was nearly drowned rescued by another man with a buoy and a rope; and the simple fact that the rescued man gave all his thanks to the one who pulled him in, without looking at the rope, taught Mr. Montgomery his final lesson. He had been thinking about his faith, rather than about the Master; and learned not to think so much of the rope as of the Man at the end of the rope.

Mr. Montgomery addressed the meetings from January 11 to 17, the remaining dates of the fortnight being taken by Mr. James Marshall. Among other song-preachers besides Miss Montgomery were Mr. J. R. D. McAusland and Mr. Gillespie.

IN THE NORTHERN DISTRICT.

From Cowcaddens Free Church the centre of operations in the northern division has been moved to Cambridge Street Baptist Church; and, on visiting it last week, we were warmly greeted by the pastor (Rev. Edward Last), and the evangelist, Rev. James Mursell, of London. There was a bright, hearty meeting. The congregation is noted as a centre of Christian endeavour and other forms of Christian activity, with a large band of earnest, devoted young men and women ready for any branch of service. The district is not favourable for large audiences, but by well-planned and attractive open-air services the Gospel is being carried in song and testimony to those who will not come to the church. Although the attendance inside was largely made up of Christians, there was also evidence of that most effective of all methods in doing Christian work—the seeking out and bringing along of "the ones and twos." The meetings are growing, and the workers are full of faith for much greater things than they have yet seen ere the Mission comes to a close. As an evidence of the widespread oneness of spirit in this work, we may mention that we found the choir on the platform for several of the evenings to be that of the neighbouring Renfield Free Church Mission. Mr. Mursell's addresses were of a deeply-spiritual type, with faithful dealing on the subject of sin and its consequences.

WINNING THE CHILDREN.

A hearty greeting awaited us at Renwick Free Church (Rev. J. Fairley Daly), Cumberland Street, where Mr. Thomas M. Pratt has has had a successful mission among children. Night after night the church was filled, and the excellence of the order, as well as the quiet spirit of the meetings, impressed us all through. Patiently and simply the essential doctrines of Christianity were explained in words suited to the youthful understanding. When asked what constituted the Pilgrim's burden, the children were sure it was "sin," and it was a new idea to learn that it was "the knowledge or sense of sin and the fear of wrath." On Friday we met with those present who had been spoken to during the week, and noted an earnest spirit with perfect naturalness of demeanour.

THE LATE

Rev. Samuel Chapman,

OF MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

WHEN, one day last autumn, the cable flashed a message from Australia that Samuel Chapman was dead, the news brought a sad heart-pang to many in this land. We all have our heroes, and Mr. Chapman was one of ours. His extreme modesty led him to shrink from putting himself forward, and kept him from being known to an even larger circle than that in which he moved.

By many he was looked upon as one of the great Gospel preachers of our time, and some of the sermons he preached in Scotland a quarter of a century ago still live in the memory of those who heard them, and have been an inspiration through all the intervening years. Well do we remember taking a leading worker to hear Mr. Chapman preach in the autumn of 1874. The blank look on our friend's face is with us yet, as, after the service, he asked the writer, "Is it possible that you can have attended that man's ministry for four years without being converted?" The thing seemed impossible to him, and well it might, for Mr. Chapman's was a mighty, converting ministry.

SAMUEL CHAPMAN was born in Sheffield sixty-eight years ago. At the age of fifteen he left school and entered business in his native city. He had a thorough training in commercial life, which stood him in good stead in his ministerial work. At twenty-four he was baptized on profession of his faith in Christ. Four years later—in the historic 1859—he decided to relinquish a business career and devote his life to the ministry of the Gospel. Some years were spent in seeking a fuller equipment, first at Edinburgh University, and afterwards at Rawdon College, near Leeds, in both of which institutions he proved himself an eager and successful student.

His first pastorate was in Heneage Street, Birmingham, where he continued six years, and where his ministry was very largely blessed. Whilst in Birmingham he formed intimate friendships with the late Rev. Charles Vince and Dr. R. W. Dale, friendships which he greatly valued, and which were only terminated by death. A short pastorate in Rochdale followed, and in 1870 Mr. Chapman took up residence in Glasgow as colleague and successor of the late Dr. James Paterson, in Hope Street Church. Here he continued seven years, and no pen could adequately tell of the blessing that attended that ministry. Hundreds, if not thousands, were brought to Christ directly through Mr. Chapman's preaching, and some of those converts proved the brightest and best Christians we have ever known. Well does the writer remember waiting his turn with some twenty others, one Wednesday night, at the door of the pastor's room, each of the company being desirous either to enquire as to the great matter of personal salvation, or to make confession of faith in Christ.

This for a long time was a weekly occurrence, and for years it was a regular matter, after the Lord's Day evening service, to find eight, ten, or twelve men and women anxiously seeking the Saviour. The remembrance of those days makes one's heart burn; and how one sighs and cries to see such times again! During Mr. Chapman's ministry at Hope Street, the church increased from some 300 to over 700 members, and the old building had to be pulled down and a much larger one built in Bath Street.

But Mr. Chapman was no mere evangelist; he was a man in whom the gift of the teacher was combined with that of the evangelist in an uncommon degree. As an expositor of Scripture, he was very strong, clear, and original. He was a thinker, and he thought to most excellent and helpful purpose. How the memory pictures him in the pulpit, with the Bible tilted on end and his arms crossed over it, as he brought out some fine point of doctrine! How he used to expound the views of the various commentators, and finally gave his own view, which usually seemed to his hearers to be best.

When, in 1877, owing to the condition of Mrs. Chapman's health, he found it needful to resign his charge and proceed to Australia, hundreds of hearts felt his going like a personal bereavement. He took up the pastoral charge of the principal Baptist Church in Melbourne —Collins Street—and there he has ministered with conspicuous success and blessing for the last twenty-two years. Four times he has been elected to fill the presidential chair of his denomination; and, indeed, he has for long been looked up to as a kind of Nonconformist "Bishop" throughout the colony. The position he gained in the estimation of all sections of the Church is abundantly evidenced by the long and appreciative notices which have appeared in many of the Colonial papers and magazines, both religious and secular.

Mr. Chapman took little part in matters outside the proper sphere of the ministry of the Gospel. He did not consider it part of his work to be an election agent, a political propagandist, or a caterer for the amusement of the people. His pulpit was his throne, and truly, when he stood there, he was a king amongst men. His whole being revelled in preaching the Gospel of the grace of God. How he rejoiced in signs of revival and spiritual blessing, and how heavy was his heart when there seemed to be dearth of such "signs following!" No measure of outward prosperity could ever satisfy him apart from the signs of the Holy Spirit's working.

Foreign missions occupied a large place in his heart, and he most unstintedly gave his valued help, not only to the missions of his own denomination, but to such missions as the China Inland and the Poona and Indian Village Missions. In the councils of these missions he was as a pillar of strength, and his spiritual sagacity and clear-headed business common-sense were of the greatest value. When, seven years ago, he paid a visit to the homeland, he returned viâ America and China, and spent some time visiting the stations of the Inland Mission, visits lovingly remembered by many of the missionaries to whom he was made a blessing. A number of years ago a great stimulus came into his life, and he was brought to know the experience of Christ's indwelling in a measure and degree that he had not known before. Habits that had become like second nature to him were seen to be hindrances, and were gladly renounced for Christ's sake. About that time the Geelong Convention was commenced, and Mr. Chapman was one of its principal promoters, and, as long as health permitted, its able chairman. Some of the addresses he gave at Geelong have made history in the hearts and lives of many who heard them.

One chief secret of the great blessing that attended his ministry lay in the fact that, beyond many, he was a man of prayer. He delighted in special and prolonged seasons of prayer. For a long time he was accustomed to meet weekly with a "band" of like-minded men for a "half-night" of prayer. These were seasons when he and others got very near to God, and real business was done at the Throne of Grace.

The hope of the imminence of the Lord's coming again was very real and joyous to him, and in his letters he continually referred to it.

For some years Mr. Chapman suffered from an affection of the heart, and for five months previous to his death he was confined to bed; but, although experiencing great weakness and weariness, it is a comfort to his friends to know that he had very little actual pain. On Lord's Day morning, September 10, the end came very quietly. His funeral was attended by a great concourse of people; and, at his own request, the "Hallelujah Chorus" was made to take the place usually occupied by the "Dead March" in Saul, which would surely have been most inappropriate. Mr. Chapman is survived by his wife, six daughters, and two sons.

With painful interest, the writer received a letter from Mr. Chapman, dictated a few days before his home-going, with the request that it should not be sent till after he was gone. In it he said:—"I think I have received my marching orders, but am not sure. In any case I want to send you the signal that thrilled our hearts in the by-gone days. 'Hold the fort, for He is coming. All glory to his name!' Hearty love to all who love the Lord."

The Nurses' National Total Abstinence League has for its object the union and encouragement of nurses in the advancement of temperance, by example and influence upon those with whom their duties bring them into contact. The Society is federated to the W.T.A.U., and although only formed in 1897, it has made considerable progress. Many nurses are ennobling their calling by conferring upon morally weak patients such comfort and encouragement as will aid in the rescue of those who have fallen through strong drink. Copies of two booklets, "Questions for Nurses," and "Reasons for joining the League," with further information, may be obtained from the secretary, Miss Hilda Dillon, 47, Oakley Street, Chelsea, S.W.

Mr. Moody's "Coronation Day."

A Tribute.

BY HIS SON, MR. W. R. MOODY.

FOR forty-six years my father had been a partaker of the Divine life, and the transition from the seen world to the unseen, from the sphere of the temporal to that of the eternal, was no interruption in the life with which we were familiar. For nearly half a century his one aim in life has been to do the will of God, and with characteristic readiness he responded to God's summons. Only a few days before his going, in conversation about some future plans, he referred to the possibility of his life-work being nearly completed. In reply to my remonstrance and attempt to encourage him, he said: "I'm not discouraged.

THERE'S LOTS OF HARD WORK

left in me yet, I believe. I want to live as long as I'm useful, but when my work is done I want to be up and off."

On November 17 father broke down in Kansas City in the midst of one of the best missions he ever had. God had tried his servant in many ways; but, after sixty-two years of an unusually active life, with the remembrance of not more than one or two days of slight illness, to be suddenly laid aside to wait patiently and in extreme weakness for God's will, was indeed a severe test. But in this he was found "not wanting," and it was with a sense of exultant and victorious joy that he entered the joy of his Lord, and heard the words, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

No man loved his family and life-work more devotedly, and frequently I have heard him say,

"LIFE IS VERY SWEET TO ME, and there is no position of power or wealth that could tempt me from the throne God has given me." It was not that he was tired of life, and wanted to be done with service, that made him so ready to leave, for he knew the joy of Christian service such as few have experienced. The final summons came suddenly to us all. I heard him speaking in slow and measured words suddenly, and he was saying, "Earth is receding; heaven is opening before me." The first impulse was to try to arouse him from what I thought to be a dream. "No, this is no dream, Will," he replied. "It is beautiful. It is like a trance. If this is death, it is sweet. There is no valley here. God is calling me, and I must go."

Meanwhile the nurse was summoning the family, and the physician, who had spent the night in the house. Father continued to talk quietly on, and seemed to speak from another world his last message to the loved ones he was leaving. "I have always been an ambitious man," he said—"ambitious to leave no wealth or possessions, but to leave lots of work for you to do. You will carry on Mount Hermon. Fitt* will look after the Institute; Paul will take up the Seminary when he's older, and Ambert† will help you in the business details." Then it seemed as though he saw beyond the veil, for he exclaimed: "This is my triumph;

THIS IS MY CORONATION DAY!

I have been looking forward to it for years." Then his face lit up, and he said, in a voice of joyful rapture, "Dwight! Irene!—I see the children's faces," referring to the two little grandchildren God had taken from our home in the past year. Then, as he thought he was losing consciousness, he said, "Give my love to them all." Mother then came into the room, and he exclaimed, "Mamma, you have been a good wife to me!" and with that he became unconscious.

In half an hour, however, he revived. Again he talked with us about the work to be done, assigning to the sons the Northfield Schools and to his daughter and her husband the Chicago Bible Institute. Then, in answer to what mother's charge would be, he said, "Oh, mother is Eve, mother of all the living." To the urgent plea that he should remain longer with his family, he said: "I'm not going to throw my life away. I'll stay as long as I can, but if my time is come I'm ready."

Then a new thought seemed to possess him, and he exclaimed: "I'm not at all sure but that God may perform a miracle and raise me up.

I'M GOING TO GET UP.

If God wants to heal me by a miracle that way, all right; and if not I can meet death in my chair as well as here." Then, turning to one of us who was applying warm cloths, he said: "Here, take those away. If God is going to perform a miracle we don't want them, and the first thing I suppose we should do will be to discharge the doctor." He did not insist on this, however, but was determined on getting up, and could not be dissuaded. He then walked across the room to an easy chair, where he sat down for a few moments. A second sinking turn left him exhausted, and he was willing to return to bed, where he remained, quietly awaiting the end, for an hour. To the very last he was thinking of those about him and considering them. Turning to mother, only a little while before he left, he said, "This is rough on you all, and in this way. It is hard to be kept in such anxiety." The last time the doctor approached to administer an injection, he looked at him in a questioning and undecided way, and said perfectly naturally: "Doctor, I don't know about this. Do you think it best? It is only keeping the family in anxiety."

I'M SORRY TO DISTRESS YOU

In a few moments more another sinking turn came, and from it he awoke in the presence of Him whom he loved and served so long and devotedly. It was not like death, for he fell on sleep quietly and peacefully, and it was not hard to imagine his reception in that other world among the hosts of loved ones awaiting his coming.

AUTHORIZED BIOGRAPHIES.

The announcement of publication of a number of biographies of D. L. Moody has forced the family to deny that any such will have their authorization or co-operation. Although Mr. Moody was steadfastly opposed to any biographical notices during his life, he knew it could not be avoided after his death, and a few years ago expressed the wish that his eldest son, W. R. Moody, should undertake it, in order that many false statements now current might be corrected.

The family have a large number of private letters, as well as photographs, and other material, which will be reserved for the only authorized biography. The request is made to friends all over the world, who can contribute authentic material, to send it to W. R. Moody, East Northfield, Mass.

Memorial Services.

AMERICAN papers to hand during the past few days contain many articles in honour of the late D. L. Moody, including appreciations of his character, and tributes to his usefulness as an evangelist and philanthropist. Several memorial meetings, representative of the Christian Church at large, have been held, at which words have been spoken that altogether agree with the warm terms in which friends in Great Britain have described the great loss sustained. One of these services, held in the on January 8, was an immense demonstration of feeling and interest. Not long ago, Mr. Moody preached the Gospel in the spacious building; now five or six thousand persons assembled to thank God for his life and ministry. On the platform were dozens of ministers of the Gospel, and others who have been identified with the work to which the evangelist devoted his life. Mr. William E. Dodge, who was always a great admirer of his honoured friend, presided, and, at his suggestion, the service opened with one of Mr. Moody's favourite hymns: "In the Cross of Christ I glory." Mr. Ira D. Sankey led the singing. The Scripture was read by Rev. Dr. Pierson, and, after prayer by Rev. John Balcom Shaw, Mr. Dodge gave an address.

In the whole history of the Church of Christ, said he, few men can be found who have and influenced so many lives as the man whom they had assembled to remember. It is no exaggeration to say that if all who knew and loved him answered the summons to these services in his memory it would take a hall ten times as large as that to hold them. "There is not to be a note of sadness or a touch of funereal gloom in our service. We are only here to thank God for such a life, and to pray that the influence of it may continue. He is not dead; he has merely gone to a better life."

Proceeding, Mr. Dodge said that Mr. Moody's theology was simple, in the words of John iii. 16, and his creed was God. He carried God's message all over the world. "Two great influences came into his early life, and continued to direct him ever afterwards. One was the companionship and brotherhood of the Young Men's Christian Association, and the other, an even greater and stronger influence, was his study of the Bible. He had the idea at first that if God wanted him for his work he would put words in his mouth, and so his early efforts were failures, and his addresses were repetitions of one another. A benevolent gentleman talked with him, and told him that what he needed to do was to go and

STUDY THE BIBLE.

Mr. Moody followed the advice with the greatest intensity. He got from it an arsenal of fact, promise and warning, which he had used with magnificent power. His was the most intense and superb enthusiasm that I ever knew; but it was tempered with marvellous common-sense. He had a wonderful intuitive knowledge of men. He was a great preacher, but those who knew him well knew that in his personal talks lay his greatest power. The most powerful sermon I ever heard from him was one night, just after midnight, when we were walking along Madison Avenue together, and a man came up to us and asked Mr. Moody how he should go about it to accept Christ. In a few concise, clear-cut sentences, Mr. Moody put the truth to that man, so that there was no getting away from it, and the man became a Christian then and there."

Rev. Wilton Merle Smith said Mr. Moody was a hard-driven man—hard driven of God. The greatness in him, which topped everything else, was the God-power.

Rev. Dr. T. L. CUYLER spoke of the departed evangelist as an extraordinary and unique Gospel preacher. "To him was allowed the privilege of pouring the Gospel into more human hearts than any man that ever lived. If you ask me to mention the names of that ever lived, men who worked their way from obscurity to positions where they were of service to the world, men whom our boys should study, I should unhesitatingly say, Abraham Lincoln and Dwight L. Moody. God called both of these men from humble homes to do his work.

"Moody's great heart, fired as it was with the love of Jesus, gave to his very utterances that pathos which touched human hearts, and brought weeping multitudes to his pulpit. Mr. Moody's last utterances in New York, made just before his trip to Kansas City, were in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, and indicated a premonition of the illness that was coming. He said: 'When you read in the newspapers that Moody is dead, it isn't so. God gave me the gift of life everlasting.' Aye, aye, thanks be to God, Moody's alive. Moody is living, and his spirit is in this hall with us this afternoon."

Mr. ROBERT FULTON CUTTING said:—"It is many years since I saw Mr. Moody at his home, but I have been a richer man ever since. He had a simple, direct manner—so essentially human that it reached all. He knew men as few did, and he reached them by

THE TRANSPARENCY OF HIS LIFE.

In the midst of his most magnificent successes he seemed to have no conception of his own part in them. He knew his field and he knew his God, but he didn't know himself. He forgot himself when he gave his life to God."

Rev. Dr. D. J. BURRELL said:—"A good man has gone home, and we can't be sorry. It was a wonderful death, was it not? And it ought to have been a wonderful death, for it was a wonderful life that went before it. He followed Jesus Christ, who came into the world to do one thing; and he said—'That one thing will I do.' I am going to erect a monument to him in my ministerial life. I am going to love the Bible better because he loved it so, and I am going to love God better because he loved Him so.

Mr. John Wanamaker was to have spoken next, but Mr. Dodge read a despatch from him in which he stated that illness kept him at his home in Philadelphia. Mr. Wanamaker particularly requested that Mr. SANKEY should take his place, and Mr. Dodge called on him. After singing "Saved by Grace," Mr. Sankey gave a very beautiful account of the burial of Mr. Moody at Northfield. Speaking of Mrs. Moody, he said—

"One of the greatest powers in Moody's life was

THE PARTNER GOD GAVE HIM.

Honour and credit are due to her, more than to any other living being, for his successful career."

Mr. JOHN R. MOTT, secretary of the Student Movement, spoke of the power and influence of Mr. Moody's words and works upon college and university men and women, and gave figures showing that already 2,000 students had gone into mission work of various kinds from American and British colleges as a result of the Student Volunteer Movement. Mr. Mott attributed Mr. Moody's success among these classes of readers and thinkers to his matchless knowledge of the human heart; to his wonderful honesty; to his reality and freedom from cant and professionalism; and to his overflowing sympathy and heart power. The appealed to the heroic in many, as also his self-sacrificing fervour. In addition to these were also his abounding vitality and spiritual life, due to his being a God-possessed man.

Rev. Dr. A. C. DIXON remarked that Mr. Moody's life showed the difference between influence and power, the power of his life being God Himself. Jesus was not a man of influence—"He made Himself of no reputation"—but He had power. Paul and Silas had not influence enough to keep them out of jail, but they had the power that shook the whole place while they were in it. Mr. Moody incarnated the words "God is able." The philosophy of his humility was that he was always face to face with some gigantic work for God, so big that he could only see the work and the God who could do it.

Rev. Dr. J. M. BUCKLEY referred, in some detail, to the magnitude of the loss sustained both by the Church and the world in Mr. Moody's death. Passing on to the man himself, he mentioned

TWO CHARACTERISTIC INCIDENTS.

In the early days in Chicago, some Catholic boys broke the windows of Mr. Moody's hall, and he went to see Bishop Dugan about it. The Bishop received him courteously, and became so interested in his visitor that he expressed regret that he was not in the true Church, and said he would pray for him. "Will you?" said Mr. Moody, "then will you do it right now? because I'm a busy man, and have a great deal to do." As he said this, he dropped on his knees. The Bishop did the same, and prayed earnestly that his guest might be led into the whole truth of God. As soon as the Bishop was through, Mr. Moody promptly began a prayer that God would enable him to see the truths of the Gospel without any intervening clouds of doctrines of men, and so forth. The Bishop, after that interview, always expressed the greatest respect for the evangelist, and no more windows were broken.

The other incident was about twenty-six years ago.

THE EMPEROR DOM PEDRO, of Brazil, was in New York, and Mr. Moody was preaching in the hippodrome. Mr. Dodge (chairman of the present meeting) was sitting in the centre of the platform then, and the Emperor, entering the hall, was beckoned to the platform, where he took the chair vacated for him by Mr. Dodge. Mr. Moody at the moment took no notice of the occurrence, but shortly afterwards, in the course of his address, exclaimed, lifting up his hand, "Even an emperor cannot buy heaven!" Dom Pedro's comment afterwards was—"A man like that is to be listened to and believed."

The meeting closed with the benediction after Mr. Sankey had sung, to his own accompaniment, a hymn written by him in memoriam, entitled "Out of the Shadowland" (see p. 20).

Service at Brooklyn.

Memorial services were also held in due course in the Central Presbyterian Church at Marcy and Jefferson Avenues, Brooklyn. It was in that church, of which Rev. Dr. Carson is pastor, that Mr. Moody was last heard in Brooklyn. Surrounding Dr. Carson, who presided, were: Mr. Ira D. Sankey, Rev. Dr. Chadwick, one of the local presiding elders of the M.E. Church; Rev. Dr. Dixon, of the Hanson Place Baptist Church; Rev. Dr. Pierson, and others. The speakers on the occasion were men who had been closely connected with Mr. Moody, and who had been sympathetically working with him in his great world's work.

"I have only just begun to realize," Mr. SANKEY said, "that my beloved brother and friend has gone from among us, and that we are not again to hear his voice. When we got to Northfield the other day, we gathered in little groups and talked of him who had gone from among us, and every now and then watched the door of the hotel, almost thinking that he ought to enter and say something cheery as was his wont. But

THE DOOR DID NOT OPEN.

Another door had opened for him. I saw my dear friend's form on the couch. He looked as if he was sleeping. He looked as if he had just come in from a hard day and night's labours, after addressing big multitudes, and thrown himself down, worn out, to rest, just as I had seen him do many times during the thirty years that I was with him. His family told me of this saying, which was among his last, and which has given me the keynote for the selection that I am about to sing, 'I've been inside the gates; don't call me back: there is no valley.'"

Mr. Sankey then sang, "There'll be no dark valley—when Jesus comes"—a hymn that Mr. Moody dearly loved.

Hearty words having been spoken by Drs. A. C. Dixon and J. S. Chadwick, Mr. D. W. MCWILLIAMS, of South Portland Avenue, an old and highly esteemed acquaintance, delivered an address. Of his departed friend, he said:—"He was a great soul. His master passion was the salvation of other souls. His immense achievements were the result of natural endowments, plus to the will of God, and to the service of our sinning and suffering race. It was a favourite saying of his that the world had yet to witness the possibilities of a human life wholly consecrated to God.

THEIR ENTIRE CONSECRATION

"In the minds of those who knew Mr. Moody intimately, he seemed to be the man who was chosen of God to illustrate that proposition. His consecration was not a mere expression of the lips. His was a costly consecration. It cut deep in what he called 'the flesh,' and it pervaded his whole being. It placed him unreservedly and devotedly at the service of the Church and Sabbath School, Young Men's Christian Associations, missionary efforts of every kind, temperance—indeed, every good cause. But the Gospel was the foundation of it all.

"With Bushnell he held that the soul of all improvement was the improvement of the soul. He had no confidence in what is called reform, when it was unaccompanied by the implanted life from above.

HE BELIEVED GOD.

Those who were with him in his early career will recall how often he quoted these texts: 'One shall chase a thousand, and two shall put ten thousand to flight;' 'Be strong and of a good courage;' 'Is anything too hard for the Lord?'

"The world is encircled with institutions and buildings which he founded, builded, or aided, while men and women who were converted under his preaching are to be found in every nation and clime. Who can number the Christians who were led by him into the life more abundant? His absorbing desire to learn, and his adaptation to circumstances, were also secrets of his success.

"I recall that one day in a railroad train he heard the newsboy, with a bundle of books under his arm, shout, 'Here you are, Ingersoll on Hell.' He promptly grabbed that boy, thrust a book into his hand, and said, 'Here, my lad, here is Moody on Heaven; give them this at the same time.' And the boy went through the cars shouting, 'Ingersoll on Hell, and Moody on Heaven.'

"Mr. Moody was 'a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith.' Through obscurity, poverty, and opposition, he went forth with Him without the camp bearing his reproach, in service as an evangelist; giving wise direction to Christian workers and soul winners. He organized, founded and provided means for schools, seminaries, institutes, churches, Sabbath schools, Young Men's Christian Associations, summer and winter conferences and conventions, and many other enterprises, all the glorifying of God in the extending of the kingdom of his Son and divine Lord. Has any man lived in the nineteenth century who has made happy as many persons as he?

Rev. Dr. PIERSON, who closed, spoke feelingly of Mr. Moody, and paid a high tribute to his character and life's work. Incidentally he said that Mr. Moody, Mr. John Wanamaker, and himself were all born in the same year, and had been closely associated in Christian work. He had attended Mr. Moody's funeral service, and never before witnessed such a funeral. There were no semblances of mourning anywhere about. No crape was displayed, and there were no drawn blinds. It was a Christian death and burial beyond anything he had ever seen. It was a triumphant march into heaven.

Mr. Sankey led the congregation in singing the hymn, "God be with you till we meet again," and dismissed the assembly with the Benediction.

Further Tributes and Testimonies.

By Mr. John Anderson,
GLASGOW BIBLE INSTITUTE.

MY attention was first directed to Mr. Moody by reading the report of an address which he delivered in London on the occasion of a brief visit in 1871. Following upon that came the announcement that he had been invited to return to this country to undertake an evangelistic mission. I resolved to watch for his arrival, and thus it happened that a request from me that he should visit Ardrossan was the first invitation he received from Scotland. Two years later he and Mr. Sankey recalled with amused interest the tenor of the letter they sent me from Nottingham telling of the first direct fruits of their mission on the previous evening. During that and his subsequent visit I was privileged to meet Mr. Moody frequently, and to attend many of his services in England and Ireland as well as in Scotland. The memories left by this intercourse suggest some impressions of the man and his work

THE MAN.

As a man, he was "cast in nature's largest mould." Large-minded and large-hearted, he had also in a marked degree that unaffected simplicity that is the unfailing accompaniment of true greatness. With him common sense was so fully developed that it blossomed into genius. Amongst the qualities that gave him the outstanding pre-eminence he attained, and that would have brought him to the front rank in any sphere of life, we note these: 1. A swift, intuitive insight that enabled him to go straight to the heart of any question that presented itself, and by an unerring instinct to distinguish between what was essential and what was secondary. 2. Ability to take in the whole situation at a glance, to discover the line of least resistance, and with rare wisdom and tact to adapt his methods to the end in view. 3. A shrewd perception of character, seldom at fault, that enabled him to select suitable helpers for the task in hand. 4. An unselfishness of disposition and transparent honesty of purpose that disarmed the criticism of opponents, and won the confidence and affection of friends. And 5, there was a force of character and also a business-like promptitude and precision in carrying out his ideas, which made it inevitable that, in any movement with which he was connected, D. L. Moody would, by universal consent, be accorded at once the position of leader.

THE CHRISTIAN.

As a Christian man his many admirable qualities were so evenly balanced that it is difficult to say which were the greatest. But prominent amongst these we are disposed to place his whole-hearted devotion to Christ. This, in fact, was the ruling principle of his life. His daily attitude of soul would have found its truest expression in Paul's question, "Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?" And he might have adopted as his own, to an extent few others could, that same Apostle's testimony: "I live, yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life that I now live in the flesh is a life of faith upon the Son of God who loved me and gave Himself for me." His character was crowned by a humility so genuine that it was entirely destitute of self-consciousness. He did not claim any special degree of holiness, and yet he possessed it in its rarest, because thoroughly practical, type. He was upright, straightforward, pure, lovable, unselfish, and Christlike, without the least admixture of pretentious piety. He did not speak much about consecration, but his life was a prolonged exemplification and exposition of its meaning and value. His views and his teaching on the development of spiritual life were sane and wholesome. He was singularly free from any tendency to adopt those partial views of truth that find expression in pet phrases that in turn become the watchwords of parties and swaddling bands that stifle healthy growth. He presented the truth of God on its own broad Scriptural lines, that appeal to men of every type, and that reach and develop the whole man in the will of God.

THE PREACHER.

As a preacher, his great power doubtless lay in his unique personality moved by the Divine Spirit. Emerson hit the mark when he said, "What you are speaks so loudly that I cannot hear what you say." It was this element that baffled the critics who went to hear him, and wondered where the secret of his power lay. His themes, too, were very human, just because they were divine; and they were fresh and attractive, because they were always practical. He took his stand at the centre of all truth, "Jesus Christ and Him crucified;" and from that centre he followed the radiating lines of truth as they smote the sinfulness and waywardness of men, or ministered to their deepest needs. Added to this, his naturalness gave a great charm to his preaching. He never attempted to preach or orate, and no mannerisms or false tones ever marred the effect of his addresses. He spoke from his own heart and out of his own experience, and so spoke to the hearts of others. He had supreme faith in the Word of God. Its characters under his touch became living men and women, none the less real that they spoke sometimes with a pronounced nineteenth century dialect. The truths of God's Word were eternal verities to his soul, clearer than the sun in the heavens, deeper and stronger and more enduring, than the everlasting hills. Hence he so spake that many believed. Doubt was dissipated in the bracing atmosphere of his buoyant faith, and vacillation and indecision gave way before the appeals of his masterful will as used by the Spirit of God.

THE ORGANIZER.

As an organizer it will be hard to find his equal. He has impressed his spirit and method on the evangelistic work of his generation. When an idea took root in his fertile brain, he was quick to see how it could best be applied, the psychological moment to introduce it, and the right persons to carry it through. And when his ideas took shape his practical wisdom, dauntless courage, and boundless energy carried them to a successful issue. The splendid institutions he founded and brought to such a high degree of perfection at Northfield, Mount Hermon, and Chicago, remain as monuments of his self-denying efforts for the good of others, and his matchless ability as an organizer.

It was my great privilege some years ago to spend ten days with

MRS. MOODY AT NORTHFIELD.

Her constant kindness on that occasion will ever remain as a fragrant memory. I was introduced to Mr. Moody's friends and taken over his favourite walks and drives, and what I saw and heard there added reverence to my former feelings of admiration for our friend whose loss we are now deploring. If it be the case, as some travellers tell us, that the spirit of Moses still seems to breathe in the desert air of the Sinaitic peninsula, it is equally true that the name and influence of Mr. Moody seemed to rest as a benediction on that quiet and beautiful New England village, even during his prolonged absences. And to have come from Mr. Moody or to have enjoyed his friendship was a sure passport to the hearts of his friends and neighbours. He will be mourned and missed all the world over, but to Northfield the loss will be irreparable. May God Himself speak to the hearts there so sorely stricken, and give "beauty for ashes." Who will, who can, fill his place? What will become of the institutions and movements that owed everything to his impulse and fostering care? These and other questions crowd upon us as we stand to-day bewildered and heavy-hearted by the greatness of the blank that has been made by the sudden home-call of our beloved friend. We can but remind ourselves that while the servants pass the Master remaineth. "The Lord liveth, and blessed be my Rock."

Dr. J. M. Buckley (New York).

Soon after the time when the British Association met in Belfast, and the brilliant Professor Tyndall uttered words that grieved all Christians throughout the world, evangelical and unevangelical (which expression Professor Tyndall many years afterward tried to modify, as even his fellow-scientists declared it an unscientific utterance), Messrs. Moody and Sankey began their services, and more converts of the intelligent class than had been received into churches for many years resulted.

As their audiences increased, the higher class of periodicals attempted philosophical explanations of the movement.

LORD SHAFTESBURY THANKED GOD

publicly that Mr. Moody had not been educated at Oxford, "for he had a wonderful power of getting at the hearts of men, and while the common people heard him gladly, many persons of high station have been greatly struck with the marvellous simplicity and power of his preaching." Lord Shaftesbury added that the Lord Chancellor of England a short time before had said to him, "The simplicity of that man's preaching, the clear manner in which he sets forth salvation by Christ, is to me the most striking and the most delightful thing I ever knew in my life."

The London Times, in a leading article, said: "Mr. Sankey confines himself to the kind of tunes and to the mode of singing with which large multitudes can be most readily brought into harmony. Both the crowds and the music, however they may contribute to the general result, are perfectly legitimate aids, and it is a mere matter of good sense for a preacher to employ such influences for predisposing his hearers to listen to him. But people would not come together for weeks merely to hear impressive singing, nor to yield to the impulse of association. They come to hear Mr. Moody, and the main question is, What has he to say? Is any Christian Church in this metropolis in a position to say that it can afford to dispense with any vigorous effort to rouse the mass of our people to a more Christian life? The congregations which are to be seen in our churches and chapels are but a fraction of the hundreds of thousands around them, of whom multitudes are living little better than a mere animal existence. If any considerable portion of them can be roused to a mere desire of something higher, an immense step is gained; and if the churches are really a higher influence still, Mr. Moody will at least have prepared them a better material to think upon."

His career, one of the most impressive phenomena of the last half of this century, presents a problem for solution.

WAS THERE ONE SECRET

of his power, or were there many? Did he become extraordinary by an unusual aggregation of ordinary qualities and deeds, or were there one or more elements rarely found elsewhere? There were many secrets of his success. His physical powers were an important element. He was energetic, untiring, and full of animal spirits. His native intellect was strong. Only his primitive ignorance, lack of cultivation, and bashfulness caused people to think that he would never achieve anything of moment. His development was slow but sure. Conversion unified and intensified his powers, and placed before him a target at which he steadily aimed. He shunned no responsibility, and was strong enough to meet every one. As an orator he improved as long as he lived.

The late Professor Drummond, over whose life Mr. Moody exerted a greater influence than any other man, thus describes him: "In sheer persuasiveness, Mr. Moody has few equals, and rugged as his preaching may seem to some, there is in it pathos of a quality which few orators have ever reached, and an appealing tenderness which not only wholly redeems it, but raises it not unseldom almost to sublimity. No report can do the faintest justice to this, or to the other most characteristic qualities of his public speech."

By Dr. T. L. Cuyler (Brooklyn).

Although I had some acquaintance with Mr. Moody during the sixties, yet my intimate knowledge of him began in February, 1872. During the following July we met in London, and together we delivered several addresses in the old hall of the Young Men's Christian Association in Aldersgate Street. One day he came into my room in King Street, Cheapside, and said to me: "They want me to stay on here, and hold evangelistic meetings over England." My reply was, "I must hasten home to my flock; but do you stay here by all means; the English people are wonderfully good listeners to the Gospel." After a few moments he said, "I will go home and get some one to sing with me and come back here and preach." How he did—in God's good providence—join with him that noble kindred spirit, and how they twain went on from Newcastle to Edinburgh, and from Edinburgh carried forward the banner of the Cross from town to town until they set Scotland all aflame, the whole Christian world knows already. In August, 1874, I ran up from Liverpool to Glasgow just to spend a couple of hours with Moody and to see how he looked since he had become famous. His head was as level as ever; exaltation had not turned it one iota, and never did to his dying day. Celebrity sobers a wise man; but notoriety makes a fool a bigger fool than ever.

After Mr. Moody returned from that wonderful work in Britain, I went on to Northfield—in October, 1875—to hear from his own lips the thrilling story of what God had wrought. At the farmhouse table of his venerable mother—who lived to enjoy the glory of her son until she was past ninety—he narrated some of his experiences. When I asked him who had helped him most, he replied, "Dr. Andrew A. Bonar and the LORD CHANCELLOR CAIRNS.

The first one helped me by inspiring hints of Bible truth for my sermons; the other one by coming to hear me often, for people said that if the Lord Chancellor came to my services they had better come too." Mr. Gladstone took a seat on the platform at one of his vast meetings in the Agricultural Hall; and, after the service, he said to Mr. Moody, "I would give a great deal to have your voice." Our Yankee brother's quick reply was, "And I would give a great deal more to have your head."

By Rev. H. Montgomery (Belfast).

The first visit of Mr. Moody and his singing companion to Belfast was largely brought about by a visit of the late Professor Watts, D.D., and Mr. Chas. Finlay, to Edinburgh, at the time Mr. Moody was carrying on his first mission there. The city was deeply stirred, and these Irish visitors came back with glowing accounts of the mighty wave of blessing which was passing over the Scottish capital.

Immediately a hearty invitation was despatched to the evangelists, and they arrived in Belfast in the early autumn of 1874. Much prayer had been offered, and already the spirit of expectation had been aroused, so that, through God's blessing, the ground was more or less prepared. The meetings were crowded from the very beginning, and the whole community was aroused. Salvation was in the air. Gay and frivolous people began to think, but the blessing largely fell upon nominal believers and church-goers without any clear or definite interest in the Saviour.

The news of revival spread all around. It was taken up in the warehouses, mills, factories, and other public works, and at the daily tasks of life as well as at dinner-hour meetings. Mr. Moody's clear, simple, direct Gospel appeals were repeated, while the stirring songs of Mr. Sankey captivated and blessed multitudes of the people.

Many who had "a name to live" began to look to the foundation on which they had been building, and it is only the simple truth to say that the Church of God took on new life and power through the visit of his honoured servants. That the work was most blessed amongst church-going people explains its brightest and best features, for those thus quickened were the best qualified to act as the happy agents for spreading the good news. To have had a good, solid, religious training in the Bible and Bible truth is a splendid equipment for a man after God's Spirit has reached and changed him. So it proved during this memorable time. Those brought under the power of the truth became earnest and useful propagandists. Mr. Moody's his terse and telling way of putting things, his word-painting of Bible stories and parables, and his numerous illustrations, gathered in many cases from his experiences in the American War, all lent themselves to young and eager minds for assimilation and future service.

There was a happy contagiousness about the hymns. At that time the hymn-book was very limited, but those earlier Gospel pieces did a work which can never be told till we reach the land of everlasting song. One can never forget "The sweet by-and-by," "Jesus loves me," "Jesus of Nazareth passeth by," "The ninety and nine."

There is impressed deeply upon the writer's mind the Rev. Professor Watts, a veritable Great-Heart for the old evangelical position, giving out that wonderful Gospel statement, "O Christ, what burdens bowed thy head!" with the tears running down his face. It tells so blessedly the great substitutionary work of the Lord Jesus that it captured the good professor's heart as a MARVELLOUS STATEMENT OF GOSPEL TRUTH.

Mr. Moody's services were all very bright. He disliked dulness, and has more than once interrupted an imprudent brother delivering a rambling discourse under the name of prayer. His service of song was always well arranged, and suitable to the topic for the day. His prayers were always short and to the point, and had in them a directness and a fervour which made one feel "there is a man who believes in the reality of the unseen."

Who shall describe his sermons? Clear as spring water, cogent as the argument of a lawyer, saturated with the Word of God, brought home by illustrations so varied and apt as to make Moody almost unrivalled in this department, and backed up by telling application and appeal, often delivered in tears. Marvellous man! Marvellous preacher! But all of grace. Mr. Moody was a great

SPIRITUAL GENERAL.

His management of men was a remarkable testimony to his great force of character. He could handle committees with the most dexterous skill, and draw into line hard-headed men who were critical and fearful rather than full of faith and zeal in the work.

In managing, as he often did, three meetings in one night, his powers of organization and resource were at once apparent. He could pass from one service to another, and enter heartily into his work at once. He had also great discernment in selecting lieutenants to help him. By a kind of spiritual instinct he was drawn to or repelled from would-be helpers, and though the instinct may have erred it very seldom did. Often when large crowds had gathered long before the hour of service he would say to some trusted comrade,

"THIS MEETING IS VERY FLAT.

Pray now for God to lift it." He could feel a meeting as a doctor feels the pulse of a patient, and looking into its face could fairly well tell how best to deal with it. With an eye like an eagle's he would sweep with keen glance over vast crowds of judgment-bound humanity, and take in the situation like a spiritual Wellington. Then everything was definitely directed to what he regarded as the particular needs of the audience on that given occasion.

He was very strong upon the point, not only of making definite decision for Christ, but of letting it be known to others. He made people ashamed of being ashamed. He delighted to show how blessing was attached to witness-bearing and open confession. His Christian candour on the liquor question, worldliness, Sunday newspapers, and the Sunday question generally, led sometimes to wavering followers disappearing from the ranks. He was straight and above board, and never hesitated to say what he believed to be true. He delighted to relate how his wife was once teaching her little boy a Sabbath school lesson. She was telling him to notice how sin grows till it becomes a habit. The little fellow thought it was coming too close to him, so he coloured up and finally said—

"Mamma, I think you are getting a good way from the subject."

Some evangelists are careless about the Press. They do not care to use it much even if they could. Mr. Moody was not amongst these. He delighted in getting the secular press interested in his work, and was careful to secure the presence of reporters at many of his services. The result was that considerable portions of his sermons were read by thousands of persons who never could be induced to come to his meetings. He would often purchase 500 or 1,000 copies of a morning paper having a sermon in it, and send them through the post or distribute them at his meetings. The result was that many came up from all over the land as inquirers.

The writer remembers very well dealing with a country public-house keeper and his wife, who had made a pilgrimage to Belfast, wishing Mr. Moody to speak to them about salvation. They had read his sermons, and God had made these messages instrumental in arousing this aged couple, who had spent well-nigh a lifetime in the liquor trade, to anxiety about their souls. Mr. Moody paid three visits to Belfast, and also brief visits to several towns in the province of Ulster, and wherever he went God made use of his servant in stirring up a deep and real interest in the things pertaining to the Kingdom. His last meetings were held in an enormous auditorium in Belfast, built for one day's political meeting, and capable of holding over 10,000 persons. There he discoursed for a fortnight with all his old-time charactertic power.

Numbers are in the ministry and the mission field, who were led to the Saviour at his meetings, and many of the most prominent Christian workers in Belfast and the North of Ireland to-day owe either their conversion, or much Christian stimulus, to his gracious and Spirit-owned ministry. His memory will ever be fragrant in this portion of the Emerald Isle, and many, we believe, will be found at the Great Day who were wise to win souls, and whose first aspirations in that blessed, difficult work came to them in the meetings of God's honoured ambassador.

"THE GREAT REFORMER."

Mr. S. E. Bridgman, of Northampton, Mass., writes to us: "Nowhere was the evangelist more deeply loved and honoured than in his boyhood's home. All classes and conditions of men were alike to him in Northfield. He was ever ready to listen to a story of suffering or wrong, and to give the help sought. On one occasion the writer asked his advice as to rescuing a soul that was in great peril. He replied, 'It is now near midnight. I leave for my home by the 8 o'clock morning train to-morrow. Meet me at the hotel at 7.30 o'clock.' The story was told in a few moments, and we two alone bowed in prayer. So earnest, tender, importunate a petition went up for the stranger unknown to him, that I was made to feel that we were in the immediate presence of the 'Son of Man.' His prayer was answered; the soul was saved.

"A Unitarian neighbour told me that men of all shades of belief looked to 'D. L.' as an unique reformer. He has not only touched a thousand springs of influence outside our town, but here at home he has

has changed its physical condition, and is looked upon as 'The Great Reformer.' In his business dealings he had not a flaw. The marvel of the man's life was his deep unconscious humility and the utter absence of selfishness. Said we to him one day while riding together, 'Don't you ever get "set up" a little by the honours piled upon you in all parts of the world?' He quietly replied—'If I am set up for one moment, I am set down the next.' His name has been honoured above degree; his name is a household word in all Christian nations. An Armenian student from Central Turkey says: 'The first names that I remember in my childhood were Moody and Sankey.' His presence was the delight of the humblest farmer in the village; he has been entertained in royal palaces. He has moreover, achieved success like, perhaps, no other man since St. Paul; for while a preacher of righteousness like Whitefield, Wesley, Spurgeon, he has set in motion that has touched the world. As author, publisher, educator, founder of institutions, philanthropist, he has no rival even in this age of philanthropy. From the Atlantic to the Pacific and over the sea he had identified himself with the Y.M.C. Association, colportage work, the welfare of college students, among army boys, prisoners, seeking everywhere to rescue and to save.

A THOUSAND SPRINGS OF INFLUENCE

"The question arises: Will the schools continue as of old? Of course, if the two hemispheres respond to the appeal of the trustees, and raise quickly an endowment of 3,000,000dols. for the three schools to honour the work and service of the greatest evangelist of the century or of the age! The world cannot afford to build a lesser monument to his name. Will R. Moody, his eldest son; A. P. Fitt, his son-in-law; Ambert G. Moody, his nephew, are royal souls, and they will seek to carry out the ideas and aims of D. L. Moody."

VISIT TO DUBLIN.

Mr. J. L. Dixon, of Dublin, writes:—"On looking over my diary concerning our brother Moody's visits to Ireland, it would appear that his first public utterance concerning the 'Gospel of the grace of God' was given in the old Metropolitan Hall, Lower Abbey Street, Dublin, a place ever to be associated with his name, and though now no longer known by this title, yet its new surroundings and name, 'The Christian Union Buildings,' still bear the imprint in all its work with the original founder, D. L. Moody, the majority of the present directors and workers having been associated with him from the first.

"At this time—thirty years ago—services had been held regularly for three years by all the best known and honoured servants of God throughout the world, and every inch of ground seemed sacred. It was here that Richard Weaver sounded out his first note of praise, also here our brother, C. H. Spurgeon, first held an Irish audience thrill-bound by his masterly exaltation of the person and work of Christ. And here, too, that Joseph Denham Smith felt more at home than anywhere else, and never seemed happier than when calling upon some convert by name to give testimony of what the Lord had done for him. Nor were these all. Numerous giants in the two hours before the advertised times for commencing. The clergy and ministers of all denominations attended in large numbers. The Bishop of the diocese; Rev. Dr. McCaw, moderator of the English Presbyterian Church; Rev. Dr. Macfadyen, chairman of the Congregational Union; and Rev. Charles Garrett, president of the Wesleyan Conference, were present on different occasions, and expressed their satisfaction with the services. The Executive Committee took the names and addresses of 1,843 persons, who professed to have received good during the mission, to hand over to the Christian ministers for visiting and gathering in.

"At the close of one of the Bible readings the bishop told Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey how much he had enjoyed the meeting. The following evening, when I was at Bishopscourt, before going to preside at the annual meeting of our Sacred Song Association (which formed the mission choir), he asked me to state publicly how very much Mrs. Fraser and he had enjoyed the Bible-reading by Mr. Moody, and the singing of Mr. Sankey."

questions was, 'What are you young men going to do?' If any of us had not made up our minds that there was something that we could do, we were soon well informed on that point.

A PLAN WAS ORGANIZED for the visitation of every place of worship in Leeds, for the purpose of making sure that a notice of the forthcoming meetings should be given out in the various pulpits on the following day.

"One of five meetings attended by Mr. Moody in one day was intended to be a temperance experience meeting, A number of men rose to tell of the advantages of total abstinence, and particularly of the benefits they had themselves derived from it. Mr. Moody listened with great impatience to these testimonies, as most of them were of a very unspiritual character. The advantages consisted, for the most part, of improved dwellings, better meals, better clothing, watches and chains, and an improved condition of health. After one of the speakers had thanked God that he neither drank, snuffed, nor smoked,

"THE YOUNG PEOPLE PROCURED A HAY WAGON DRAWN BY A SUPERB TEAM OF OXEN." (See page 25.)

Word, of various sections of the Church of Christ, ministered here with great success. A few only might be named—Harry Moorhouse, Dr. John Hall, Dr. Urwick, Rev. Marcus Rainsford, Dr. McKee, Dr. Mackay, author of 'Grace and Truth,' &c., with a host of evangelists, whose praise is in all the churches; and thousands of whom it shall be said concerning the old Metropolitan Hall were 'born there.'"

WORK AT MANCHESTER.

Writing on the evangelist's work in Manchester, in 1883, Mr. W. H. NEWETT, of the Y.M.C.A., says: "Messrs. Moody and Sankey told 'the old, old story,' by speech and song at twenty-one Gospel meetings, attended by 68,000 persons; at fourteen Bible lectures, attended by 46,000 persons; at five meetings for men only, attended by 16,000; they had two meetings for Christian workers, attended by 7,000; and ten prayer meetings, attended by 7,500. Hundreds of letters were opened daily from the surrounding districts asking for tickets. The crowds were so great that, to relieve the pressure, the doors had to be opened usually

CATECHIZING AT LEEDS.

Amongst other reminiscences, Mr. HENRY THORNE recalls his first meeting with the evangelist, thirty years ago:—"I had received a letter from a well-known Christian worker, in which Mr. Moody was warmly commended to me as a man of exceptional power. He was described as a 'second Billy Dawson,' and I was urged to do what I could to induce him to pay a visit to Leeds, the town in which I then resided. When I met him at the Great Northern station I was not very favourably impressed with his appearance or manner. Little did I think, as I rather resented his abrupt utterances, that I should some day regard him with the true respect and affection which for many years I have felt for him.

"About a dozen young men had arranged to meet Mr. Moody for prayer and conference on the evening of his arrival. The evangelist was asked to preside, but peremptorily declined, and until the Benediction had been pronounced he said nothing. We were about to separate when he sprang to his feet and plied us with a series of practical questions. The first of the

Mr. Moody rose and fired off a volley of old-fashioned Gospel talk, in which he made it clear that if those in the meeting had got nothing more than total abstinence, they were still destitute of what was their greatest need, which was a saving knowledge of Jesus Christ."

A BLESSING AT KESWICK.

Mrs. BANKS writes: "Mr. and Mrs. Moody's visit to Keswick is one of the pleasantest of our home reminiscences. The evangelist had long desired to visit the Convention, and when the opportunity offered (in 1892), he gladly availed himself of it. He was detained in England, owing to the illness of his youngest son, and was very urgent that Rev. F. B. Meyer should go for him to the Northfield Conference. This Mr. Meyer consented to do, on condition that Mr. Moody would go to Keswick and preach on behalf of the Congregational Church there on the Convention Sunday. This was readily agreed to, and thus Keswick had the great privilege of hearing the noted evangelist.

"We can never forget the prayers of these two eminent servants of God; they prayed for each other at family worship on the night of Mr. Meyer's departure for America, each commending the other to God, and seeking blessing on the work that they were undertaking for one another. The Sunday service had to be held in the large tent owing to the numbers who wished to attend, and at nine o'clock, so that all the churches should not be empty at the usual hour for worship.

"Dr. Newman Hall was conducting the usual service in the church; Mr. Moody was taken there privately, sitting in the vestry and leaving early so as to avoid the crowds. He did not wish to attract attention; but,

LIKE HIS MASTER,

'he could not be hid.' Mr. Moody was exceedingly pleased with Dr. Newman Hall's discourse, and said that a wish long indulged had been gratified in the hearing of this aged minister. Several evangelistic services were conducted in the Convention tent by Mr. Moody, Mr. Burke leading the singing. Many were deeply impressed, and these were all visited and helped afterwards, with lasting results.

"At the Saturday morning prayer meeting it is the custom for the various speakers to give a text and testimony. Mr. Moody rose and said: 'I came to this Convention seeking a fresh blessing in my own soul, and praying God to give it me.

I GOT IT THE OTHER MORNING,

not from any word of man's, but through this text, which one of the brethren quoted: "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine." This was my heavenly Father's message to me, and I said, 'It is enough; what can I want more? for infinite resources are mine.' The tears were streaming down his face as he spoke, and he buried his face in his handkerchief and wept on resuming his seat. Such was his childlike spirit.

"Mr. Moody's last words in Keswick, when driving off from our gate, were, "Now let your hearts keep singing until I come and see you again,' words suggested by a favourite hymn."

GLASGOW IN '74 AND '82.

Major A. S. D. Colquhoun, the founder of the Corsican Evangelistic Mission, immediately after his conversion, was intimately associated with Mr. Moody in his work at Glasgow. "The first time I heard Mr. Moody's voice was in the spring of 1874, when the evangelists had already made their mark in Scotland. One day my clerk came in, remarking: 'It's a wonderful sight—Moody and Sankey in St. George's Church, crammed to the ceiling.' A day or two afterwards St. Silas' Episcopal Church was crowded, but I found a seat. I saw a thick, dark-set bearded man in the prime of life. At that moment, he was saying something about the 'lids 'of his Bible. I almost resented the peculiar diction and the strong American accent, and was

INCLINED TO LAUGH.

Not many minutes had elapsed ere I knew I was listening to a man of God, preaching the Gospel in its simplicity and power."

Major Colquhoun attended another meeting of Mr. Moody's, "at which," says he, "I laid aside my pride and reticence, and took my place as an unconverted man before God. I thanked Him, and stood up. I went unhesitatingly forward and clasped Moody by the hand. He did not speak a word—eye to eye he knew. That unquestioning grasp of Moody's hand mightily confirmed my faith. I said within myself, 'Yes, it is as simple as that; he does not need to ask.'" Major Colquhoun was soon in the thick of the work.

As illustrating the marvellous stir the visit of the evangelists made, the City Hall was found to be quite inadequate, and Mr. Moody suggested the Kibble Palace, believing it could be managed. Benches were obtained from all the West-end churches. But the Palace was not to be free before 10 p.m. the night previous to the Convention. One hundred men wrought all night; the statues were draped; a great platform to hold 300 people and strong barricades were erected; the west area was fully seated. Everything was ready by eight a.m., and by nine each man stood to his post. Moody was delighted. The crowds of notables were a little difficult to manage. Such a meeting had never been held in Glasgow or all the West. But everything passed off without a hitch.

Later in the season we tried it again. The result as to numbers attending was prodigious. Town and country cried out for tickets. We issued them like autumn leaves. The 5,000 persons to fill the Kibble Palace took their places hours beforehand. But neither Moody nor any of the rest who were bidden ever got near. When Mr. Allan's carriage appeared, bringing Mr. Moody, an hour before the time, with 5,000 within the building, there were at least 25,000 without, standing shoulder to shoulder on the green sward. The carriage advanced with much difficulty as far as the centre of the enclosure, whence, standing on the box, Mr. Moody addressed the assembled multitude. The subject will be found registered in the prints of the day, if the reporter ever got within earshot. Those inside the palace passed the time singing hymns. They had come to hear Moody, and no one else ventured to address them. By and by the vast crowd melted away as quietly as it had assembled. Not a mishap so far of any kind occurred in connection with any of Moody's meetings in Glasgow.

DUBLIN IN '67.

Mr. W. Nobbs, of Hereford, recollects meeting Mr. Moody at Dublin, in the old Metropolitan Hall, in 1868. Some remarkable gatherings took place, one of which was held in a small unfurnished room. "Here the Lord manifested Himself to all hearts. One lady got up and walked quickly out of the room, saying, 'I am a hindrance to this meeting.' After a time Moody entered the room. We were lying on the floor in tears, sobbing out our confessions and prayers, and Mr. Moody was soon doing the same. We did not go down to the larger meeting. A message came from it that Mr. Henry Varley was wanted to address the meeting. He did not wish to go, but Mr. Moody said, 'Go, Henry; we'll pray for you.' We continued in prayer, and Mr. Varley went, and was much helped in speaking.

"Mr. Henry Moorhouse was with Mr. Moody at Willow Park. After the gatherings we were sitting on the lawn, when Moody, with paper and pencil in hand, came round to different workers, asking them if they had anything good on certain passages of Scripture, jotting down what he gathered."

HIS LIFE A GOSPEL.

Rev. J. T. Wrenford (of Newport, Mon.), bears his testimony to the noble Christian character and work of Mr. Moody. "Having been with him in Dublin, Inverness, London and Newport, I knew him well. What struck me most was the sense of absolute reality under which he preached the 'glad tidings of the kingdom of God;' his intense yearning of soul so to set forth the Divine love that sinners might be drawn irresistibly to the feet, yea, the arms, of the Lord Jesus; his strength of faith in God, his yearning tenderness of heart, and the undimmed brightness of his own Christian life—that life was a gospel in itself, as influential as his true and faithful words.

"There was also the broadest of catholicity in his sympathies. Mere denominationalism was but little in his thoughts, I feel sure. In the arms of his love he embraced Episcopalians and Nonconformists with equal affection, if only they truly loved the Lord. He was a man of unaffected humility, of singleness of purpose, of transparent sincerity. Surely we may say of him that, by the grace of God, and being filled with the Spirit, he lived out the Christ-life; and this was the secret of all his wonderful success. For the last eight-and-twenty years my feelings towards Mr. Moody have ever been those of admiration, respect and love."

THE CHURCHES AND CRITICISM.

In the beginning of his public work, Mr. Moody worked outside of churches, and was often misunderstood by ministers. He felt that there were scores of men in every denomination who could reach the people far better than he could, if they would lay aside a little clerical dignity and make the man outside feel that the church was as desirous of his salvation as her Master was. But in his later years he worked more in harmony with the ministers, and won the entire confidence of the great majority of them, hundreds availing themselves every year of his invitation to Northfield.

He was very plain in denunciation of unbelieving criticism. "I believe," he said, "that there are a good many scholars in these days, as there were when Paul lived, who, 'professing themselves to be wise, have become fools'; but I don't think they are those who hold to the inspiration and infallibility of the whole Bible. Ministers of the Gospel who are cutting up the Bible in this way, denying Moses to-day and Isaiah to-morrow, and Daniel the next day, and Jonah the next, are doing the devil's work. They may be good men, but that makes the results of their work all the worse. Do they think they will recommend the Bible to the finite and fallen reason of men by taking the supernatural out of it? They are doing just the opposite to that. They are emptying their churches, and driving the young men of this generation into infidelity."

Points and Stories.

From Mr. Moody's Books and Addresses.

The compassion of Christ inclines Him to save sinners.

The power of Christ enables Him to save sinners.

The promises of Christ bind Him to save sinners.

Faith gives us living joy and dying rest.

Ever since sin entered the world, and death by sin, the earth has been a vast burying-ground for her children.

We have not to put out the eyes of our reason to see with the vision of faith; but if once we are sure that God has spoken, we are to do his will whether we understand it or not.

A Christian worker once said to a man, "God does not want your learning." "No," said the other, "nor your ignorance either."

The great outlet of sin is the tongue; the great inlets of temptation are the ear and the eye; but of the whole body the heart is mistress. Therefore let grace rule the heart, and the whole man shall be subject.

There is a great difference between sin dwelling and reigning in us. It dwells in every believer, but reigns in the unbeliever.

The blood alone makes us safe. The Word alone makes us sure.

We are—as to our bodies, in Egypt:
" " " experience, in the wilderness:
" " " faith, in the Holy Land.

Never was there a lock of soul-trouble yet but there was a key to it in God's Word.

CALLING A SPADE A SPADE.

A lady once said to me, "I have got so in the habit of exaggerating that my friends accuse me of exaggerating so that they don't understand me."

She said, "Can you help me? What can I do to overcome it?"

"Well," I said, "the next time you catch yourself lying, go right to that party and say you have lied, and tell him you are sorry. Say it is a lie. Stamp it out, root and branch; that is what you want to do."

"Oh," she said, "I wouldn't call it lying."

But that is what it was. Christianity is not worth a snap of your finger if it doesn't straighten out your character.

SOWING THE TARES.

I was at the Paris Exhibition in 1867, and I noticed there a little oil-painting only about a foot square, and the face was the most hideous I have ever seen. On the label attached to the painting were the words, "Sowing the Tares." The face looked more like a demon's than a man's. As he sowed these tares, up came serpents and reptiles, and they were crawling up his body; and all around were woods, with wolves and animals prowling in them. In my mind's eye I have seen that picture many times since. Ah! the reaping time is coming. If you sow to the flesh you must reap corruption.

"THEY LOVE A FELLOW THERE."

Show me a church where there is love, and I will show you a church that is a power in the community. In Chicago, a few years ago, a little boy attended a Sabbath school I know of. When his parents moved to another part of the city, the little fellow still attended the same Sunday school, although it meant a long, tiresome walk each way. A friend asked him why he went so far, and told him that there were plenty of others just as good nearer his home.

"They may be as good for others, but not for me," was his reply. "Why not?" she asked. "Because they love a fellow over there," he replied. If only we made people believe that we loved them, there would be fewer empty churches, and a smaller proportion of our population would pass by the church door. Let love replace duty in our church relations, and the world will soon be evangelized.

RECEIVING THE SHILLING.

One day I was walking through the streets of York, England. I saw a little way ahead a soldier coming toward me. He had on the red uniform of the infantry—the dress of the army. I knew at once when I saw him that he was a soldier. When he came near me, I stopped him. I said: "My man, if you have no objection, I would like to ask you a few questions."

"Certainly, sir," said he.

"Well, then, I would like to know how you first became a soldier."

"Yes, sir; I will tell you. You see, sir, I wanted to be a soldier, and the recruiting officer was in our town, and I went up to him and told him that I wanted to enlist. 'Well, sir,' he said, 'all right;' and the first thing he did was to take a shilling out of his pocket and put it into my hand. The very moment a recruiting sergeant puts a shilling into your hand, sir, you are a soldier."

I said to myself: "That is the very illustration that I want."

That man was a free man at one time. He could go here and there, do just what he liked; but the moment that shilling was put into his hand he became subject to the rules of war, and Queen Victoria could send him anywhere and make him obey the rules and regulations of the army. He is a soldier the very minute he takes the shilling. He has not got to wait to put on the uniform. And when you ask me how a man may be converted at once, I answer, "In the same way as that man became a soldier." The citizen becomes a soldier in less than a minute, and from being a free man becomes subject to the command of others. The moment you take Christ into your heart, that moment your name is written in the roll of heaven.

"I CAN'T HELP YOU DIE!"

After the battle of Pittsburg Landing and Murfreesboro, I was in a hospital at the latter place. One night after midnight, I was waked up and told that there was a man in one of the wards who wanted to see me. I went to him and he called me "chaplain." I wasn't chaplain, but he said he wanted me to help him die. And I said: "I'd take you right in my arms and carry you into the kingdom of God, if I could; but I can't do it—I can't help you die." And he said, "Who can?" I said, "The Lord Jesus Christ can; He came for that purpose." He shook his head and said: "He can't save me; I have sinned all my life." And I said, "But He came to save sinners."

I thought of his mother in the North, and I knew she was anxious he should die right; and I thought I'd stay with him. I prayed two or three times, and repeated all the promises that I could, and I knew that in a few hours he would be gone. I said that I wanted to read him a conversation that Christ had with a man who was anxious about his soul.

I turned to the third chapter of John. His eyes were riveted on me, and when I came to the fourteenth and fifteenth verses, he caught up the words, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in Him might not perish, but have eternal life." He stopped me and said, "Is that there?" I said, "Yes." And he asked me to read it again, and I did so. He leaned his elbow on the cot, and clasped his hands together, and said: "That's good; won't you read it again?" I read it the third time, and then went on with the rest of the chapter. When I finished, his eyes were closed, his hands were folded, and there was a smile on his face.

A TRAGIC ENDING.

At one place where I went to hold meetings it was advertised in the papers that I was going to stay thirty days. Now, there was a lady who was a member of one of the churches, and she said—

"I don't want to have my boy brought under the influence of those meetings. I'm afraid he'll be brought into the Young Men's Christian Association, and they'll have him out on the street with tracts, and it would be very mortifying to me to have my son doing such a thing as that."

So she planned to take her son out of the city for the thirty days. She told her pastor, but I knew nothing about it.

The meetings went on, and just at my right hand sat that minister, from the beginning till the end, until the last meeting, when he was absent. On that occasion it was just as the Benediction was pronounced and the people were about to leave that he came in, and said he was sorry he had not been before.

"I have just been called on one of the saddest errands of my life," he said; and he went on to tell me that that mother, who had taken her son away from the influence of those meetings, had brought him back in his coffin, and he had just come from the funeral.

By R. C. Morgan.

My earliest recollections of Mr. Moody date from his first visit to this country in 1867. And though I have been intimately associated with him in all his subsequent visits, as well as having accompanied him at various times in different parts of America, he was never more interesting to me than on that first occasion. It was like a breeze from the prairie, the life of the free, far West suddenly and unexpectedly thrust upon the conservative East. For in those days Chicago was distinctly and typically far West, and its ways as unlike our humdrum and "established" life, as ours are unlike those of the Asiatic East.

Truly we had to study a development new to us when we heard the way in which, in his young days, Moody had gathered his Sunday school class, and how he handled them when he had got them together. It was so new to us because precedent had ruled in religious as well as in other matters.

His experiences as a delegate of the Christian commission were then fresh in his remembrance, and his vivid stories of the wounded and dying men to whom he ministered, showed the devotedness with which he had fulfilled his mission, the sympathy with which he won the sufferers' confidence, and the wise tact which he had acquired in dealing with their spiritual state. Those months in camp, in hospital, and on the fields where battles had been fought, were used by the Spirit of God in further training him as an evangelist, and as a soul-winner.

One of his first meetings in England was held in a little hall at Wood Green, seating less than 200 persons. His text was one from which afterwards he often preached to immense audiences—"To every man his work." It was one of the foundation principles of his fruitful life to lead every one, not only to work, but to do the work for which he had been prepared of God: "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them." With true spiritual instinct the preacher had gathered from the Evangelist Mark's brief record of the Master's words the principle and the obligation more fully elaborated in after years by the Apostle Paul (Mark xiii. 34; Eph. ii. 10).

The special purpose for which Mr. Moody first crossed the Atlantic was not to acquire a European experience and reputation, but to see and hear and know two men of God, whose fame had reached him in his own land—George Müller and C. H. Spurgeon. The high regard with which he always spoke of them proved how fully his heart had been satisfied by his intercourse with them then, and ever afterwards. "Hiram was ever a lover of David." Moody was ever a lover of men of God.

My wife and I have very happy recollections of our journey with Mr. Moody in 1897 from Northfield to Winnipeg, and thence to Minneapolis, and of our meeting with him in 1899 at Detroit. It was evident that, whether in Canada or in the United States, he was never held in higher esteem than when his labours were drawing to a close. There have been few men who, constantly in critical positions, made fewer or so few mistakes. He was a man honourable and high-minded, considerate of others and generous toward them.

He was a great man morally, spiritually, humanly; great in his own home, in his native town, in his great country, and throughout the world. May his mantle and a double portion of his spirit fall upon the young men and women of his schools and institutes, and upon all who have been associated with him in his too brief but most influential life.

Concerning our Illustrations.

The auditorium, shown on page 21, was for many years a desideratum urgently required. Since 1894 it has been an accomplished fact. The building is constructed of brick, with terra-cotta and brownstone trimmings, while the foundation, which extends several feet above the ground, is of granite. The interior of the structure is no less grand. The floor surfaces are arranged with curved inclines, so that the platform can be easily seen from any quarter of the large room. The seats are placed about the platform in a semi-circle, and will accommodate 1,400 people, while above is a gallery in the horse-shoe form extending on three sides, and this will seat 900. In addition to this there are 300 seats in the choir gallery, at the rear of the platform.

As indicating the more homely side of his all-round ministry, one who has visited Northfield more than once writes: "Mr. Moody's personality is impressed like a seal upon the entire countryside. This is the more remarkable in view of the large proportion of his time that he has spent elsewhere. Everybody knows him; and, like a 'father of his people,' he is welcomed by them all. He is here from Chicago for a few days, but will soon fly off again to the heat and bustle of that cosmopolitan city. Meantime he enjoys the quiet and restful change, wisely electing to derive all the benefit he can from the pure country breezes.

"Accordingly, he may be seen at any hour after early morn driving around in his useful buggy,* receiving salutations from everyone he meets, though not without an occasional rebuke from one and another that he does not 'come inside' when passing their door.

"'Ah, well,' he replies cheerily, 'I only go indoors when I'm obliged to, for meals and sleep. This fresh air is so good, I take in all I can.' Yet he breaks this rule sometimes, for he has only to hear of sickness or trouble casting a cloud o'er any household, and he is there to solace or to help.

"He is a man greatly beloved, and no wonder, with so large and generous a heart as his; and the fervour of his religion pervades the whole atmosphere of the town. Climb the hillside, wander through meadow or wood, take a seat by the side of a passing teamster, or pause to purchase a trifle at the village store, and not a word but of appreciation will you hear; while 'Then shall my heart keep singing,' or 'This is my story, this is my song,' comes floating over the newly-mown hay which husbandmen and labourer are gathering in.

"Mr. Moody's arrival was hailed by one of those genial little incidents which are common to Northfield, and which add so much to its enjoyment. The afternoon, during Conference time, is usually devoted to purposes of rest and recreation, unless some special call for a meeting arises. On this occasion† between twenty and thirty of the young people procured a hay waggon drawn by a superb team of oxen, and having elegantly decorated the "turn out," and amply covered the floor of the waggon with straw, created no small stir and amusement by proceeding to meet the train by which Mr. Moody was to arrive some three miles away. Their exuberant spirits showed that a long series of meetings in nowise had a depressing effect upon them, but that the religion of Jesus Christ inspires pleasures second to none that the worldling enjoys.

"As his train drew up, a song of welcome burst forth, which caused many a passenger to open eyes and windows to see whence it came. The train-men are evidently familiar with such little tokens of the esteem in which the evangelist is held by those who know him and his work. A splendid view of the seminary buildings may be had from the railway, as they stand on the hill-slope among the trees, with the Connecticut River flowing between.‡ There was a peculiar fitness, therefore, that immediately after obtaining a sight of them the passengers should have their attention drawn to the founder in this somewhat original way. These 'straw-rides,' 'corn-roasts,' 'picnics,' &c., form a pleasant feature of the recreation hour, when the parties are sufficiently large to ensure variety in the methods of whiling away the time, the pace being necessarily rather slow."

THE MOODY INSTITUTIONS.

With commendable diligence, the friends of Mr. Moody have devised plans for the continuance of his various institutions. On Thursday, the 11th inst., a meeting was held in New York of the trustees of the Bible Institute, Chicago; Mount Hermon School for Young Men; and the Seminary for Young Women, at Northfield. Among those present were: Will R. Moody, the eldest son of the evangelist; A. P. Fitt, his son-in-law; Rev. R. A. Torrey, superintendent of the Chicago Institute; H. M. Moore, president of the Northfield Seminary; Colonel J. J. Janeway, president of the Institute at Mount Hermon; J. J. Estey, of Brattleboro', Vt.; C. A. Hopkins, of Boston; Fleming H. Revell, of Chicago; Ira D. Sankey, of Brooklyn; D. W. McWilliams, of Brooklyn; J. D. Cutter, of New York; C. H. Bailey, of Winthrop, Me.; and Charles R. Otis, of Yonkers.

The meeting lasted for three hours, and it was formally resolved to continue the work. To this end a Moody Memorial Endowment was established, with the following Advisory Committee: Messrs. William E. Dodge, James Talcott, Morris K. Jesup, Anson Phelps Stokes, jun., D. W. McWilliams, D. Willis James, John S. Kennedy, and Ira D. Sankey, all of New York; John H. Converse and John Wanamaker, of Philadelphia; C. A. Hopkins, of Boston; Francis White, of Baltimore; and E. G. Keith, Cyrus McCormick, and Victor Lawson, of Chicago.

It was decided to appeal to the public to subscribe the three million dollars required to provide the endowment. Mr. McWilliams was selected treasurer, and Messrs. Wm. E. Dodge, James Talcott, and Morris K. Jesup were appointed the Committee on Investment, to take charge of moneys and invest them as received. Lord Overtoun (Glasgow) and Mr. T. A. Denny (London) were selected to co-operate with the American Committee in raising money in England and the colonies.

Scottish Notes.

At the monthly conference of the Ayrshire Christian Union, held at Irvine, the subject was "The Glory of God." Provost Logan (Troon) presided, and the other speakers were Mr. John Climie (Glasgow), Mr. William C. Gray (President of the Union, Ayr), Rev. Hugh Macluskey (Irvine), and Mr. James Cumming (evangelist of the Union).

In the person of Mr. John Vallance there has passed away one of the leaders of the temperance movement in Edinburgh. When the 1851 Exhibition was proposed the support given to it in Scotland was largely due to his efforts, and when the idea of opening it on Sabbath was mooted he organized a vigorous opposition. Joining the Total Abstinence Society in 1854, he has taken a prominent place in such work ever since, and to his excellent arrangements was due much of the success of Mr. John B. Gough's crusade in the city. He was the first president of the Band of Hope Union, and an elder of the New North Free Church.

Lord Provost Chisholm presided at the annual meeting, in Glasgow, of the Scottish Navvy Mission. From the report submitted by Sir Archibald S. L. Campbell, Bart., of Succoth, it appeared that an addition of four has been made during the year to the staff of paid missionaries, making the number eleven. There are, however, several works in progress at which missionaries might be placed with advantage, were the necessary funds obtainable.

A Christian conference was held last Saturday in the rooms of the Y.M.C.A., Perth, when there was a large attendance. Rev. J. J. Glen Kippen, of Pitcairngreen, presided, the subject being "The Work of God." Interesting and instructive addresses were given by Rev. J. Murray, Edinburgh: Rev. Mr. Benson, Dundee; and Rev. A Murray, Fossoway.

Colonel McHardy, C.B., presided last week over a meeting of the Edinburgh Local Committee, appointed in September last, to consider the advisability of opening a Labour Home in connection with the Church Army. Final steps were taken for the purchase of a house, that an effort may be made at once to meet a want long felt in the city.

Following up the meetings of the Evangelistic Campaign in Cowcaddens Free Church, Glasgow, a fruitful mission has just been held by Mr. Samuel Mackenzie (of Campbeltown), whose addresses—aided by the effective Gospel singing of his daughter—have reached classes not touched by the previous meetings.

At the annual meeting of the Glasgow Y.W.C.A., held last week, Lord Overtoun estimated that only about one-tenth of the church members of the city were actively doing anything whatever for the cause of the Kingdom of Christ. The report showed a membership of 2,703, with thirty-nine branches in operation, including the Union for Hospital Nurses, the Teacher's Branch, and two junior branches for girls under fifteen years of age. One branch had been added during the year.

A correspondence in a Glasgow newspaper, on the evils of Sunday trading, has elicited the following statement: "A shopkeeper in Govan admitted publicly quite recently that Sunday School children were his best customers, and returned an empty collection-box belonging to the church school near at hand, that had been found on his premises, its contents having been extracted and spent."

United Mission Services.—The tent campaigns of last year, conducted in connection with the South London Christian Union, will be long remembered as times of spiritual blessing and stirring experience. Since the closing of the Peckham Tent the Union have continued the work in various chapels, mission halls, and in the open air. The labours of Rev. J. T. Vine, Mr. Chas. Cook, Mr. Ned Wright, and others have been owned and abundantly blessed of God. The representatives of many churches have united in the work for the Master, and it is gratifying to learn that the membership of the Union is largely increasing; but its funds are not in so flourishing condition as is desirable. The secretary—Mr. William Hardwick, Conference Hall, 43, High Street, Peckham, S.E.—will forward copies of the annual report and other information.

The Salvation Army.

The annual gathering in connection with the women's social work of the Salvation Army was held on Tuesday evening last at the Holborn Restaurant. Viscount Hampden, who presided, testified to the good work accomplished by the Army in New South Wales. There must be, the speaker contended, something true and spiritually divine in a teaching which induced so many hundreds of men and women to devote their lives to the relief of misery and distress. The Salvation Army had earned the support of all classes of people, because the work which it did was a necessary work. He had visited some of the Salvation Army shelters, where an admirable work was being done amongst the very poorest class.

Mrs. Bramwell Booth presented a satisfactory report of the year's work. About 1,600 women, the great majority of them being amongst the most abandoned and desperate characters, had been cared for each day, and 2,129 women had passed through the rescue homes. At the lodging-houses and shelters for the homeless there had been 228,932 attendances; 300 homeless women had been rescued and taken away from their surroundings, and 267 women had been received into the homes from prison. She appealed for £12,000 for the extension of the work. Mrs. Commissioner Booth-Tucker, who with her husband is in charge of the Army's operations in the United States, added an interesting account of progress made in the social work. Other speakers included Sir John Coclburn and Mr. T. A. Denny.

Ragged School Union New Offices.

The late Lord Shaftesbury was wont to regard the operations of the Ragged School Union as representing the chief work of his life; and for very many years two rooms at Exeter Hall sufficed as the headquarters of the secretary and his working staff. A few years ago more extended accommodation was secured in Norfolk Street, Strand; but the continuous expansion of the operations carried on under Mr. John Kirk have rendered necessary still larger premises at 32, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.

The lease of a substantial house—three floors and a basement—has been granted by Sir Roger Doughty Tichborne, the proprietor of the estate; and the old-time family residence will afford all of the additional accommodation, which, for some time past, has been urgently needed. The spacious drawing-room on the first floor will serve admirably as the Council Chamber, Mr. W. J. Orsman, J.P., being chairman for the present year. Here conferences, prayer-meetings, &c., will also be held. The dining-room, will serve as an office for the superintendent of the cripple department. The secretary's and other offices are on the ground floor; while the covered-in garden space gives ample room for the storage of clothing, &c., as well as for those who are engaged in the distribution.

The neighbourhood is rich in memories of Christian service. The earliest Ragged School centres in the earlier forties, when the work began, were situated in the vicinity; and close at hand, the saintly Baptist Noel carried on his memorable ministry, the chapel being still there. All well-wishers of the Union will be glad to find the working-staff so conveniently housed at a time when the work is expanding. Many liberal supporters, including the late Duke of Westminster, have lately passed away; and the general receipts show some shrinkage in consequence of the large demand made on the public by the War, Widows', Orphans', and Refugees' Fund.

Tunbridge Wells.—The New Year gatherings in connection with the Bible Mission Halls were held on Thursday last. In the afternoon a Bible lecture was delivered at John Street Hall by Mr. James Sprunt, on "The Prospect of the Believer." A crowded meeting was subsequently held in the large hall in St. John's Road, when Dr. Eugene Cronin, of Clapham, presided. Addresses were delivered by Capt. Baring, Mr. James Sprunt, Mr. J. A. Brown, and Pastor John M. McAuliffe.

Christian Endeavour.

TOPIC FOR JAN. 28.

LESSONS FOR SIMON AND US.—Luke vii. 36-50.

OUR Lord was anointed twice in his life: here by one who had greatly sinned; and at last, before his death, by one of the noblest of her sex. Thus saintliness and sinnership are alike attracted to Him, and find their loftiest office in the expression of love to his dear Person. Christian experience is something like a spiral staircase, by which we come back and back to the same position, but on a higher round.

There are three persons in this matchless story who stand for types of the love of God, the way it operates, the manner in which it is received or rejected, and the consequences of its rejection.

The first is our blessed Lord Himself. In his parable He declares the frankness and freeness of God's forgiveness. The debtors had nothing wherewith to pay, but it mattered nought, each was immediately and utterly forgiven. Let us remember also that Jesus teaches us that the love of God is not turned away by our impurity and sin: it lingers around us in spite of all our transgression, not spurning us, not drawing the robes of austere piety around its person; but welcoming the most degraded to touch, and kiss, and weep their tears upon its person. And Jesus teaches us also that when we love He expects us to serve, that He looks for the manifestation of the devotion that fills our hearts. May it not be a solemn question to us all whether we have not rather resembled Simon than the woman? He has expected water for his feet and oil for his head, but He has looked for them in vain; He has passed by, disappointed of his cherished hopes; his wounded love has returned to his own heart unrequited. Surely those of us who have had many proofs of the love of Christ may well be ashamed that we have given Him so little service and devoted requital.

The second figure in the story is the woman. Her sins, which were many, were forgiven. Not because she loved much—we must never think that for the sake of our love God will pass over our sin. Christ means that her love was the proof that her sin was forgiven. We say, for instance, the woman is in distress, for she weeps; we do not mean that the weeping is the reason for the distress, but it is the means by which we are convinced that there is distress. So this woman's love showed that she had experienced the forgiveness of sin.

Take your sinful heart to Christ, and realize his forgiving love. He says to you, as He had probably said to her, "Come unto Me and I will give you rest," and when He has spoken the word of pardon in your soul, love will well up like a spring from the depths of the earth, and show itself in what you will do, if not for Him, at least for those whom He has made his heirs, for inasmuch as we minister to the poor and suffering, He tells us we do it unto Him. Our box of ointment is our heart; its contents are not very sweet or precious, yet let us give Him them as they are; and, as we offer them, they will be transmuted into the rarest and choicest perfume. We do not feel our sins, or weep for them, until after we have realized Christ's forgiving love; we dread the punishment they deserve, but we never break into sobs for the sinfulness of sin until we have seen how much it costs our Saviour.

The third figure is Simon himself, respectable in life, rigid in morals, unquestionable in orthodoxy, but utterly destitute of love. Let us avoid the religiousness which consists in ritual, or the repetition of orthodox creeds. Let us never rest until Christ has broken these hard hearts, and penetrated the crusted ice of a mere externalism, to open fountains of devotion which will flow for ever. F. B. M.

SUNDRY NOTES.

The Presidential Meetings last week were held at Exeter and Cardiff. Mr. Meyer was accompanied by Miss M. Jennie Street and Rev. Richard Richard, of Bristol.

In the Australasian Christian Endeavour Union there are now 1,800 Societies, with a total membership of 60,000 young people. Rev. Joseph and Mrs. Walker, of Ipswich, Queensland, have been appointed as delegates to the 1900 World's Convention in London.

Amongst the speakers who have already promised to be present at the Convention are—Principal Handley Moule, Dr. Monro Gibson, Dr. Clifford, and Mr. Arnold F. Hills. America will be represented by Rev. Dr. Babcock, of New York; Rev. William Paterson, of Toronto; Bishop Arnelt and Bishop Walters, two coloured bishops; Rev. Dr. Lorimer, Rev. C. M. Sheldon, and Mr. Ira D. Sankey.

The great watchword of the Convention will be "The Old Power for the New Age."

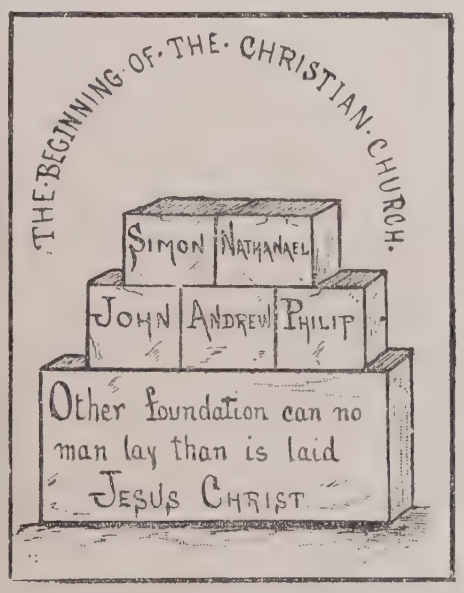
"The first disciples of Jesus."—John i. 35-46.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"They followed Him."—John i. 37.

INTRODUCTION.

JOHN THE BAPTIST, who was baptizing people in the river Jordan, one day saw Jesus Christ pass by, and he said, "Behold the Lamb of God" (verses 28-29). The next day the same thing happened (verses 35-36), and two of the Baptist's disciples named John and Andrew heard what he said and they followed Jesus (verse 37). (Golden Text).



Key to the Diagram.—In our lesson to-day the first five men who came to Jesus are brought before us, and thus commenced the building of the Christian Church, which will not be completed till Christ comes again. All Christians are stones in that great temple. Are you one? Jesus Christ is the true and only foundation (1 Cor. iii. 11).

THEY SAW FOLLOWED ABODE WITH
BROUGHT OTHERS TO JESUS

Verse 36. "Behold the Lamb of God." (They saw Jesus). The two disciples John and Andrew were with John the Baptist when he said these words, and in verse 36 it says "looking upon Jesus," so that all their eyes were directed towards Him, and they "saw Jesus." By the title John gave Christ, we can only believe he saw more deeply into the Messiah's real character than many people.

Trace "Lamb of God" through the Bible from the solemn service of the Passover Feast (Ex. xii. 1-14) to the "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev. xiii. 8), and all through the Book of Revelation.

Verse 37. They followed Jesus. They wanted to know more about Him. See them quietly going after Him. Verse 38. "And Jesus turned" (to encourage), and He spoke. Did not "their hearts burn within them," as in Luke xxiv. 32? Jesus always notices the least sign of any heart wanting to get near Him, longing to hear Him speak his peace to their soul. "Jesus turned" (to rebuke) in Luke xxii. 61.

To see Jesus by faith (Gal. ii. 20) is the first thing, to believe He is the real Saviour; and the second is to follow Him, to listen for his voice, to talk with Him. (John x. 27.)

There must be no "but" about the following (Luke ix. 57-62). It must be "straightway" and "left all" (Mark i. 18).

Verse 39. They abode with Jesus. After the "seeing" and "following" comes the "abiding" (see John xiv. 23; xv. 4), and the prayer that will rise to our lips the more we realise these grand promises will be "Abide with us" (Luke xxiv. 28-29).

Verse 41. What joy rings out. "We have found the Messiah," and what joy it always brings when we each one to-day find the Messiah too. Not only joy, but "rest" (Matt. xi. 28) and "peace" (John xiv. 27).

Verses 40-45. They brought others to Jesus. What a history in these few short verses. Andrew in his new-found joy goes at once to his own brother Simon.

Verses 41, 42. Think of the result afterwards given us, especially in the Book of Acts, of bringing this one man Peter to the Lord Jesus. "Home first," but how difficult to witness in our homes, to tell brothers and sisters what Jesus is to us, and yet what Andrew did we can do. See others Andrew brought to Christ (John vi. 8-9; xii. 20-22).

Verses 43-45. Philip no sooner believes in Christ than he goes to his friend, Nathanael, and tells him and brings him to Jesus. Philip's words come to us to-day to "come and see" for ourselves what Christ will be to us.

Verse 46. Therefore "come and see" in Him the—Christ of GOD (verse 41).
Only-Begotten of the FATHER (verse 14).
Messiah (verse 41).
Emmanuel—"GOD with us" (verse 14).
AND
Son of GOD (verse 49).
Everlasting Light (verse 9).
Everlasting Life (verse 4).

LESSONS WE LEARN.

1. To see in Jesus our own personal Saviour.
2. To follow Him, by reading our Bible to learn the way.
3. To abide with Him, and talk to Him in prayer.
4. To tell others about Him, at home and abroad.

This is the way to be a stone in God's Temple.

MR. AND MRS. OATTS' TOUR.

MR. W. M. OATTS writes from Bombay, under date January 2: "Mrs. Oatts and I reached Bombay on December 23. The Conference of Y.M.C.A. general secretaries was held at Lanowli, a lovely village in the Ghaut mountains. There were present Messrs. R. P. Wilder, J. Campbell White, D. McConaughy, G. S. Eddy, J. H. Oldham, Frank Anderson, Oliver H. McCowan, Dr. J. Rutter Williamson, and several others. The Conference was practical and deeply spiritual. The men in India are face to face with a great problem in endeavouring to win the young manhood of this great empire for Christ. Vigorous work is being carried on in several of the colleges, and there is a longing desire on the part of the workers to see conversions to God. The field is enormous. Only at a few central points is work being carried on, and the National Committee long for more workers to come out and possess the land for Jesus. Money is also required for their support; shall that not also be forthcoming?

"The Indian National Conference met in Bombay from December 28 to January 1. Sixty-six representatives gathered from various parts of the Empire, many of them travelling over 1,400 miles to be present. One of the interesting and striking features of the gathering was the number of native delegates, men of ability and education, all greatly interested in the spiritual welfare of the young men of their country. The subjects discussed at the Conference were very similar to those we are accustomed to at home, but to most of the delegates they were fresh and full of interest.

"The Y.M.C.A. has developed greatly during the past ten years. To-day there are 125 Associations, with a membership of 5,300. The property owned is valued at £42,000."

The Tottenham Association, which held its annual meeting on Wednesday evening, the 17th inst., under the presidency of Mr. J. Cloudesley, J.P., has done good work during the past year.

The city of Glasgow is co-operating in the movement of the Soldiers' Christian Association among the troops in South Africa by sending out three workers with a well-equipped tent, and through the help of Miss Sands, two further workers are proceeding from Belfast, one of whom is Mr. D. A. Black, the well-known general secretary of the Belfast City Y.M.C.A.

News is to hand of the annual conference of Association secretaries in India. There are now no fewer than twenty-five men giving their whole time to the work there: eight American, seven native, six British, and four Eurasian. One hundred and twenty-five Associations are in existence, and although the work is surrounded by great difficulties, the look-out is brighter to-day than ever it has been.

Mr. Thos. Ostler, of Bristol, has given in the Y.M.C.A. Monthly Record of that city some interesting reminiscences of the meetings held in Bristol by the late Mr. D. L. Moody, in 1867.

Paris.—The helpful institutions, so familiar under the title of "Miss Leigh's Homes," continue to exercise a beneficial influence upon the English and American girls who for business or pleasure visit the French capital. During the forthcoming Exhibition many girls will need help and guidance. Communications may be addressed to Mrs. Brewer, 34, Westwick Gardens, Kensington, W.

The Wreck of the "Caspian."

"The Lord will save us."

THE big steam yacht, Sagamore, which recently arrived in New York harbour, bore a number of trophies from wrecked Spanish cruisers off Santiago; but she also carried a far more precious freight in the person of Captain Gordon, his wife, and little daughter, and the crew of the brigantine Caspian, who were rescued just as their battered hulk was about to sink.

It happened that some hours after leaving Hamilton, Bermuda, Captain Sherlock, of the Sagamore, was on the bridge of his yacht when the second mate called his attention to what he thought was a steamer about six miles away. The captain, through his glasses, saw a dismasted sailing vessel displaying a signal of distress. He at once bore down on her, and found the Caspian rolling, water-logged, and apparently in imminent danger of sinking. The cutter was instantly manned, and was alongside the wreck in a few minutes. The captain's daughter, little Helen Gordon, four years old, was first handed from the wreck into the boat. She cried for her papa to be taken with her, and it was only when she was assured that he would be quite safe that she consented to go. Her mother followed her, and then the crew, the captain being the last to leave the vessel.

Mrs. Gordon subsequently told the story of their terrible experiences. "We left Charlottetown, Prince Edward's Island," she said, "bound for Jacksonville, and all went well until we were struck by a cyclone. It was about eleven o'clock at night when the blow came. It was more like thunder than wind. We were thrown down, and I and my little one lay in darkness in the cabin for hours, expecting every moment that the vessel would sink. When one of the crew made his way to the cabin window asking for the captain, I made up my mind that my husband was gone, and I gave up all hope. He came to us later, however, and when morning broke and we were able to go on deck, I saw that every stick of rigging had been carried away, and the falling spars had torn great holes in the decks.

"Fortunately we did not lack water, and we were provisioned for three months, but we had no means of cooking food save over the little stove in the cabin. On the following day we sighted a steamer, but although we were in plain view she disregarded our signals and proceeded on her way. A few days later we saw a schooner, but she also passed us by, and on Thursday, the day before we were picked up, a barque, apparently Norwegian, passed us close without paying any attention to us. I had comforted my little Helen by telling her that the Lord would save us, and the dear child's first inquiry on being taken on the Sagamore was, 'Is the Lord aboard, mamma?' I told her that the Lord had indeed saved us, as I told her he would do, and then seeing my husband and his men crowding around the owner of the Sagamore to thank him, she innocently asked, 'Is that the Lord, mamma?'" Selected.

From an Armenian Orphan.

DEAR UNCLE TOM,—We like looking for the texts you give in The Christian very much; and when we told our superintendent so, she asked if we would not like to write and tell you. Hence I am writing, and I think our teacher will put my letter into English for you.

There are seventy-five of us orphans in this home. We are very grateful to the kind friends in England and Ireland who have sent money for us. Before I came here, I knew nothing about God; but now I am trying to do what will please Him.

On Sunday mornings we go to Sunday School; in the afternoon to church; and in the evening we have a happy time with our superintendent, who is from England. She gives us the questions from The Christian one Sunday, and we find them for the next. We all have to learn a text from the Bible; we older girls have to teach the little ones where to find them.

We would be so glad if you would send us a letter. We think the little English girls and boys must be very happy having a page for themselves in The Christian every week.—Your loving niece, Aruseak Killisyan.

About Books.

FEELING AFTER GOD.

THE story of the Telugu Mission is one of the most remarkable in the annals of the Church. It has been told again and again, and we welcome a book which, although it does not unfold the marvellous narrative, yet gives us important facts bearing on the reception of the Gospel by one of the humblest and most despised of the pariah tribes of South India. The Madigas are the leather workers in the Telugu country, and for centuries they have tanned hides, sewed sandals, prepared leather buckets for the wells of the Sudras, and made trappings for their bullocks. Emma Rauschenbusch-Clough, Ph.D., wife of a distinguished missionary to the Telugus, shows us that this poor people have long been feeling after God, and in view of their life-absorbing occupation, she has entitled her book While Sewing Sandals. (6s. Hodder & Stoughton.) In rehearsing legends and tales, gathered from the people, regarding their history and cults, she occupies ground in a large degree untrodden. The curse which so long seemed to rest upon the community is accounted for, and the hope inspired by the Gospel is set forth in the light of providential leadings that are as wonderful as they are patent. In brief, Mrs. Clough tells the story of the "Indian Pentecost," since which one part of the Telugu country has been virtually Christianized. The mass movement of the people, demanding Baptism in token of their faith in Christ, took place in 1878, when 3,536 persons were baptized in three days, and 9,636 added to the Church at Dugole in the course of twelve months. Mrs. Clough's book is entertaining as well as instructive, and it is not alone in showing that, in very strange ways the ground is Divinely prepared for the reception of the Gospel seed.

ANNUAL VOLUMES.

Many plain talks of spiritual value are to be found in Foots-eps of Truth. A useful feature is the Bible studies, practical expositions, and suggestive notes. (2s. John F. Shaw & Co.)

The twenty-seventh volume of The King's Highway contains many thoughtful messages on the doctrines of grace and in promotion of scriptural holiness. Its pages will minister instruction, help, and counsel. (2s. 6d. Marshall Bros.)

The annual volume of "The Herald of Mercy," is entitled The Pilot's Warning (1s. Morgan & Scott). There are many budgets of reading for the people, but this has its distinctive qualities. First, it is made up of brief articles; and secondly, whether prose or poetry, the contents all aim at spiritual ends. In a word, this is an evangelistic periodical, and in volume form is a quiver of arrows sent forth in faith and prayer to bring men and women to Christ and his service.

Regions Beyond was never more readable and useful than to-day. It represents growing activities in a singularly attractive manner. The title page describes it as the organ of the R.B. Missionary Union, with its associated colleges and missions in Congo-Balololand, Peru, and Argentina. The volume containing last year's parts is rich in missionary facts and arguments, and there are chapters from the life-story of the late Mrs. Guinness. Altogether this volume is as readable as its subject-matter is important from the point of view of all who realize the binding urgency of the Lord's command to preach the Gospel to every creature. (Partridge & Co.)

It is good news for preachers and Christian workers in many lands to learn that there is no sign of the giving-out of the stock of sermons by the late C. H. Spurgeon. The discourses are still being issued weekly, and there are several hundreds of manuscripts, hitherto unpublished, in the hands of Messrs. Passmore & Alabaster. We welcome the volume containing the periodical issues of last year—The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit, vol. XLV. It is expected that the entire series will number more than fifty annual volumes. This latest has all the wealth and utility of its predecessors. The expositions which accompany the sermons are sure to prove of service to many. (7s.)

Humane interests could hardly be advocated more effectively than they are by The Animals' Friend, edited by Mr. Sidney G. Trist. The duty of men and women towards what we call "the lower creation" is interpreted in the light of the undoubted rights of beings that suffer as much from want of thought as they do from want of heart on the part of those who assert the rule over them. These pages not only reprove the cruel and instruct the ignorant, but they also courteously address those who know but are neglectful. The annual volume is a library of information, admirably illustrated; rural scenes and activities, reproduced from photographs, brighten the pages and add to their attractiveness. (Cloth, 2s. 6d. G. Bell & Sons.)

Hymns and their Writers, by B. S. Olding, is a pamphlet that will please many, even although not able to agree with some of the opinions expressed. (4d. Elliot Stock.)

Messrs. Gall & Inglis have issued a new and enlarged edition of the Rev. James Gall's Easy Guide to the Constellations, with a Miniature Atlas of the Stars. (1s.) The maps are remarkably distinct.

Dr. Haydn Brown has written a remarkable booklet, entitled Worry, and How to Avoid it. (3d. James Bowden.) The pages may bring a message of mental peace to many a distracted reader.

Dr. Joseph Parker's booklet, Gambling in Various Aspects, is now in its fourth edition. (3d. James Bowden.) It is a denunciation of a great sin, and more; principles of truth and righteousness are set forth in a striking light.

The singularly interesting volume on The Precious Stones of the Bible (3s. 6d. Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.) described in our last issue, is by Dr. Edward Clapton (not Clayton, as stated in error). During many years past Dr. Clapton has been giving attention to the fascinating subject to which his book is devoted.

Gospel Extracts from C. H. Spurgeon is a book with a title fully descriptive of its contents. The extracts are over three-score in number, and they cover the solemn ground of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come. Saints and sinners alike will find something for themselves in these pages. (1s. Passmore & Alabaster.)

In Journeyings Oft is a new publication from the Church Missionary Society (1s. 6d.) It is a collection of chapters on travelling in foreign lands, written by missionaries, and provided with a preface by the Bishop of Athabasca. The pages convey much information, and should foster in the minds of the young a growing interest in the work of spreading Gospel light in the dark places of the earth.

"He Goeth Before": In Memoriam Linda Rochford Wade. These pages outline a story full of tender pathos. They are from the pen of the sister of a beloved missionary to the Chinese women; and we cordially echo the words of Irene H. Barnes, in the preface, that it is "the record of one who proved that whole-hearted surrender to God is indeed a happy and fruitful thing." (1s. Marshall Bros.)

Pastor Archibald G. Brown has collected ten of his striking sermons in a little volume, entitled In the Valley of Decision. (1s. James Bowden). In the preface Mr. Brown says of the discourses: "The one aim in preaching them was to 'save some,' and this is the only desire in their present publication." The sermons are animated reading, and a serious evangelistic purpose runs through the pages.

The Vision of Christ, by Rev. William Miller, of Lenzie, Glasgow, is a singularly impressive little book. What it is to see Christ, and what the vision should effect in those who experience it, are among the points presented. The book is beautiful as well as instructive. Every page is charged with spiritual light and stimulus. (1s. nett. Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.)

Messrs. Partridge have published in a neat booklet, entitled Songs of the Christian Life, upwards of a hundred hymns by Dr. Newman Hall. Whether expounding a Scripture portion, expressing some truth of doctrine or practice, or addressing God in prayer and praise, many of these pieces are as welcome as they are good. They may be read as well as sung, and doubtless many who cannot lift up the voice will lift up the heart in their perusal. (6d.).

In A Public School Boy, Mrs. L. T. Meade tells the story of Harry Scholfield Wristbridge. He will long be remembered at Dulwich College. The parents of other school boys will read the pages with sympathetic interest. Testimony is borne, by the way, to the spiritual fruitfulness of the summer camps at Highcliffe. The lad wished to be a missionary, but he died in his eighteenth year. His life was a sermon, of which this simple story is a welcome echo. (1s. 6d. Nisbet.)

Several years ago Rev. Dr. John Smith, of Edinburgh, addressed a gathering of young men on the important subject of Christian character. Subsequently, he developed his views in a series of articles. Now, at length, he amplifies and completes his studies, and gives them to the world in a volume entitled, Christian Character as a Social Power. (3s. 6d. Hodder & Stoughton.) The first part of the book deals with preparation for service, the second with Christian character at work in the social spheres. The book enunciates great principles, and is calculated to excite noble ambitions. It is suggestive and stimulating, and we trust it will have many readers.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons have added several valuable books to their series of business helps. First comes Commercial Correspondence and Commercial English, which is full and practical. Then we have what is virtually a phonographic edition of the same, entitled Shorthand Commercial Correspondence, a good book admirably printed. All the letters contained in these are reproduced, accompanied by additional matter, in French Commercial Correspondence and German Commercial Correspondence. Young people entering upon business life will find these manuals of great service, and some of their elders would be the better for studying the correspondence models and other instructions. (Cloth, 2s. 6d. each.)

The Story Books of Little Gidding: being the Religious Dialogues recited in the Great Room, 1631-32. From the original manuscript of Nicholas Ferrar. With an introduction by E. Cruwys Sharland. (6s. Seeley & Co.) It is with the consent of the present representatives of the family that these records are published for the first time in their entirety. A quaint interest attaches to every page, even the smallest personal details having an important historical relation after the lapse of 260 years. The story of the original books is outlined, and a hope is held out of the eventual publication of other volumes. As a frontispiece there is a highly-finished portrait of Ferrar, and several other illustrations are a valuable embellishment.

In modern literature of an experimental character, a high place must be assigned to the works of the Bishop of Liverpool. Dr. Ryle is one of the soundest of theologians, and in spiritual succession to the giants of the Reformation and the great teachers of Puritan days. One of his many useful works is that entitled Holiness: Its Nature, Hindrances, Difficulties, and Roots. We welcome a fifth enlarged edition. Whether viewing the subject by preference from moderate Calvinist or evangelical Arminian standpoints, thoughtful readers will find this a singularly suggestive book. The pages (500 in number) are eminently practical, and several of the papers included are enriched by notes and supplementary extracts from the writings of the Puritans. (2s. 6d. nett. C. J. Thynne.)

There have been many books written to "improve" the Church's year; but we have met none more suggestive in teaching and more instructive in character than The King and his Servants, by E. M. Dewhurst (5s. Elliot Stock.) The author has aimed at showing the harmony of the Scriptures appointed for the Church Services of each Sunday, including the Epistle, Gospel, and Proper Lessons for the day, also the Collect; and has desired to apply the truths thus harmonized to the practical and daily walk of Christian people. The chapters are short, and may be found suitable for Sunday evening readings in the family. Although following method, the work is in no sense mechanical. Happy the home in which the Lord's Day concludes under the influence of such teaching as is presented in these pages.

Illustrative matter is of great service to preachers and other public speakers. There are many collections of such material, but to a large extent they cover common ground, and present time-honoured stories in the company of such as are more modern. To command fresh points and incidents, there is nothing for it but to read widely in biographical and general literature. Some cannot face this task, and for them in particular Rev. J. F. B. Tinling has laboured in the compilation of his new volume, Pulpit Points from Latest Literature: A Thousand Illustrations for Preachers and Teachers. (5s. Hodder & Stoughton.) Mr. Tinling gives a list of the principal works of travel and biography, as well as other books not so easily classified, which he has read, and there is every evidence that periodical literature was subjected to the same process of "taking the cream." Sources are indicated with precision, and there are topical and textual indexes. The work is an admirable supplement to Mr. Tinling's well-known "Fifteen Hundred Facts and Similes for Pulpit and Platform."

We are informed that a work will shortly be published by Samuel Bagster & Sons, Limited, which will supply the long-felt want of accurate marginal dates for the Bible, derived from the Bible itself.

In CALLED WONDERFUL, Mr. Avary W. H. Forbes, M.A., deals with cause and effect as seen in Christ. The pages convey no uncertain sound in their refutation of agnosticism and scepticism, and in their strong vindication of the omnipotence of the despised Outcast of the Jewish race. (2d. Partridge.)

The sermon on ROMAN CATHOLICISM AND NATIONAL LIFE preached at Portman Chapel by Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas on November 5 last, is issued in tract form. Mr. Thomas adduces scriptural warrants for Protestant doctrine, and forcibly contends for the cardinal principles, loyalty to, and liberty in, Christ. (1d. Partridge.)

The Gentlewoman is issuing as weekly supplements a series of autograph photogravure portraits of THE HEADS OF THE CHURCHES. Each picture measures 15in. by 11in. on fine paper, and they are chiefly from portraits taken specially, and never before published. They form an interesting set for framing or to keep in a portfolio. The Personages represented are: Church of England—The Archbishop of Canterbury, Dean Farrar, and the Bishop of Stepney; Roman Catholic—Cardinal Vaughan; Baptist—Dr. Clifford; Presbyterian—Dr. John Watson; Congregationalist—Dr. Joseph Parker; Jewish—The Chief Rabbi. (6d. weekly. Office: Arundel Street, Strand.)

Obituary.

REV. J. R. COTTER.

THE death of Rev. J. R. Cotter, rector of St. Mary Magdalene, Colchester, removes a devoted evangelical clergyman and an ardent supporter of the Protestant party in the English Church. On succeeding to the charge at St. Mary Magdalene, Mr. Cotter made some radical changes in the church services and decorations, but the attendances largely increased. Previous to going to Colchester, Mr. Cotter was for about twenty years rector of Winterbourne, Dorset.

REV. CANON TWELLS.

The death is announced, at Bournemouth, of Rev. Henry Twells, at the age of seventy-seven. After labouring for some years, first as a curate and afterwards in connection with educational work, he was appointed, in 1870, to the rectory of Baldock, Herts. Subsequently he was rector of Waltham-in-the-Wolds, Leicestershire, and became honorary canon of Peterborough in 1884. He was widely esteemed as the author of a number of hymns, of which the best known is the tender, spiritual, "At even, ere the sun was set."

MR. T. H. OLNEY.

The death of Mr. Thomas Harding Olney deprives the Metropolitan Tabernacle and its institutions of a most generous supporter. As deacon and treasurer of the church, he was unsparing in his devotion to the work. On the death of Dr. James Spurgeon, he accepted the office of treasurer of the Stockwell Orphanage, and in connection with the Baptist Missionary Society and other organizations his sympathy and practical aid were unfailing. As treasurer of the Tabernacle Rebuilding Fund, Mr. Olney's intense desire was to see the restored structure opened free of debt, and his contributions to that end were on a generous scale. He will be greatly missed, too, by struggling churches in various parts of the country, which have been the subject of his kindly aid. He was intensely loyal both to his own pastor and church and to the Baptist body, and will be deeply mourned by many.

Personalia.

Rev. Dr. Angus has completed his eighty-fourth year. It is satisfactory to know that the venerable Baptist minister is still in the enjoyment of excellent health.

Our readers will be glad to learn that, according to the latest news respecting Sir George Williams, the esteemed patient is making gradual progress towards recovery.

Mr. John Lampard, founder of the Balaghat Mission to Gonds and Baigas, India, is at present in England, and will be glad of opportunities to represent the needs of these aboriginal hill peoples at drawing-room or other meetings. Address: J. Lampard, 114, Clapton Common, London, N.E.

Rev. Robert and Mrs. Wallace, of the Marchmont Home, Belleville, Ontario, have arrived in England, and expect to take out a party of boys in the early spring. They report that there is plenty of room and good prospects for any number of boys and girls in Canada. Their London address is care of the China Inland Mission, Newington Green, N.

Scattering Abroad.—The Hampshire Village Mission, which operates amongst the outlying hamlets and country districts of Dorsetshire, Hants, and Sussex, has during the past year been attended with encouraging success. The work of promoting the circulation of the Scripture and Christian literature, the visitation of the aged, sick, and dying, the scattering of the "seed of the Kingdom" broadcast by preaching in halls, barns, cottages, and the open air, has been well maintained. The combat with error and false doctrine, callous indifference, needless to say, has been severe. But in spite of this spiritual desolation and darkness, the workers look forward with hopeful expectancy to the future, encouraged with what has already been accomplished in the Master's name, and relying upon his servants for prayerful and practical sympathy. Communications for the superintendent of the Mission should be addressed, Mr. John Hasell Charlton, Mission House, Fareham.

TOWER HAMLETS MISSION.

AN UNSOLICITED TESTIMONY.

Mr. JOHN WOOD, Hon. Sec. of the Evangelisation Society, recently said, "that he was very glad to have the opportunity of publicly testifying to the enormous good accomplished by Mr. Charrington's Mission. That of all the Halls in London where Evangelistic Work was carried on, the Great Assembly Hall was far ahead of any other, as the testimony of his various correspondents from all parts of the Globe went to show."

Funds are exhausted, and help will be gratefully received by

THE AUTHORISED LIFE OF D. L. MOODY.

In accord with the express desire of the late Mr. MOODY, a Biography is now being prepared by his son, Mr. W. R. MOODY, which will be published in the interests of the Northfield Institutions founded by him. In view of the errors in some publications professing to outline Mr. Moody's life, the family is discouraging unofficial biographical efforts. The preparation of this Biography will necessarily occupy a considerable time; but to meet the present demand, Mr. W. R. Moody is editing a

SHORTER LIFE OF D. L. MOODY

OF WHICH DUE NOTICE WILL BE GIVEN WHEN READY.

In the preparation of this work the Author will have the co-operation of his father's associates, and will deal, as fully as space will permit, with the leading features of Mr. Moody's career, and give descriptions of the various Institutions and organizations which, under God, owe their origin to the great evangelist.

URGENT.

To complete the Good Samaritan Work of the

"Liberator" Relief Fund.

After seven years' earnest pleading, a further £10,000, or 200,000 shillings, still urgently needed to give relief to hundreds of aged, destitute, and afflicted victims of the great "Liberator" fraud, who were taught and trained in habits of temperance and thrift by their trusted leaders, only to find themselves suddenly robbed of their life-savings, and driven to face the dreaded workhouse, in spite of all their praiseworthy endeavours to make some provision for their old age.

Ninety per cent. of these sufferers are members of some section of the Christian Church.

"Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the Law of Christ.

There are 2,830 cases on the Books of the Fund, of whom 1,500 are Widows or Spinsters. 690 are over 70 years of age. 1,460 are over 60 years of age. Over 300 deaths through the disaster.

THE BITTER CRY FOR HELP

Is still coming to the Committee from sufferers who have bravely borne with their difficulties, till sickness or great destitution has compelled them to apply.

Cheques and P.O.'s should be made payable to the "Liberator" Relief Fund, crossed "The London City and Midland Bank," and sent to the Secretary,

Rev. J. STOCKWELL WATTS,
16, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.

EVERYONE SHOULD READ

"Echoes from the Liberator Prison."

Sold on behalf of the sufferers.
16, FARRINGDON STREET. 1s. post free.

The Christian says:—"The third edition of 'Echoes from the Liberator Prison' (1s., Unwin Bros.), by Rev. J. Stockwell Watts, is issued. This well-known and forcibly written book, which gives such heart-breaking accounts of the sorrows endured by those who were robbed of their support by the Liberator crash, should be helped to a wider circulation than it has yet attained."

MRS. MEREDITH'S PRISON MISSION.

258 Women were steadily employed last year.

260 GOSPEL MEETINGS WERE HELD.

Many are obtaining situations, and are living lives of sobriety and industry.

The help of annual subscriptions is urgently needed, or any contribution, however small.

Cheques and P.O.'s may be made payable to Mrs. Meredith's Institutions, and crossed "London and South-Western Bank," Stockwell Branch.

Scripture Readers in South Africa.

A COMMUNICATION received by Col. Philips, secretary of the Army Scripture Readers' and Soldiers' Friend Society, furnishes some particulars as to the movements of the Readers in South Africa. The writer, who is with the 12th Royal Lancers at Modder River, referring to the battle which took place on December 11, says:—

"I went on the field early, and remained till ambulances began to bring their ghastly loads down to our hospitals, where I thought I should be of more use. I am glad I did so, though it was dreadfully sickening work. Blood and bandaging everywhere. It was literally kneeling among the dead and dying. God wonderfully helped me physically and spiritually, and I never felt Him nearer nor had more liberty and power in preaching Christ; and how the poor maimed and mangled fellows drank in the

GLAD GOOD NEWS.

I went through every tent and out-house where the wounded were, and read and prayed in most of them. In all, the way of salvation, through simple faith in Christ, was told in as few words as possible. This I have continued to do daily.

"It was a sad, sad work, and I wished much that the Lord's people at home could have been with me, if only for one hour; they would have got a more vivid idea of the need of Army Scripture Readers than they will get from the most thrilling stories written or spoken. I am having good times, and men are praying who never prayed before; from a spiritual standpoint the prospect is good. We have a meeting just outside our lines every night, near enough for the Gospel to be heard by men in the tents.

"Numbers vary; on Sunday night there were 150 or 200 standing round. We get the mails fairly regularly, and I should be so glad if you could get some good people to send me a small packet of good, sound Gospel tracts. Large numbers of newspapers, &c., arrive, and surely numbers of God's people would help us with the more needed and useful reading-matter, treating only of 'How to be saved.' I have given away all the Sankey's hymn books I brought out, so that the men could read them in their tents and bring them to the meetings."

The Society has had the joy of sending out several Readers quite recently. Tracts and other gifts of Christian literature are gladly received and forwarded by the secretary. They should be addressed (with other communications) to the offices, 112, St. Martin's Lane, Trafalgar Square, W.C.

1,550 of the Lord's aged poor, of both sexes, and members of the various branches of the Church of Christ are now on the books; and upwards of £11,000 per annum are distributed amongst them in pensions of five, seven, and ten guineas. To meet this amount the ordinary income is inadequate. The pensioners live in all parts of the country, and most of them are upwards of seventy years of age.

In the four homes—Camberwell, Hornsey Rise, Brighton, and Stamford Hill—180 of the pensioners have peaceful and happy abodes. A visit to these buildings is invited.

FRESH CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE SOCIETY AND ASYLUMS ARE EARNESTLY SOLICITED.

WINTER APPEAL
OF THE
ST. GILES'S CHRISTIAN MISSION.

The Appeal shows how acute are the SUFFERINGS OF THE INNOCENT CHILDREN AND WIVES OF PRISONERS, and how constantly their terrible needs are being made known to, and relieved by, the Mission in various Districts and Parishes.

The Appeal also shows that

are dealt with, but that a large number of

National Waifs' Association

(Otherwise known as "DR. BARNARDO'S HOMES").

Over 5,000 Orphan or Waif Children are now in the Homes. Among these are 734 LITTLE INCURABLES, Deaf and Dumb, Blind, Crippled or otherwise Afflicted Children. EIGHT SOULS are added every 24 hours to this Great Family.

38,767 Waifs have already been rescued by the Homes. Of these 10,660 trained Boys and Girls have been successfully placed out in the Colonies, and more than 22,000 placed in Situations in Great Britain, or sent to Sea, or given Trades to.

Some conception of the extent of the work may be formed from the fact that during the last year (1899) no fewer than 3,011 Fresh Cases have been admitted—a number in itself far in excess of all the admissions of Orphan and Waif Children by all other existing Societies put together.

No really Destitute Child has ever been refused admission.

The Doors are open to the Homeless FREELY, Day and Night, all the year round. No eligible case is rejected on the ground of age, sex, creed, nationality, or physical condition, or lack of Funds.

HELP URGENTLY NEEDED. Even the Smallest Gifts will be thankfully received.

Church of England.

Mrs. Ley, of Epperstone Manor, Notts, has given a sum of £1,000 towards the erection and fitting up of an iron church in an outlying portion of St. Thomas's Parish, Derby.

On Thurs., Jan. 11, the Bishop of Islington dedicated the Mission Church of St. Saviour's, Wood Green. The building, which is very suitably appointed and fitted, accommodates 300, and has been built with a grant of £350 from the Bishop of London's fund.

Rev. W. Russell Finlay, vicar of All Saints', Camberwell, speaking on the 16th inst., at the first annual meeting of the shareholders of his "Victory" Coffee House, announced a 3½ per cent. dividend upon the money invested. He ascribed its success "firstly, secondly, and thirdly to cleanliness." It is intended in the immediate future to open fifteen other houses.

Mr. W. D. Cruddas, M.P., has (in addition to a gift of £500 to the Barbican Mission to the Jews), through the medium of Prebendary Webb-Peploe, divided £10,000 amongst the following institutions: Wycliffe Hall, Ridley Hall, the Oxford Pastorate, the Cambridge Pastorate, the Church Trust, Trent College, and Dean Close School.

The Record states, in reference to church missionary work in the Soudan: "Dr. Harpur is now in residence at Omdurman, but the prospect of definite missionary work there seems at present uncertain. The new Sirdar is, like Lord Kitchener, apprehensive of the results of any direct evangelistic approach to the Mohammedans. It is said that even the Gordon College, with its entire separation from distinctive Christian teaching, is regarded with suspicion by the natives. In the meantime the Church Missionary Society at Khartoum is able to provide some additional services for the British officers and non-commissioned officers of the Egyptian army."

Congregational.

Rev. Dr. Mackennal, of Bowden, has been appointed the Carew Lecturer at Hartford University for 1901, with "The Sources of English Congregationalism" for his subject.

At the first Communion Service of the New Year, Rev. J. W. Atkinson, Latimer Chapel, East London, gave the right hand of welcome to twenty-three new members, who, on that evening, joined the church.

The new Bon Accord Congregational Church, Aberdeen, was formally opened on Jan. 14. Rev. A. Brown preached in the morning, and Rev. Dr. Stewart in the afternoon, while the new minister of the congregation, Rev. James Ross, addressed the young people at the afternoon service.

The Congregationalists of Blackpool have opened a new chapel at Alexandra Road, South Shore. The ceremony was performed by Mr. James Wood, of Marton. At the service which followed there was a large attendance. Rev. W. Evans presided, supported by many local ministers; and Rev. T. Willis, secretary of the Lancashire Congregational Union, delivered a dedicatory address. In the evening a sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Goodrich, Manchester.

Eleven years ago a small Congregational Mission Chapel was built at White Roothing, Essex. Owing to changing circumstances, and the ruined state of an old chapel at Abbotts Roothing, it was felt that a wise and desirable step to take would be to sell that old property, and, with the money realized, form the nucleus of a fund for the enlargement of the Mission Chapel at White Roothing. It is now proposed to erect a building in front of the present one to seat 120 persons, with arrangements for including the present chapel when necessary. The people are very poor, and are struggling to raise the necessary money. The secretary is Rev. J. E. Rattee, Abbotts Roothing, Ongar.

Baptist.

Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon remains very ill. On several occasions her condition has been critical, and has given great anxiety to all around her. A slight improvement was lately manifest, but she is still extremely weak.

Rev. Archibald G. Brown is laid up with influenza. He was to have given an address recently at the Young People's Missionary Association, but his place was taken, at very short notice, by Rev. D. H. Moore, of Vernon Chapel, King's Cross.

Rev. J. G. Greenhough, of Leicester, recently sat in his vestry to receive gifts for the Twentieth Century Fund. Contributions and promises from 10s. to £100 came in so rapidly that Mr. Greenhough had to get two friends to help him, and in the end upwards of £1,000 was thus secured.

The annual report of Carey Hall, Leicester (pastor, Rev. A. H. Tolhurst) announces the addition of sixty-four members to the Church roll during the year just passed, bringing the membership up to 160. The Church was formed by Rev. Wm. Medley, M.A., in January, 1898. The report states that the first aims of the Church have been spirituality and evangelistic zeal. A great work is being done among the young.

The members of Cavendish Baptist Church, Ramsgate, have been earnestly seeking, for several years, to secure new and greatly-needed Sunday school premises. The old schools were not only quite inadequate—there being insufficient room even for the members' children—but were in a dangerous condition. The total cost of the undertaking to provide a new building is to be £4,200, of which sum £2,200 has been raised, while an old debt of £600 has been cleared. A strenuous effort is being made to open the schools free of debt, and to that end the friends find it necessary to make a wider appeal for aid. Pastor T. Hancocks writes: "We are avoiding bazaars, and depending wholly on God for the free-will gifts of his people." Communications may be addressed to Mr. Hancocks, at 3, Ellington Terrace, Ellington Road, Ramsgate.

Methodist.

Rev. W. Goodman, president of the Primitive Methodist Conference, is deriving some benefit from his stay at Bournemouth, but it will be some considerable time before he is fit for his public presidential duties.

Mr. W. P. Hartley, of Aintree, has forwarded a cheque for £108 1s. 3d. to the Primitive Methodist Missionary Society, in accordance with his promise to give 25 per cent. on the net increase for the year. Mr. Hartley repeats his offer for the current year.

According to official returns the Connexional statistics of Primitive Methodism at the beginning of 1900 were as follows:—Members of Society, 198,980, an increase of 1,748; travelling preachers, 1,102; local preachers, 16,617; class leaders, 10,704; Sabbath schools, 4,341; teachers, 61,015; scholars, 467,884 Connexional chapels (home), 4,287; other chapels and rooms (home), 728; hearers, 622,919; value of church property in the United Kingdom, £3,664,253; debt on same, £1,009,187.

At the anniversary of Oxford Place Wesleyan Mission, Leeds, Rev. S. Chadwick said the Mission was expected to do aggressive work, and was doing it. They had a witness to bear against the wickedness that prevailed in the city, and they would bear it unflinchingly. He did not wish to overstate the case, but he believed the man was not born who could adequately set forth the horrible things that took place in the city every night, and without any interference by any authority. He spoke of the advantages secured by the amalgamation of the three Missions, and of the spirit of peace and harmony that prevailed among all the workers.

The Wesleyan Methodist Metropolitan Chapel Building Committee state in their annual report that within little more than twelve months they have sanctioned an expenditure of not less than £140,000. In those buildings are included suburban churches, also commodious mission halls, with all necessary appliances for dense artisan populations. Seven Wesleyan churches have been opened in and around London; six others will shortly be ready, and three more are to be almost immediately commenced. Sixteen sites are now held for chapels, and nineteen other cases have been presented in one form or other for the Committee's practical aid. No fewer than 112 chapels have been built in London within the past thirty-seven years, mainly as the result of this fund.

Presbyterian.

The occupants of the Crouch Hill pulpit during Mr. Meharry's absence will include Revs. Dr. John Watson, Principal Dykes, Dr. Marcus Dods, Hugh Price Hughes, Dr. Hanson, and Alex. Connell.

Dr. William J. Gillespie lately resigned his charge at Aspinwall, U.S.A., to the U.P. Presbytery of Alleghany, that he might go to a weaker field, not able to pay the amount usually considered neeessary to support a minister and his family.

The congregation of Fifth Avenue Church, New York, has given a unanimous call to Rev. George T. Purves, D.D., Professor of New Testament Literature at Princeton, New Jersey. Dr. Purves is an eloquent preacher, and thoroughly evangelical. He has accepted the call, and enters upon his new duties in April.

The new church erected by the Inverness Free Church Congregation in North Church was recently opened for service in the presence of a large attendance of members and adherents. There were two services—one in Gaelic and the other in English—both of which were conducted by Rev. J. R. Mackay, the newly-erected minister of the congregation.

Rev. Alexander Ramsay, of Highgate, has submitted an overture to the Presbytery of London North, asking the Synod, in view of the increasing claims and opportunities of service presented to the Church at home and abroad, and of the beginning of a new century, to mark the year 1901 by arranging for special meetings with a view to the deepening of the Church's spiritual life.

Definite information has now been received from Rev. J. M. Russell, of Capetown, Moderator of the last Synod of the Presbyterian Church of South Africa, relative to the churches and ministers in those districts affected by the war. Dr. Mathews, to whom the letter was addressed, says the account of the scattered condition of the Presbyterian churches is "exceedingly sad, while the necessities of many of the ministers must already be very great."

Salvation Army.

Eight new shelters and elevators have recently been opened in the United States.

One hundred and forty Salvation Army schools for children are now established in Gujerat.

Salvation Army officers are at work in the camps of Lord Methuen and General French, and with the various columns in Natal. They are holding services, acting as correspondents to soldiers, receiving information for their friends, visiting the tents, and assisting the sick and wounded. A new soldiers' home has been established in Pietermaritzburg.

Society of Friends.

Bristol and Frenchay Monthly Meeting has welcomed a proposal for the holding of a Conference for the deepening of spiritual life at Bristol, from March 25 to 29. The Conference to be specially for members of Bristol and Somerset, Western, and Devon and Cornwall quarterly meetings.

The Dukhobors in the Canadian North-West have still much suffering to endure. The Canadian Government are looking to those who have helped them in the past to tide over this winter for them. Friends of Philadelphia have already helped nobly, and are continuing to do so, but there is still need for the assistance of English Friends.

Ellwood Brockbank, Fanny Reynolds, Walter Robson, Frederic Taylor, and Margaret Youell visited different meetings in Devon and Cornwall on First Day, the 7th inst., and following day, preparatory to attending the quarterly meeting at Plymouth. Considerable emphasis was laid on the necessity of work both to the individual and the church, and faith, hope, and love were manifested in the deliberations.

Fallen Asleep.

At Valence, Captain JOSEPH R. PIM. His death must prove a great loss to the few Christian workers in the Drôme.—At Torquay, Rev. S. H. BEAMISH, formerly Vicar of Lamorbey, and well known as a firm supporter of the Church Missionary and other Evangelical Societies.—The oldest Wesleyan Methodist of the island of Portland has passed away in the person of Mrs. LOWMAN, of Easton, at the age of ninety-three. She joined the Society in 1826.—Miss TROWT, the oldest member of George Street Baptist Church, Plymouth, aged eighty-four. Miss Trowt, when a child, accompanied her mother to Serampore, where Dr. Carey took her upon his knee, and Dr. Marshman led her to see Dr. Carey's garden. This circumstance in her early childhood she related with great zest.—Miss ELIZABETH COLES, a devoted helper of the Wesleyan Church at Stotfold, Beds., at the age of sixty.—Rev. JOHN COLLINGE, of the United Methodist body, in his seventy-third year. He travelled in some of the widest agricultural circuits, where he had long journeys to take. During a three years residence in one of these circuits he walked between 6,000 and 7,000 miles. He was an untiring worker, an earnest preacher of the evangelical sort, and a diligent pastor.—The wife of Rev. A. W. WOOD, of City Road Baptist Chapel, Winchester, has passed away at the early age of thirty-eight. She had shared his pastoral labours at Havelock Chapel, Agra, India, and at Broughton, Hants, previously to their work in Winchester.—On the 13th inst., Rev. A. R. BARTON, D.D., Incumbent of Zion Church, Dublin.—Mr. JOHN MACRAE, an esteemed Free Church minister, of Duirinish, Skye. As a preacher, he was faithful and practical, deeply exercised, and rich in Christian experience.—At Longford, Rev. WM. CHRISTIE, Methodist minister, aged seventy-seven years.—At Clones, Rev. JAMES ELLIOTT, Methodist minister, aged seventy-five years.—At Belfast, Mr. ALEXANDER GLENDENNING, an earnest Presbyterian elder.—At Dublin, Rev. A. R. BARTON, D.D., Rector of Zion Church, Rathgar.—At Ballymena, Rev. ROBT. KING, aged eighty years.

Evangelistic.

An eight days' mission has been held at the People's Hall, Boone Street, Lee, S.E., conducted by Mr. J. H. HAYNES, of the Evangelization Society. The occasion will long be remembered for the messages of love and truth which were delivered, and for the prevalence of a deep spirit of quiet thankfulness to God for the gift of his Son. A number sought Christ. We pray that they may become faithful soldiers of the Cross. W.

On Sunday last, GIPSY SMITH began a ten days' mission at Dr. Clifford's Church, Westbourne Park. The attendances were large, and some thirty persons yielded to Christ. The gatherings aroused widespread interest, and were remarkable for spiritual power, while the appeals of the speaker moved many to tears. Dr. Clifford was busily engaged in dealing with those who were convicted of sin.

We have just concluded a fourteen days' mission in Merthyr Street Hall, Barry Dock, conducted by Mr. C. E. BARRACLOUGH. The addresses have been sound, and evangelical to the core. The speaker's handling of Bible characters was very natural and original, and well suited the working-class population of Barry Dock. Some of the unconverted have been definitely blessed, and the children of God greatly refreshed. GERALD COULTAS.

Mr. WILLIAM FORBES has conducted gatherings at Blackett Street Presbyterian Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne, for young women engaged at the local theatres. After tea, the assembly was addressed by Rev. R. Leitch, pastor of the church, and by Dr. Ross and Mr. Forbes. The proceedings, which were characterized by a happy unconventionality, proved to be of so helpful a character that it was decided to make an effort to reach other members of the theatrical profession.

Mr. W. R. BRADLAUGH commenced a mission in the Iron Mission Hall, Templemore Avenue, Mount Pottinger, Belfast, on the 7th inst. The first week's services were purely evangelistic, and there were a number of instances of blessing. During the remainder of the mission Mr. Bradlaugh dealt with "Things hard to be understood," receiving from members of his audience questions on matters of doctrine and experience, and furnishing answers from the Bible. Interest in the mission deepened as the mission proceeded, and the gatherings were largely attended. Young men, especially, have received spiritual light and stimulus as a result of the services.

A ten days' mission, conducted by Mr. JOSIAH NIX at Thirsk, was concluded on Monday, January 15. The services were powerful and well attended, and have been made a great blessing to the Wesleyan Circuit. At the Sunday afternoon services many of our Sunday scholars decided for Christ. A special feature of the meeting was an "At Home" for shop assistants on the early closing afternoon. About 120 accepted invitations, and were entertained to tea. Subsequently an address was given by Mr. Nix, and at the close a number signed the pledge. At the Saturday evening gathering, too, many pledges were taken. The last two nights of the mission will long be recalled. Many had come—some from long distances—with the purpose of seeking salvation. They quickly found their way to the inquiry room, and left rejoicing in Christ. The prayers of a revived Church will follow Mr. Nix in his future work. On the Wednesday following the mission the ministers and class leaders met the senior converts, a large proportion of whom joined classes. The junior converts were also met by the class leaders, and will be well looked after. Other churches have shared in the blessing. R.A.F.

Requests for Prayer.

That the Lord would be pleased to greatly bless four consecration meetings ito be held by Pasteur Cophel in the Brussels Y.M.C.A., Feb. 11-14.

For special services to be held in the Ebenezer Baptis Chapel, Abertillery, January 27-February 1, conducted by Rev. A. T. Jones, Newport, Mon.

Notes & Comments

THERE has not been for many years so difficult and trying a task before the British Parliament as that which confronts it just now. Every individual member must feel the stress of the responsibility that weighs on him. Our national assembly is as truly on its trial as our army, and only a deep and solemn sense of duty can meet the occasion. We need Divine guidance and help and sustaining grace as seldom in our history before. The eyes of the world and, what is more solemn still, the eyes of Heaven are upon us. This is a time when true patriotism involves in a special sense the call to prayer that wisdom, courage, and unflinching faithfulness to the highest principles may be granted to our legislators. Party interests become paltry nothings in the face of the uncertainties and sorrow of the times.

We may not realize it, but perhaps one of the worst foes to British power is the famine in India. We cannot control the seasons or make the rain fall, but the millions of people, our fellow-subjects, are there all the same, and requiring to be fed. One of the greatest of India's servants has expressed the opinion that famine will one day break down the Indian Government. It is a recognized duty to feed the perishing, and as this is too great a task for private charity it has to be done out of Government funds by Government agents. The mistake of our rulers has been to pay so little heed to the plans of such a man as the late Sir Arthur Cotton, who showed conclusively that by irrigation, by canals, and by the right use of railways built to meet public needs, any famine might be successfully fought. Grow more grain, and adopt means to carry it to needy places.

The terrible losses inflicted on our wealthier historic families in this disastrous war will have a far-spread sobering effect on their views of war in general. Indeed, all classes are suffering in almost equal proportions, though the loss falls here and there with special force on particular neighbourhoods. It is said that in one street in Dublin as many as eleven families are lamenting relatives killed in action. These, with all such mourners, must have the deep sympathy of followers of the Lord Jesus.

There is a growing conviction that we entered upon the struggle in a spirit almost of levity; before its close, the nation will probably be profoundly smitten. The lesson, bitter as it is, may not, in the end, be without its peaceable fruits of righteousness. For such an issue let us still earnestly pray.

The Dean of Durham has made a timely protest against the drunken orgies that in some cases have marked the departure of men to the front. Mr. Justice Grantham, on the other hand, protests that our soldiers have gone out "in a spirit of godly trustfulness." No doubt sobriety has characterized the great majority, but we are surprised that his lordship should speak of drunkenness as "affecting individuals, but intemperance of speech and tongue" as "a national crime." Surely the Dean's honest protest deserved better treatment than this!

The drinking that has gone on under the name of good fellowship is notorious. Strong speech depends upon whether there is cause for its expression. It is high time measures of some kind should be taken to restrain our national intemperance in the direction of boasting, making light of war, and getting drunk as an expression of good fellowship. A kind of reeling "Goodbye, old fellow," is utterly unbecoming departure for the seat of war. It is matter for regret that any judge should reprove men of God who protest strongly against sin and the common curse of intemperance which threatens the stability of the Empire.

Too little attention is being given to the legalized stimulation of drinking habits among the people by the means of the "tied houses," with the consequent monopoly in the interests of the wealthy brewers. Many of these houses are perfectly superfluous, "the Trade" being strong enough to manipulate the requisite certificates, the rating, and the loans to the otherwise penniless tenant. With the wealthy brewer on one side, and in some localities the complaisant magistrate upon the other, righteousness is made almost impossible. Yet, when we do get a reasonable official report in regard to the drink question, it is found convenient to pigeon-hole it, and meanwhile the havoc and destruction caused by intemperance are increasing around us day by day.

The century that is passing away has been remarkable for the number of noble men of thought who have been distinguished by a grand simplicity of life and by an absence of all mean ambitions. Perhaps nothing shows this humility of mind more than their almost unanimous disinclination for post-mortem honours. John Ruskin, who, despite his comparative wealth, was as single-minded and simple in his ideas as a child, belonged to this honourable company, and left instructions that he was to be buried "where he fell." The offer of a grave in Westminster Abbey was, therefore, declined by his friends, and he rests beside lovely Coniston, and under the shadow of the mountains he loved so well. The temporary disappointment felt by his many admirers will soon be forgotten in a sense of the fitness and dignity of such a decision. The true man is more concerned about how much good influence he leaves behind him than where he lies entombed.

The simple, joyful service which marked the funeral of Mr. Moody, and the equally beautiful service at the funeral of John Ruskin, are satisfactory signs of progress in a right direction. As Ruskin once wrote, "Why should we wear black for the guests of God?" Surely, if our dear ones have spent their lives in brightening and beautifying the lives of others; if they have gone whither their hearts have longed to depart and be "with Christ, which is far better," we have no right to mark their last obsequies by gloomy clothing and sad demeanour. "This is my coronation day," said Mr. Moody as he was dying, and his friends did well to rejoice over his triumphant departure.

The authorised Biography of D. L. Moody, as intimated in our last issue, is being prepared, in accord with the express wish of the evangelist, by his son, Mr. W. R. Moody. This life, which will be published in the interests of the institutions at Northfield and Mount Hermon, will necessarily take some time to prepare. Meanwhile a Shorter Life of D. L. Moody is being edited by Mr. W. R. Moody for immediate publication. This interim volume will appear simultaneously in Great Britain and America, and will be published by Messrs. Morgan and Scott.

The Earl of Northbrook, who was Viceroy of India a quarter of a century ago, has shown that he retains his interest in the great Empire by publishing a small book for the natives, entitled "The Teaching of Jesus Christ in his own Words." (2s. nett. Sampson Low & Co.) The scope of the book is thus explained by Lord Northbrook:

> My purpose has been to put before the natives of India the teaching of Jesus Christ in his own words as recorded in the four Gospels. Those parts of the teaching which were addressed specially to the Jews, have been left out, and also a few passages which cannot be fully understood without explanation. I wish to leave the words of eternal life without any comments or references to questions upon which opinions differ.

While there may be objections to excerpts from the Bible, except as they are used as magnets to draw readers to a study of the whole Book, this evidence on the part of a former Viceroy of his deep solicitude for the spiritual progress of India is as welcome as the little volume will prove useful.

Dr. Cobern, of Denver, in an article on Mr. Ingersoll's use of the Bible, points out one reason why that popular man failed to shake men's faith in the Bible. It was largely because they were led from his own words to believe that he was overstating his case, and was not scrupulously accurate in his statements. As an example, Dr. Cobern mentions his assertion that the ten commandments were in force in Assyria and Persia thousands of years before Moses was born, yet there was no Persia until centuries after Moses died. The moral on the side of Christians, especially when they are defending their faith, is this: Verify your own statements and question every one made on the other side. "Vain philosophy, science falsely so called," and unveracious history perish beneath the microscope of the man who is determined to know the facts and the truth.

The publication, a few days ago, of the long-promised biography of Ambrose de Lisle throws a very singular light upon the secret history of Romanism in Great Britain during the last half century; and, following so closely upon the statements as to disintegration which have now resulted in the excommunication of Dr. St. George Mivart, the revelations will not be deemed well timed by those who persist in claiming for the Roman organization an exceptional unity which is not to be found in any other body. Unfortunately Mr. Purcell died before the completion of the volumes, but the book was completed by Mr. De Lisle's son who has been anxious to clear his father from any complicity in the courses which, up to the present, have resulted only in deepening that impassable gulf between Protestantism and Rome.

No good comes from suppressing facts, and even if it did, such a practice, if not actually dishonest, breeds suspicion in England of those addicted to such arts. The advocates of the art of suppression failed so absurdly in regard to the "Life of Cardinal Manning" that no one, I imagine, will repeat the offence. That "Life" has cleared the atmosphere, has dispersed the fools' paradise in which a few simple or timid men were content to live under the persuasion that among Catholics, bishops, and religious orders, clergy, secular, and regular, there was nothing but uninterrupted peace and concord in word and deed.

So wrote Mr. Purcell; and, in his turn, Mr. De Lisle regrets that Mr. Purcell was weak enough to allow the suppression, in the life of Manning, of some remarkable notes as to the Jesuits. It was to De Lisle that Newman wrote the memorable words:—

Never could I, please God, proceed per saltum from the pastoral office in one church into another church. Such an act is repugnant to all my feelings of propriety and decency, of charity towards my flock and my brethren, of awe and reverence towards my Master.

In the face of this solemn assertion, it is less difficult to account for the gloom which appears to have settled around Newman's life after his perversion.

The protest made by Prof. St. George Mivart against the intellectual bondage which still fetters progressive Roman Catholics has brought severe penalties from his ecclesiastical superiors. His articles in the reviews on this subject have attracted attention throughout the world, and the publicity with which the Episcopal rebuke has been delivered creates a curious situation. It is clear that at heart the Romish Church is still the intolerant and rigid enemy of human liberty that she was when she imprisoned Galileo and burned Giordano Bruno at the stake for proclaiming truths long since universally acknowledged. In such Protestant countries as England, she does not dare interfere with liberty of thought except when directly challenged, as has been the case in this instance. But the intellectually perplexed, who imagine they will find peace in the communion tyrannized over by the Vatican, must surely come to see that it is the peace of suicide alone that is guaranteed by Rome.

It is sad to think how many come out of Rome bereft of faith. Cardinal Vaughan stigmatizes Professor Mivart's position as "Protestant"; but, as it seems to be associated more with unbelief than faith, it cannot properly be so designated. The presence or absence of the Reformation spirit decides the issue in every conflict with Rome. Hence, in some lands the conflict has been followed by a prevalent infidelity, in others by a predominant Protestantism. Dr. Mivart's writings suggest the fear that, becoming disgusted of Romish dogmas, he has been spoiled by a false philosophy. We trust his freedom from Papal tyranny will render him amenable to influences whereby he may come to the full enjoyment of Gospel light and peace.

When Christian workers in London are tempted to despair, it may be well for them to remember the progress that has been made already. Mr. Richard Whiteing, author of No. 5, John Street, has written recently this statement:—

If London, with its present population, had preserved its old proportion of vice, and crime, and indigence, the city would have been uninhabitable. We should have had a horde of savages at our very doors.

(170)

The traveller in the Alps learns with astonishment that glaciers move an inch a day, and he realizes a little of the meaning of eternity as he thinks of such a fact. Social progress is at a slow rate, but we do progress nevertheless. We realize all too little how much we owe to the constant all-the-year-round labours of the servants of God for the hearts and lives of the people, nor how much the rapid advance of evil is thereby held in check.

A striking sentence occurs in one of Mrs. Isabella Bishop's tributes to missionary work. The great traveller says:

My journeys in Asia have given me some knowledge of the unchristianized Asiatic world. In those years I have become a convert to the necessity of missions, not by seeing the success of missions, but by seeing the misery of the unchristianized world. From the seaboard of Japan to those shady streams by which the Jewish exiles wept when they remembered Zion, and from the icy plateaus of northern Asia down to the Equator, I have seen nothing but sorrow, sin, and shame, of which we have not the remotest conception.

The point to which we desire to draw attention is "the misery of the unchristianized world." It will be by a realization of this, and a concentration of our sympathies upon this, that missionary work will become an irresistible call to us. Too often we are led to dwell on the slow progress, the discouragements and difficulties of missionary labours; rather, let "the misery of the unchristianized world" burn into our souls, and then the evangelization of the world will seize on our imagination.

The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian draws attention to a serious hindrance to missionary work in China. Nearly a generation ago Sir Rutherford Alcock told Pope Pius IX. that Christianity was then greatly hindered by the claims of the Jesuits to consider their converts under the protection of their respective Governments as regards native officials. The French Ambassador at Pekin has now obtained from the Dowager Empress an official status for the Roman Catholic ministers. An offer is being made to accord equal privileges to Protestant missionaries of all denominations. Whether this offer will be accepted depends on the point of view taken by the official heads of the various missionary societies here and in America. The probability is that it will be declined, as bringing missionary effort into dangerous relations with civil life, with the consequent danger of friction. "My Kingdom is not of this world" is a word that seems to apply to the present situation.

Lord Salisbury has had his attention called to statements in The Outlook that the interests of missionaries in China and Samoa have been ignored during the political convulsions of the last few years, and he has replied to his correspondent denying the charge, so far at least as Samoa is concerned. It is to be hoped that evidence will be forthcoming in support of his lordship's reply; at present we are very much in the dark. Usually missionaries are ignored by the Governments of their own land until their work, or their sufferings, supply an opportunity for interference in support of some political claim. Witness the case of Germany in China a year or two ago. This is rank ingratitude, even from a lower point of view. When we consider the immense services done by missions to the cause of civilization and humanity, it is the least that statesmen can do to see that their work is safeguarded from interference, and their rights are respected by all.

The remarks of the Chinese Minister in his tour round our manufactories and great institutions have been remarkable for penetration and wit, and have excited much attention. But perhaps his observations at the famous orphan houses built by George Müller are the most significant of any he has made.

In this world of materialism and utilitarianism they had, he said, nearly lost their faith in the Great Being, but that institution convinced them that they must have faith in the Creator. "Mr. Wright (he concluded), I thank you very much. You have converted me from Materialism to Faith."

Whether Sir Chichen Lofengluh knew or did not know that Mr. Müller's ultimate purpose in maintaining his orphanage on the principle of faith was intended as an antidote to materialism, and as an evidence that our Father lives and hears his children's prayers, such was his avowed end and aim. Behind the feeding and clothing of the bodies of the children, he wanted to feed the souls of men with bread from heaven. Nor have the friends of the orphan been unsuccessful in this also.

We hesitate to add fresh burdens to those already borne—in most cases so nobly—by parochial clergy. But there can be no doubt that Dr. Collingridge was right in saying, at a meeting of the Church Sanitary Association, that the clergy who see, or who may see, so much of the homes of the poor, can do a great deal in giving hints to parents as to how they should manage the sanitation of their homes. They can also see that the existing laws are put into operation by local authorities. Indeed, doctors themselves can do these things better than the clergy, and there is also room for the wise co-operation of all friends of the poor.

But it should be wise and kind. A poor man's home is his home, and its sanctity should be respected by all who would befriend him. An officious intermeddling would almost inevitably be resented, and defeat the most kindly-meant efforts. Nor should it be forgotten that disease is not seldom traceable to the rich, rather than the poor, man's house. It is clear that the two ends may be largely secured together by wise advice in the one case, and earnest Scriptural teaching in the other. The Mosaic Law stands in the forefront of the revealed Word; and it is the grandest combination of spiritual teaching and physical sanitation that the world has ever seen. To this day the Jews are largely immune against epidemics, because as a race they are scrupulous in the fulfilment of their ancient ceremonial law.

The agitation against the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches seems at last to have been crowned with success, one firm having obtained valuable patents by which they will be able to produce a "strike-anywhere" match that is free from the chemical that has done such terrible and fatal injury to workpeople. This is another instance of the possibility of bringing trade up to the humane standard without doing any harm to trade itself. Human life is more important than dividends, and if the two clash the latter ought to go. But we do not believe that attention to humane considerations will, in the long run, injure any business. The firm in question has just announced a dividend of 15 per cent. for the past year; we shall be curious and interested to see what it is a year hence. The absence of phossy-jaw from the homes of their employés will, anyhow, be a clear gain. We only wish the new invention were not restricted by patents from general use.

A Remarkable French Trial.

DOUBTLESS many of our readers have followed the extraordinary prosecution of the Assumptionist Fathers in Paris, which terminated last week in an order for the dissolution of the confraternity and the infliction of fines. The event may prove of far-reaching importance, and in any case it provides us with abundant food for reflection.

Who are the Assumptionist Fathers? Their strict title is the Congregation of Augustin Fathers of the Assumption, and their existence as a separate confraternity was approved in 1864 by Pius IX., the predecessor of the present Pope. They have undertaken various kinds of missionary work in the East, but latterly their activity has been chiefly exercised in subterranean political channels. They started a newspaper called La Croix with the avowed purpose of influencing public opinion in France in favour of a form of government more in sympathy with the Church of Rome. Believing that the power of the Jews was one of the chief barriers to the attainment of their purpose, the Assumptionists set themselves sedulously to work up a popular animosity to all Jews. The Dreyfus case gave them their opportunity of exerting to the utmost this anti-Semitic agitation. Ignoring the fact that the Founder of the Christian religion was a Jew accused falsely, the Assumptionists laboured to prove the guilt of Captain Dreyfus with a zeal that they had never displayed in religious work.

The violence and wicked malice which characterized the columns of La Croix for several weeks led to its being described by The Times as "the most abominable newspaper published in the French language." The circulation—said to be a quarter of a million copies in Paris—was not confined to the newspaper itself, for its disgraceful contents were circulated in about fifty local papers; so that the influence of La Croix had become considerable and widely spread. When the tide of public opinion turned in favour of Captain Dreyfus, and attention was drawn to the hostile attitude of the Roman Catholic papers, many attempts were made by Roman Catholic writers to disprove this charge. They failed utterly; and, to add to their discomfiture, the Pope received Father Bailly, the director of La Croix, in private audience! This mark of approval was used immediately by the Assumptionists as a further advertisement of their efforts. Only a few days ago Cardinal Richard visited the office of La Croix and urged the staff to continue their good work! In face of this further official encouragement, it is absurd to plead that the views of the Assumptionists are not sanctioned by the Vatican.

It was not in the least because of their religious opinions that the French Government (which includes some staunch Roman Catholics) instituted proceedings against the Assumptionists. It was solely because of their ill-concealed attempts to bring the Government of the country under clerical dominion. The trial in Paris was the only logical sequel to the raid which was made on the premises of the Fathers. Unless the French Government were to remain passive under dangerous incitements to rebellion, it was compelled to take steps to dissolve this political confraternity. Of course, the sentence of the Court will only cause a momentary disappearance of these agents of Rome. The unrest of mercurial France offers just the opportunity to such clever men to suggest the advantage of clerical rule. The atoms, dispersed for a brief period, will doubtless form some other dangerous amalgam.

The trial brings forcibly before us the persistent aim of the officials of the Church of Rome in other countries than France. At the back of all their propaganda is the determination to secure clerical rule as opposed to civil liberty. The Church of Rome welcomes converts; but that is not its whole aim or purpose. It desires to assert its power over all the political machinery of the State, and from this task it never turns back. The French Government, in no spirit of religious intolerance, has, for the time, repulsed the efforts of one influential section; but the battle will have yet to be fought in other ways and places. As The Times in a recent leader remarked on the action of the Government, "It is dealing simply with political agents aiming at the subversion of society, employing the most scandalous and immoral methods, and using their ecclesiastical status simply as a cloak to disguise their real character, and a means of envenoming the dagger they seek to plunge into the side of the body politic."

Once again an impressive lesson is being read to the people of Great Britain. In France, where Romanism has long had free course, a check is put upon the operations of ecclesiastical orders inimical to political freedom and social well-being. In England, on the other hand, where Protestantism has prevailed and its blessings have been enjoyed to the full, "religious" orders and houses are multiplying without hindrance, and are, in fact, being indulged as institutions for the public good. It is time for us to awake from a false security.

FELLOWSHIP,

ILLUSTRATED BY THE FLEET.

A GREAT deal is constantly said and written about our fleet. The number, quality, and efficiency of our ships are often duly discussed in the daily papers, and in late wars we have seen an appalling proof of the mighty power of battleships.

The fleet represents the nation's strength, power, and safety, and not till the Millennium arrives shall we be able, as a nation, to dispense with our ships. God speed the day of the world's peace and prosperity, when her safety shall not depend upon her great fleets of ships, but upon the power of the Reigning King Himself.

The nation's fleet of ships is nothing to the Church's great fleet of ships, which is the Church's peace, power, and praise. Let us see:—

1. Sonship. The Spirit of Relationship (Gal. iii. 26; 1 John iii. 2).

2. Worship. The Link of Communion (Eph. ii. 18; Phil. iii. 3).

3. Fellowship. The Bond of Brotherhood (1 Cor. i. 9; 1 John i. 3, 7).

4. Partnership. The Co-operation of Love (1 Cor. iii. 9; 2 Tim. ii. 12).

5. Citizenship. The Title to Heaven (Eph. ii. 6; Phil. iii. 20).

These are all very fine ships expressing the power of Divine grace in the hearts and lives of every child of God. The members in Christ's Body are fellow-heirs (Eph. iii. 6), fellow-citizens (Eph. ii. 19), fellow-soldiers (Phil. ii. 25), fellow-workers (Col. iv. 11), fellow-labourers Phil. iv. 3), fellow-helpers (3 John viii), fellow-servants (Col. i. 7, and iv. 7; Rev. vi. 11); and heirs together of the grace of life (1 Pet. iii. 17), framed together (Eph. ii. 20), knit together (Col. ii. 2), striving together (Phil. i. 27), followers together (Phil. iii. 17), and will be caught up together (1 Thess. iv. 17).

Finding Ourselves.

By Rev. J. P. Gledstone.

THERE is often no one whom a man knows so little about and understands so imperfectly as himself; he is a world to be discovered. Born with a body possessing certain faculties, he has to find out their uses. At first a child does not know what to do with his feet, and needs no small encouragement to stand on them, and then walk. He has to learn that everything must not go into his mouth, and gradually and unconsciously he corrects the impressions of sight.

His mind is full of mysteries. Some few are born with positive instincts of genius which are indubitable and irrepressible; but the most of men seem to have only the faintest conception of what they are, and what they can do. By the aid of a wise tutor or of a kind friend, he may gain some knowledge of his weak and strong points; but chiefly by self-observation will he attain to self-knowledge; only it must be self-observation that is keen and honest, taking note of weaknesses and limitations, as well as of strong points. Deep below this again, in our sub-consciousness, is an unexplored world.

THE UNKNOWN HEART.

Apart from the teaching of the Holy Spirit, most men have a strange misconception of their spiritual nature and condition. "The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked," and one of its deceits is to hide its deceit, and cover over its wickedness. "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" is the indignant interrogation with which we meet any hint as to our weakness. "Although all men should be offended, yet will I never be offended" is the proud, sincere, mistaken boast of even a Christian apostle. In one sense our self-measurement is both too high and too low—too high as to what we are in ourselves, of ourselves, by ourselves; too low as to what God by his grace can do in us and for us and through us.

HOW SELF-DISCOVERY COMES.

One way by which we may attain to self-knowledge is by being allowed to run our course, to bring forth our fruit, to show ourselves. The prodigal went his own way, and came to self-discovery. His fancy picture of himself was that of an independent, enterprising, capable young man who could manage his own affairs, if only he were liberated from the trammels of the old home. But lo! the grand gentleman turned out to be a vile sinner, the independent young man became a poor starveling and the slave of others, and the companion of all "the fast set" found his way to the swine. Then when he touched the bottom of his self-inflicted humiliation, he came to the knowledge of himself; and he came also to himself, to a new self born in the sorrow and shame of a broken heart and a contrite spirit. Put into the school of experience and allowed to develop themselves, sinners find out that they are sinners.

Peter found himself out in this way. Jesus warned him once and again of the weakness that was in him, and of the sin to which it would lead, but he would not believe it, and yet he was, in part, a divinely-taught man even at that time. Then came the denial, the grief, the restoration; and Peter had a very different estimate of himself after the crucifixion from what he had before. It was not merely that he grieved over his sins, but that he discovered his sinfulness. He saw the tremendous possibilities of evil in a heart that, under temptation, could lie and blaspheme.

In some similar way, thousands are led to know themselves, their weakness, their tendency to sin, and their need of grace from above. Countless multitudes more might do the same if they were willing to learn; but "they love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." They remain in ignorance, esteeming themselves to be wise, while they are fools; to be right, while they are wrong; to be good, while they are sinful.

THE HOLY SPIRIT'S WORK.

The Holy Spirit alone can cause us to see ourselves in a true light, and to judge of ourselves as God judges us; but we must give heed to Him. If we will allow his light to shine within He will expose to our view a very different person from the one whom we have accounted ourselves to be. He will show us a soul moved by unholy motives, agitated by sinful passions, seeking selfish ends, not honouring God, not living to God, not desiring the knowledge of God. He will take the tinsel from all unreal goodness, and the covering from all impurity. He will strike into the heart a consciousness of what we are, and will abase our self-righteousness, and destroy our self-confidence. But we must welcome his ministry—we must yield to Him.

SELF-DISCOVERY BY CONTRAST.

Self-discovery is promoted by contrasting the human with the Divine, the nature of man with the nature of God. The great trouble with which Job began his complaints was the darkness of the world, the mystery of God's dealings, the mystery of suffering; the trouble with which he ended, was the condition of his own heart. After searching in vain in the height above and in the depth beneath, he came to believe that in himself lay the real evil, the only thing worth his serious thought. "I have heard of Thee with the hearing of the ear," he said to the Almighty, "but now mine eye seeth thee, wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." He had said many foolish things, his feelings had been rebellious, he had clamoured for explanations, but God gave him no satisfaction along the line where he sought it. A flash of heavenly light came to him, and in that he saw his own exceeding sinfulness; here was the thing that required attention; here was something personal for which he was accountable. Great outside questions may be left alone until the heart is cleansed and set right. We shall better understand the universe and the ways of God when we better know ourselves.

Isaiah was in a very different mood from Job when the vision of God was granted to him, but it produced the same impression and effect. He exclaimed: "Woe is me! for I am undone, because I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips; for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts." In the radiance of the infinite purity, we see our own impurity. As the sun-beam reveals the million motes floating in what appears to be pure air, and the glittering white snow exposes any taint that touches it, so any contact with the Holy One shows us our sinfulness. Hence the soul that walks most closely with God has the keenest sense of sin, the most profound consciousness of unworthiness. On him, too, comes the cleansing fire from out the holy place. He knows that his sin is purged, and his iniquity taken away; yet he walks humbly with his God, because he realises something of the infinite distance that is between them.

A similar experience to Isaiah's came upon the apostle Peter when the glory of the Saviour flashed upon him in the miracle of the great draught of fishes, and he cried out, "Depart from me; for I am a sinful man, O Lord." The Divine light had, for a long time, been as near to him, but he had not been conscious of it, had not seen and felt it as at that moment. How strange that it should always be so near to us, and we so often insensible to it. "God was in his place, and I knew it not." When we know it, his power thrills us through and through.

God searches and knows us altogether. Jesus knew the Jewish Rabbi when he came by night, and they spake together of the deep things of God; He knew that Nicodemus needed to be born again, and Nicodemus also knew it before the interview closed; and he became a new man in Christ Jesus, There is One who can not only tell us all things that ever we did, but also all things that we are.

Memories of Mr. D. L. Moody.

WE continue to receive recollections of the late Mr. Moody from Christian people who recognise the greatness of the departed, and mourn the great loss thereby sustained by the Church at large.

By Rev. E. Payson Hammond.

In the year 1862 I first met D. L. Moody on a train going from Canada to Chicago. He was then greatly interested in hearing of the work of grace in Hamilton, Canada. Two years afterwards he attended a series of meetings which I conducted in Chicago, and did all in his power to help them on. Whenever he spoke he had something to say that was interesting, and the people eagerly listened to his words. In the very first inquiry meeting he entered into the work of leading souls to Christ with all his heart.

We frequently had open prayer meetings, and Mr. Moody was always ready to take part in them. He had at that time an old building in which he had gathered a Sunday school. He asked me to spend two or three evenings with him. As we approached the building he said, "Let us have an open-air meeting and gather a crowd, and help fill the building." We did so, and quite a number came in. The next night the same thing was repeated, but the third night there was another element mingling in the meeting; bar-tenders were there to break up the service. While Mr. Moody and I spoke the crowd remained silent; but when I introduced a Jew to tell his experience, suddenly there was raised

A CRY OF "FIRE! FIRE!"

A crowd soon collected, and every time he made an attempt to speak they renewed their cry, until the whole square seemed black with people. I then sprang to my feet and said, "Let us pray." They suddenly became quiet. Mr. Moody then urged all to come into that North Market Mission building, and we had a solemn service; and at the close of the meeting we found many anxious for their souls' salvation. He especially loved the inquiry meetings, and seemed as much at home in them as in later years. These meetings continued for nearly six weeks in different parts of the city, and many were gathered into the fold.

Hot weather came on, and I was called away to St. Paul and to Minneapolis. After three months, I found my way back to Chicago and to Mr. Moody's mission building. A man took me by the hand, saying: "I was an infidel in Germany; I read of the Mormons in Utah, and finally became one myself, but I got disgusted with Mormonism and came to Chicago, where for sixteen years I never attended church. One evening when I was going to my home I heard a loud cry of 'Fire! Fire!' I hastened around the corner, and there found a dense crowd trying to prevent a man from speaking by shouting 'Fire' at the top of their voices. Suddenly I heard the voice of prayer. I was impressed, and took Mr. Moody's invitation, entering the mission building, where I heard the story of Christ's suffering and death; and at the inquiry meeting my heart went out in love to Jesus." As Mr. Moody chanced to be standing by, he heard these words and said, "This man is one of the best workers I have had; he is always at the services ready to do what he can to lead others to Christ. The devil surely when he tried to break up that meeting by leading those men to raise a cry of 'Fire!'" Mr. Moody received no salary, but God supplied his wants, sometimes in a striking manner.

Less than twenty years ago, while spending three days at his home in Northfield, he took me one morning with his horse and buggy to the cemetery, to the grave of his youngest brother, to whom he was greatly attached. He found his grave without a stone or monument. As I asked the reason why he said, "I hope to be able to build a girls' school on the hill-side yonder." I asked, "Have you not good schools here in Northfield?" He replied, "I want a school for young women in which they can fit themselves for usefulness." The next year a building was erected, and everybody knows how one building after another has been added until the influence of this educational work is felt over the world.

We were at the World's Fair, in Paris, in 1867; but Mr. Moody was more interested in the daily prayer meetings than in seeing Emperor Napoleon and the Sultan of Turkey. Wherever he went, the world over, his heart was filled with love for the Saviour.

From an English Physician.

I have not read all the memorial notices of "Moody, the Great Evangelist," the title by which, I think, he might deservedly be distinguished. But there is one characteristic of his missions which was very marked, which was specially valuable, and of which there is some danger lest nowadays it should be forgotten, or even (God forbid!) be allowed to pass away altogether.

Mr. Moody's missions were pre-eminently Christian, both in matter and in manner. He "preached Christ, and not himself," even indirectly. This may be said, and with thankfulness, of many other missioners, and we may confidently hope that this feature of missions will remain. But there is another feature of Moody's missions, and there is considerable danger lest this, the united, not *un*denominational, but strictly inter-denominational character of Mr. Moody's missions should pass away.

My personal experience of missions is not large, but it is sufficient to make me emphasize the point to which I wish to draw attention. In the town from which I write we have had several missions during the last thirty years, but only two that have left an abiding impression. One of these was

INTER-DENOMINATIONAL.

It was conducted by one person, in the main single-handed, but of course supported by many workers, and there was diligent house-to-house distribution of notices. This was nearly twenty years ago, and to be able to say that the fruit of it still remains is a strong testimony to the excellence of such a mode of proceeding.

All the others, both before and since, have been denominational. Of these only one, I think the first, for it was in November, 1873, is specially worthy of note. It was organized by a clergyman occupying an exceptionally favourable position, of marked individuality, spiritually minded, and in sentiment boldly Catholic, Apostolic, Reformed, and Protestant Several of the ablest Church of England missioners were engaged in it, in the different churches, each being supported by a large staff of workers, and, best of all,

THERE WAS DILIGENT PREPARATION for several months previously. So far as I can remember, the Nonconformist Churches were in full sympathy with it. It was a glorious time.

Nevertheless, the plan of working all together, with one simple object, to bring sinners to Christ as a personal Lord and Saviour, in one name—the name that is, and ever will be, above every name, was Moody's plan, and if this distinctive feature has not been emphasized, I hope it may not be too late to do so.

Glimpses of Romanism.

By Rev. ALEXANDER ROBERTSON, D.D., Venice.

An Historic Retrospect.

"What a nice man Cardinal So-and-so is. He is so humble and affable!" "And Father So-and-so. What a fine priest he is—frank—intelligent—good." "And the Pope. When in Rome I was granted an audience, and I was struck with his spiritual appearance; and, although I am a Protestant, he asked so kindly about me and my family, and gave me his blessing." "And, after all, the Roman Catholics do so much good! They have their forms of worship, and we have ours; but we are all seeking the same end, and we should respect each other."

TO all such talk an Italian would knit his brows, and clench his fists, and hiss through his teeth the words, "Cani, canagli" (dogs, villains), and he would utter the simple truth. He has reason to know for he has been told by his elders, if he has not had personal experience, of the unspeakable cruelty and treachery exercised against Italians by popes and cardinals, by bishops and priests; and he can yet point to the Agro Romano, and to whole tracts of equally malarious country in other parts, of what were once the Papal States, and instance the great leeway his country has yet to make up in education, in commerce, in industry, in public confidence, and in religion, as a proof of the pestiferous character of Papal rule. He knows, what all of us can know if we take the trouble to inquire, that the Pope's sovereignty in Italy, up to 1870, when it was overthrown, was—in its influence on man and woman and child, on beast and bird and tree, on the very ground men trod on—only, always, everywhere, an unmitigated evil.

Italy, "the garden of the world, the home of all art yields and nature can decree," was under the Pope "a land of the dead," "a garden without the tree of knowledge and without the tree of life." And he knows further, what we have yet to learn in England, that if are less the enemies of personal liberty, of the Bible, of religion, of the sanctity of the home, of commerce and industry, of everything that underlies individual happiness and national prosperity than they were, it is only because they are held in check by the strong arm of the law, and by a wholesome, powerful public opinion. Pio Nono made that clear when, in 1874, he published the eighty anathemas of the Syllabus; when he said, as Adolphus Trollope tells us in his life of the Pope: "He who talks of reforming me means to abolish me;" he who runs may read it in the condition of every priest-ridden people and country on the face of the earth.

Let us now, however, go back thirty years in Italian history, and see what was the condition of things in Italy under Papal rule, so that we too, like the Italians, may have a righteous detestation of the Papal Hierarchy, Church, and system.

The Pope ruled in Italy, as everybody knows, up till the overthrow of his sovereignty on September 20, 1870, by the aid of French and Austrian bayonets. His government was so abhorred that if these foreigners had been withdrawn it would not have lasted half an hour. And no wonder. His subjects were kept in worse than Egyptian bondage. They were enslaved in soul as well as in body. It was such as, in Cavour's opinion, to call for the intervention of Europe. It was such that even Austria, itself wading waist deep in Italian blood, protested against the atrocities. Every man, woman, and child in the Papal dominions was entangled in the meshes of

AN INFAMOUS SYSTEM OF ESPIONAGE.

Cardinals, archbishops, bishops, priests, servant girls, bravos, thieves, idlers, vagabonds, all were Papal spies, and were in the pay of the sbirri, the Papal police. Indeed, the criminal and semi-criminal portion of the population were the Pope's chief supporters, who brought him information and looted in the support of the Church. People were arrested without warning, put into prisons full of sewage, rats, and vermin, without regard to age or sex, or social status, were fed on garbage, and finally starved to death or executed without trial. Instruments of torture and the lash were used to extract confession. Men were drugged with belladonna that they might betray themselves unwittingly. After every insurrection, "the country was studded with gibbets, the galleys crowded with prisoners, Europe with exiles, and almost every other house in the Papal States was in mourning."

Patriots, who were seeking to free Italy, did not wish to go into exile, and in any case it was difficult, for most men were under police surveillance, by which they were confined to their houses between sunset and sunrise, and were compelled to go to confession once a month. Confessions were continually betrayed by the priest for political purposes, just as when Venice was under Austria, duplicates of confessions were sent to Vienna. Medical advice was denied to the sick and dying who refused to see a priest or to receive the sacrament. All wills were invalidated which did not contain legacies to the Church. I need not say that and no good books, nor would they have been of much use if there had been, for the vast majority of the Pope's subjects were kept in utter ignorance. One could go from parish to parish, and from commune to commune, and not find a man or a woman who knew the alphabet. Education was entirely in the hands of the clergy, and the result was—what it is wherever that is the case—the people were uneducated. There were no girls' schools. As Adolphus Trollope tells us in his life of Pio Nono, the priest said: "It was una cosa vergognosa (a shameful thing) for a girl to be able to write," as she might write love-letters. There were few newspapers, and the official gazettes "gave more space," as Mr. Bolton King shows, "to the affairs of India and Japan than to those of Europe, and had no intelligence of contemporary politics." Men were publicly whipped for having in their possession papers published in Piedmont. The mottoes of the clericals were, "Tolerate vice and proscribe thought;" "Keep people ignorant, they are easier to govern;" "The political results of education are to be feared."

The late Thomas Arnold, of Rugby, writing from Bologna, says: "The ignorance of the people is prodigious—how can it be otherwise? The booksellers' shops, sad to behold—the very opposite of that scribe, instructed to the kingdom of God, who was to bring out of his treasure things new and old—these scribes, not of the kingdom of God, bring out of their treasures nothing good, either new or old, but the mere rubbish of the past and the present." There was

LITTLE OR NO COMMERCE.

All that there was was hampered by customs barriers, and by divers weights and measures. Shops were compulsorily closed on saints' days and church festivals, which often occurred twice and thrice in a week. The lottery offices and drink shops were, of course, all open, festival and Sunday.

Industrial enterprise was similarly trammelled by heavy taxation and clerical restrictions. The construction of railways was disallowed, as they might work damage to religion. As Trollope says: "Steam-engines and their works are incompatible with Papal pretensions and purposes." Even gas was under ban, as it enabled the people to see to work too well after sunset. There is nothing more hateful to the Papal Church than light, whether it be spiritual, intellectual, or natural. Vaccination was forbidden. Epidemics were rife. There was no system of proper drainage even in Rome, and no effective water supply. The streets were filthy beyond description. In a city of celibates there were more foundling hospitals than in any city in Europe. Agriculture was almost at a standstill. There was not an acre of ground in the Papal States properly cultivated, whilst belonging to prelates and religious houses, were given over to malaria, and to desert waste. Brigandage flourished in close alliance with the Church. These highwaymen wore their crosses and their scapularies, and went regularly to Rome to confess and to receive absolution. For this they paid heavily, so that practically they received the Church's protection and blessing, and shared with it their spoils of robbery and murder. Hunted brigands have been known to rush into churches, when the officiating priests would at once yield their places to them at the altar, and when their pursuers entered, the brigands were unrecognizable in the priests' garb.

The late Dr. Howard Crosby says: "I have seen with my own eyes Gasparoni, the brigand chieftain, with his band of 300 men, come down out of the mountains to get absolution, and then go back to their nefarious occupation. Afterward, when he was put in prison, it was said that it was because he refused to divide longer with the Pope. I had a talk with Gasparoni myself. He told me he had killed seventy-one men with his own hand in cold blood. Holding up a cross before him, I asked him if he knew what that meant. He said that it meant that he was a Christian. 'But,' I said, 'how can you be that if you have

MURDERED SEVENTY-ONE PEOPLE?'

'Oh,' he said, 'but I did not kill any of them on Friday!'"

When, after 1870, the brigands could no longer give money to the Vatican, the Vatican gave money to them. In this way it sought to impede the Italian Government in its efforts to put them down, and to make life and property secure. Thousands of the Pope's subjects lived on the very verge of starvation, whilst thousands of pounds were spent on theatres and theatrical church processions and displays. On the other hand, thousands were demoralized by charities. Someone has said, "All Romans wore either the tonsure, or livery, or rags."

Such is a necessarily brief and imperfect sketch of the state of men and matters in Italy under the rule of an untrammelled Papal Church. Happily it is no longer untrammelled, and under the beneficent rule of King Humbert and a constitutional government, everything is being regenerated. The incubus of the Papal power has been lifted off men and nature, and it has been like a refreshing from the presence of God. And in view of the past, one does not wonder that twenty millions of Italians, two out of every three persons one meets, do not go to the Papal Church, but one wonders that any go at all. In view of the past, one does not wonder at all the legislation enacted to but rather that they are left yet so free to plot against the country.

And what the Papal Church was in Italy, that it was in England, and that is what it is still in every country where it can assert itself. "Clericalism," said Gambetta, "that is the enemy;" and we see to what a condition of degradation it has brought France. It is the enemy of England; and, were it once again to come into power, it would make Great Britain what it made Italy under the Popes, "a garden without the tree of knowledge and without the tree of life"—a "land of the dead."

A Welcome Discovery.—So much misery has been caused by the dread disease of "phossy-jaw" that we hail with pleasure the formal announcement of the discovery, and adoption by, at any rate, one large firm of match-makers of a process under which the operatives will no longer be subject to the terrible risk.

Railway Casualties.—From a report issued a few days ago by the Royal Commission on railway accidents, it appears that the deaths and injuries sustained by railway servants are considered by the Commissioners to be unnecessarily numerous, and that there could easily be a diminution. It is startling to find that in 1898 no fewer than 499 railway officials were killed, and 12,376 injured; and if it is the fact that many, or indeed any, of these were preventible, and the Companies, from motives of economy or want of proper regard for their servants, do not take the necessary steps, an increase in the power of control by the Board of Trade certainly is required, and it is desirable that Christian philanthropists should combine in pressing for it.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, February 4. Job xxxiii.

WHAT power it gives a man when he knows, as Elihu did, that he is in living union with God, and that the breath of the Almighty is giving him life! Be sure that you are every day inhaling that breath, and remember that now, as of old, it is true "He breathed on them, and said, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost'!" It is good that the man in whom God's breath is, is made of clay, even as others are; his words, therefore, are tempered to human spirits. Throughout the Bible, God sends, not angels, but sons of men, to speak his word.

God speaks to us perpetually to withdraw us from some evil purpose. A certain course may seem good to us, but He knows that it will land us in the pit, and therefore by earnest appeal, and sometimes by sore chastening with pain upon our beds, He enforces his Divine remonstrance. Well is it for us at times like this if there be some loving and loyal friend, or, best of all, the Holy Spirit, the Divine Interpreter, who shall explain to us God's inner meaning; for then, in our repentant soul, there will ensue a full realization of the exquisite portraiture which follows. The old youthful energy and joy will come again; and our prayers will penetrate through the brooding clouds into the light of God's face. The R.V. should be studied for v. 27, for it suggests that God will put a song into the lips of the restored soul, in which, whilst it tells the tale of its sin, it also magnifies God's redeeming mercy. It may be that God is working these things with you, my friend, "twice, yea, thrice." If so, I pray you, work out what He works in, that you may be enlightened with the light of life.

MONDAY, February 5. Job xxxiv.

Elihu stands in verse 10 as God's apologist. God's absolute and impartial justice is at all times a matter of such untold comfort. There will be no cause of ultimate complaint, but from the lips of the holiest beings in the universe, most able to pass an opinion, the cry will ascend, "Great and marvellous are thy works, O Lord God the Almighty. Righteous and true are thy ways, thou King of the Ages. . . . Thy righteous acts have been made manifest." Ponder those last words. God's righteous acts have not yet been made manifest; it is therefore foolish and wrong to pass judgment upon an unfinished programme. Wait, mortal man, until, at the great white throne, God shall unfold his inner reasons. If it is not fit to say to a king, "Thou art vile," how much less to Him who lives through the ages, while the people are shaken and pass away, and the mighty are taken away without hand!

It is meet to say unto God, "I will not offend any more . . . What I see not, teach thou me." This is what God was waiting for Job to say. Perfect as he thought himself to be, it was needful that he should know that there were sins in the inner life which called for Divine rebuke. God cannot suit his dealings with us to our notion of things. He must choose his own method whether we like it or not, and we must be willing to be tested "to the end" (36). Perhaps, dear sufferer, God wants to teach thee much that thou knowest not, but shouldst know. Humble thyself under his mighty hand, and He will give thee the chastened, quiet heart (29).

TUESDAY, February 6. Job xxxv.

Job had said in effect that either righteousness was of no profit, or that a mortal man had keener perceptions of the deserts of righteousness than even God Himself. And Elihu sets himself to combat these insinuations.

God is so exalted in his nature above man that He is altogether independent of him. When men sin against Him, they hurt not Him, but themselves. There is no motive, therefore, of retaliation or revenge in his chastisements. "Not for his pleasure," the Holy Ghost saith in another place. "but for our profit" (7, 8).

Instead of seeking after God our Maker, who can give songs in the darkest night that ever befel a human spirit, we are too apt to despair. Instead of crying to God, we cry against Him. We murmur and complain. We arraign God. There is our pride (12). We regard iniquity in our heart, and God cannot answer us until we change our note for one of loving, trustful submission. "God will not hear vanity, neither will the Almighty regard it."

Let us change our temper, and our note. Have done with the proud self-will that chafes and argues and complains. This will not speed thy cause at God's bar. Humble thyself under his mighty hand, and He will exalt thee. "The meek He will teach his way."

WEDNESDAY, February 7. Job xxxvi.

What a sublime idea these men of the old time had of the righteousness of God our Maker! Let us take comfort from Elihu's words!

He is mighty, but He does not despise thee, though thou be the least of saints. He will give thee thy right, O afflicted soul. His eyes are upon thee for good, and He will set thee upon his throne for ever. Art thou bound with the cords of affliction and sorrow? He will stoop to thy low dungeon, whispering instruction to thine ear, and commanding thee to return. Oh, hearken and serve Him, that days of prosperity and years of pleasantness may be thine! There are broad places before thee in which there shall be no straitness; tables await thee full of fatness. Let God send thy feet into the path that leads from thy present prison-house, into the liberty and light which await thee in the near future!

If we refuse to humble ourselves before God (vv. 18, 19), trusting in our own sufficiency, our riches, or our strength, we really set ourselves against Him, whose hand shows itself in our troubles. And how absurd it is to come into collision with Him! Ponder well Elihu's conception of his greatness. Magnify his work. Remember the unsearchable numbers of his years. Behold the wonderful machinery by which He collects from ocean, lake, and stream the clouds which, like great floating cisterns, carry the waters to be bleached in the snow of the hills, and oxidized in the torrent beds! How much love and thoughtfulness for man are displayed in these Divine contrivances! Yes, child of man, there is more love in creation than terror. Nature's myriad voices proclaim with scripture, God is Love. Think, too, of the gentle beauty of the morning light, and the exquisite grace of submarine foliage (v. 30); of the abundant provision for food. He cannot, therefore, be indifferent to the righteous man, or neglect him. He may discipline him to make him hate sin; but, when this end is attained, He will assuredly withdraw his rod (10, 11).

THURSDAY, February 8. Job xxxvii.

It was as though a thunderstorm at this moment rolled over the heads of the disputants. At the close of the previous chapter the dark clouds had begun to gather, and the lightning had been launched in the air; and now Elihu asks his audience to listen to the noise of God's voice, as the thunder hurtled above them.

In these days we speak of nature, and law, and natural processes; but it was better in those old-world days, when all was attributed to the direct agency of our God and Father. He thundered marvellously; He said to the snow, "Fall thou;" his breath gave ice; and He laded the thick cloud with moisture. The greatness of God in creation was a perpetual object-lesson to men, who had no daily papers, no telegrams, no posts, little to stir the daily routine of life. Around them vast solitudes, trodden only by the slow-moving caravans: above, the stately measured procession of the heavens. The world was young, and seemed to have an abundance of leisure, and men were able to ponder the ways of God. He seemed nearer to them than we are, save when we can isolate ourselves from the incessant and boisterous interruption of men and affairs.

How absurd it is to say that we will believe in nothing that we cannot see or understand. When a man once said as much to a preacher, the man of God turned on him and said, "Did you ever see your brain, yet I suppose you think you have one?" We cannot tell why our garments are warm in the days of the south wind, or why the colour of the heavens is blue, or how the clouds are kept in due proportion to the needs of the earth. We cannot understand God in Nature, how much less in Grace! Touching the Almighty, we cannot find Him out; but amid all the darkness which surrounds Him there is ever a bright light—the rainbow of his love. In the midst of the throne, lo, "a Lamb as it had been slain."

FRIDAY, February 9. Job xxxviii.

Do not be afraid of the whirlwind, if He is at its heart. It is but his chariot, which brings Him near thee. The series of questions with which this chapter is full is very sublime, and to which of them can we give answer? The induction, therefore, is to convince us that God's ways must be above our comprehension, and his thoughts beyond our reach. If we cannot approach God in the grasp of his power and the scope of his infinite wisdom in the natural world, it is obvious that we must be prepared to confess our inability to judge of his dealings with us in the moral world. O little child, be still, submit, and wait. God is great, boundless in power and wisdom: Eternity is his sphere, and the Infinite his home. Some day thou mayest have grown a little maturer in thy power to comprehend. In the meanwhile,

> Leave Him to order all thy ways,
> And trust in Him whate'er betide.

Notice some of the exquisite gems of this chapter. Angels were present at creation, and saw the origin of all things; but instead of murmuring at God's conceptions and workmanship, they sang, adoring Him for his goodness and wisdom: and shall man, the latest born, presume to sit in judgment? It would be better far for him, like them, to shout for joy. Then again, how absolutely beyond man are the phenomena of the natural world, with the succession of day and night, the separation of sea and land, the laws which regulate snow, hail, ice, and rain! All our modern investigations have taught us one thing, that we cannot create, cannot control, cannot alter—and that at the best we must submit to the laws of natural forces as the only means of inducing them to serve us. Why should we not therefore submit to God in the moral and spiritual realm, though equally unable to comprehend? "Submitting ourselves to his holy will and pleasure, and studying to serve Him in true holiness and righteousness all the days of our life."

SATURDAY, February 10. Job xxxix.

This noble description of the various animals of God's creation should certainly be studied in R.V. What graphic touches there are in these sketches of the wild goats, of the uncontrolled freedom of the wild ass, of the wild ox, of the ostrich, of the war horse, and of the eagle!

The main conception seems to be that each animal is guided by its God-given instinct to adopt the means best suited to its sustenance and preservation. How wise God is in this adaptation! Even where we are puzzled, as in the case of the ostrich, by apparent anomalies, we find on further thought that there are counter-balancing advantages. Now, would God have taken such minute and particular care over the lower orders of creation, and be indifferent to the needs of his nobler creature—man? Everywhere there are traces of design, everywhere evidences of loving arrangement.

If God so clothe the grass of the field, and so feed the birds who have neither storehouse nor barn, will He forget you, O ye of little faith? Your Heavenly Father knows what ye have need of. There is nothing in the entire range of his creation that does not affect Him. Not a bird falls to the ground without his knowing. Not a mouse is caught in a trap, nor a lamb snatched by the eagle from the pastures, nor a rabbit shot by a gun, that He does not instantly perceive. And He knows your sorrows, is sensible of your pain, is hastening with remedial help. He cannot leave you to suffer unaided, unhelped. The world is all awry through sin; He may not yet have reached the point of stopping its evil and cruelty, though this is coming; but meanwhile He has ways of escape and angels to send on errands of ministry.

Other Lands.

The Indian Famine.

ACCOUNTS continue to reach us of the heartrending condition of affairs in many parts of India. It is to be hoped that the events which are transpiring in South Africa, and the many demands which are made by the war, will not result in any lack of appreciation concerning the needs of, and our duties to, our great eastern dependency.

Rev. J. E. Scott, Ph.D., D.D., of the American Methodist Episcopal Mission, writes from Muttra, North-Western Provinces:—I have just returned from an extensive tour throughout the famine-stricken land of Rajputana, and assure you that the condition of things is awful beyond description, and is growing worse every day. The situation may be summed up: but little rain for three years, no fodder for cattle, no food for man except as imported; and, in many places, no water even to drink. Thousands, in this cold season, are perishing from off the face of the earth. All the official relief combined cannot drive back this wolf from the door. Our missionaries' hands are empty, and they must stand with bleeding hearts and see all this misery, starvation and death. We are doing what we can. The children are being gathered by agents who visit the villages, and housed, fed and clothed.

A communication from Rev. Albert Norton, Kedgaon, Poona, quotes the Times of India that "we must make up our minds to the painful certainty that the present disaster will be more widespread and serious than that of 1896-7, to say nothing of that of twenty years before." Mr. Norton goes on to remark on the good work undertaken by the Government in the way of relief; but as the famine goes on much more needs to be done. "On the relief works which we visited men were receiving one penny three farthings per day; and women one penny one farthing; while jowasi, the cheapest grain, cost three and a-half farthings per pound. As we passed by the relief-works, emaciated women, in ragged clothes, supposing us to be government officials, came and fell at our feet, saying, "Oh, sir, we cannot live on five farthings a day, when grain is so high priced, and this stone-breaking is such hard work for us."

Mr. Norton asked the native gentleman who had charge of the works visited—"Where do all these women and girls sleep at nights?" He replied, "On the ground, under the trees; we have no other place for them." Very few had any blankets—nothing but the thin cotton cloth—and the nights are cold. What a help a blanket would be to those poor women and girls, working so hard for a "subsistence ration"! And a blanket can be purchased for 1s. 4d. If some hundreds of thousands were distributed right away, how many lives they might help to bridge over this sad time!

"The famine orphans have such promise in them under future Christian training. Even on low, economic grounds, such as cementing the bonds of empire, what a pity to let them die of starvation or famine diseases! Many thanks to those but very few of the men or women on the relief who have helped us."

Mr. John Lampard, of the Balaghat Mission, who is now in this country, and may be addressed at 114, Clapton Common, London, N.E., has recently received a letter from a worker at one of the mission stations, saying: "To-day a party of seventeen people came to me, the most famine-stricken objects I have ever seen; it made my heart ache to see them. They said they had not tasted proper food for many weeks, and I believe it. They are Gond bird-catchers. Nearly all were sick. Of course, I did not hesitate to admit them, and they will probably remain here. Our workers, European and native, are all hard at work ministering to the needs of the hill people."

Soldiers in South Africa.

REPRESENTATIVES of the South Africa General Mission, the Soldiers' Christian Association, and Mr. and Mrs. Osborn Howe's work recently met at Capetown to confer as to the best means of uniting their forces with a view to more effective work. It was resolved that the organizations should, as far as possible, combine and concentrate their efforts and influence, and a basis of co-operation was agreed upon. The conference also decided that the missions should be free to work in their own way, in no sense subject to each other, but united in heart and purpose, keeping in close touch with each other, though not overlapping.

The Camp Homes.

Mr. and Mrs. Osborn-Howe, writing from Forward Camp, Third Division, say: "We came round the coast by sea from De Aar, viâ Capetown, to open, with General Gatacre's permission, Camp Soldiers' Homes for his column. Our object in proceeding directly here, the headquarters, was to introduce to their work our two colleagues, Messrs. Stewart and Denman, of the Soldiers' Christian Association.

"As soon as a marquee, which is being built for us through the generosity of the residents of King William's Town, is ready, we hope to open a seventh Camp Home at the patrol advanced camp, some distance from here. We have good tidings of our Camp Homes in the Western Province.

"Our hearts were gladdened by the sight in camp here of about thirty men waiting to hand in their names for a copy of the khaki Bible. This in broad daylight, and before the eyes of their comrades.

"As we are constantly travelling, letters and parcels may be addressed, Care of Miss Scott, Y.W.C.A., Long Street, Capetown. Parcels for free distribution among H.M.'s troops are sent freight free on application to the shipping companies, on being clearly so marked."

In the Hospitals.

Writing from Wynberg, Mr. Hinde, of the Soldiers' Christian Association, who has gone forth from Miss Sandes' Homes, says:—"The hospital-visiting is trying; it almost breaks one's heart to see the wounded lads, and to hear from their own lips all they have had to go through at Modder River and elsewhere. We ask friends at home to pray as never before for the wounded and dying men and officers, and for us that we may be filled with the love and sympathy of Jesus. The Lord is answering prayer, and is giving real blessing."

Mr. Fleming, who is working with Mr. Hinde, also writes:—"Hospital-visiting and addresses occupy us all day. We get many opportunities for straight talks. We are conscious of much power in our meetings, and it is delightful to get so many men to listen to the 'old, old story.' There are a great many real Christians in the regiments here. To hear their testimonies is a great encouragement.

"God has enabled us to have meetings in the village schoolrooms; they have been crowded, and outside the room there is always a great number waiting to get in. It is a great blessing to hear a plain Gospel preached to the lost ones, and to silently plead with the Holy Spirit to convict many souls."

The Troops on Board Ship.

Mr. Frank Cockrem, of the Open-Air Mission, reports work on board H.M. troopships leaving the Royal Albert Dock and Tilbury Dock, with Royal Artillery and other troops for the front. Permission was obtained to go on board the ships and speak freely with the men, distributing among them copies of the Marked New Testament, Miss Marsh's beautiful booklet, "Victory," and other suitable publications.

Much encouragement was experienced in the work, which will be continued as long as troops are leaving. Prayer is asked that great blessing may result. Mr. Cockrem will gratefully receive gifts of Marked Testaments, tracts, &c., addressed to the Open-Air Mission, 11, Adam Street, Strand

Notes from New York.

THE Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute is doing marvellously good work among the negroes of the South. In connection with the work, a building has been added in memory of John J. Slater, who gave 1,000,000dols. to constitute the Slater fund, and of General Armstrong, the founder of the Hampton Institute, from which Booker T. Washington (the President of Tuskegee) was graduated. The million of bricks and the lumber were made by the Tuskegee students, and the building throughout is the result of student labour.

A few days ago mortgages to the extent of 30,000dols., including the entire indebtedness of all the Methodist churches in the city of Albany (the capital of this State), were publicly burned in the presence of Bishop Warren and other prominent men of the denomination.

The Church Temperance Society proposes to introduce two Temperance bills in the Legislature at Albany next month, these bills being the results of conferences by the Society with ten other religious and philanthropic societies and Columbia University. One of these provides for the appointment of a probationary officer for each city magistrate's court, to look after fines imposed for drunkenness. This officer comes on the scene when a man is fined and unable to pay, in order to report the culprit's circumstances to the magistrate, and see that the fine is paid within a specified time. Many such men under the present plan lose situations through having to go to prison because unable to pay a fine, or find the money promptly. The other bill provides for a farm colony to which inebriates sentenced for periods of from thirty days to six months may go, instead of to Blackwell's Island.

The scheme calls for some ten or twenty acres of land in a rural district upon which the men are to work. The institution is to be in charge of a physician, so that the inmates may receive remedial treatment. As the State is now receiving 12,000,000dols. annually from saloons, an expenditure of 1,000,000dols. of this amount may, without impropriety, be applied to counteracting the evils of drink.

In Albany, a crusade has been inaugurated against swearing. At a large meeting, the members of a number of religious organizations and other citizens pledged themselves to further every effort to stop the use of profanity and of indecent language, and to help the city authorities to enforce the laws prohibiting profanity in public places.

The last church in this city in which Mr. Moody ever spoke was the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian, and in his prayer at the morning service he referred to that pulpit as being the most important in America. Dr. Purves, of Princeton University, has been unanimously called to the pastorate. His first sermon was based on Heb. xiii. 8: "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." "Christ is still man. He did not cast his lot with mankind for just the thirty-three years of his residence on earth, but when He became man He became man for ever. On the throne of God He bears man's nature for evermore."

Zenana Bible and Medical Mission.

THE Zenana Bible and Medical Mission has recently appointed two experienced missionaries to Durbhunga, in the North of Behar, which is the most neglected district, as regards mission work, in India. Miss Poynter and Miss E. Wright are at present itinerating in Durbhunga. They have met with a very hearty welcome, and find many openings. The population of the district is 3,500,000; and, amongst these, Miss Poynter says, there has hitherto been only one missionary at work—a German. Nothing whatever has previously been done for the women and girls. The Z.B. and M.M. are most anxious to strengthen their work in North India, and are praying for many more ladies to offer, and that funds may be provided to meet the perpetually growing needs.

A Missionary Call From the War.

By J. F. T. Hallowes,
Principal of Cliff Missionary College.

HOWEVER much we may deplore the present conflict (and the writer of this deplores it greatly), yet we are free to admit that the enthusiasm, the determination, and the self-denial with which the campaign is being conducted are all very significant and instructive, especially from the point of view of the battles of the Christian Church in heathen and Mohammedan lands.

I. Our soldiers are giving freely the most precious thing of all—life itself—in the interests of their country. On December 30 it was stated in the daily press that of our officers and men 968 had died of wounds and disease, 3,524 were wounded, while 2,311 were missing—in all, 6,813 have been put out of action, in addition to those invalided by sickness due to severe tropical rainstorms, considerable privations, and forced marches. What supreme devotion these men are showing! In spite of the sacrifice of young and vigorous life, no voice, able to catch the nation's ear, cries, "Withdraw, the sacrifices are too great!" And yet there are Christians able to make themselves heard in ecclesiastical circles who have sounded that note when the climate has been specially deadly, and our missionaries have seemed to die before their time.

Such ought to learn a lesson from the prevalent enthusiasm, and recognise that the fulfilment of our Captain's commands is worth dying for.

II. As our soldiers fall, others press forward, thus proving how ardent is their zeal for their country. The Reservists come to the front, the Volunteers, the Yeomanry, the Honourable Artillery Company are by thousands putting themselves at the disposal of the War Office, being willing to leave England, though the men of the three last-mentioned arms are not pledged to do so. Truly such might alter the verse of the well-known hymn, and, substituting "Land" for "Lord," say:

> Yet if I might make some reserve,
> And duty did not call,
> I love my land with zeal so great
> That I could give it all.

For many of our citizen soldiers are giving up good positions in professions and in trade. Oh, that a corresponding spirit might animate the Church, that her vast reserves would come forward with similar self-denial, and especially that well-to-do Christians who have no special home-ties, natural or spiritual, would go to the realms shadowed by heathenism and Mohammedanism, without being chargeable to any missionary society, even though they join one.

III. How suggestive, too, is the self-sacrifice of relatives who are freely giving up their sons, husbands and brothers in the interests of their country! Here, indeed, is a lesson to those who, in the Holy War, possess no corresponding zeal, but who often surround the would-be missionary with an atmosphere of opposition which is not justified by the circumstances, and which makes the hardest of his battles the battle of leaving home.

A solid phalanx of protesting friends has often stood between the missionary and the land to which God has called him.

IV. Many who cannot actually fight are going to South Africa to attend to those who can. More than 2,000 doctors, nurses, stretcher-bearers have already gone. Of the latter, several have fallen while seeking the wounded or conveying them from the field. We need an analogous ministry in the "regions beyond." We need far more "Homes" than we have whither wounded missionaries can retire, and where they will have the benefit of wise ministrations, physical and spiritual.

Our missionaries are frequently subjected to a double strain—the depressing influence of a tropical climate and of the hell-impregnated atmosphere of heathendom. Both these wear down their nerves and their spirits too; but both could be happily antagonized in Christian "Homes" where the moral atmosphere was charged with love, joy and peace, and where there were daily ministrations of the truth of God.

V. Gold is being poured out most lavishly for the conveyance and support of troops, for military munitions, and in a hundred other ways demanded by the prosecution of scientific warfare. We shall, indeed, be fortunate if £50,000,000 covers all expenses, especially in view of the fact that the Crimean War, with half the number of men engaged, cost £100,000,000.

How ungrudgingly these enormous sums are given that a maximum number of men may be hurried into eternity in a minimum of time; but how hard it is for our Missionary Societies to get sufficient means to support that army of spiritual soldiers, certainly not more than 15,000, with about 62,000 native auxiliaries, which is fighting against sin and Satan with a view to the everlasting salvation of the souls of men!

Never was war so costly as at present, for it was never so scientific as it is now; but in view of national honour, national defence, and the extension of the empire, money seems to be no object. When will rich Christians generally rise to the liberality of a very few of their number, and give some fair proportion to foreign missions for the glory of Him "who has given them power to get wealth"?

VI. Neither Great Britain nor Greater Britain is dismayed at the difficulties of the task before the Empire. Our regiments may be decimated, our finest officers killed, immense sums expended, thousands of persons ruined—it matters not, the spirit of Britain and her Colonies rises with every defeat and disaster.

Our colonies rally round the Mother Country. Australia, Canada, and New Zealand send contingent after contingent. Great Britain and Greater Britain mean to win, if human valour, science, and determination can compass victory. Truly "the children of this world are for their generation wiser than the children of light;" and not only wiser, but more zealous and courageous in that lower realm in which their activities are engaged. The Paris newspaper, Le Temps, commends the present spirit of England in the words: "It is the unshakable determination of a people opposing an unyielding front to adverse fortune, and unable to brook defeat."

But this spirit is only found in the minority of the Church of Christ. Immense countries have been but very partially evangelized; whole provinces have as yet in them not one single soldier of the Cross. And this sad fact gives no inspiration to multitudes of Christians, who take it as much for granted as they do the succession of the seasons. Most of us are so well able to brook defeat that we take hardly any pains to send reinforcements—young people eager to go and qualified for the fight. When the tithes come into the Lord's treasury, the reinforcements will go out to fight the Lord's battles, and weary missionaries, contending almost single-handed against hosts of foes, will rejoice at new prospects of victory.

Lancing Homes.—The seaside homes of rest, in connection with the N.E. London Gospel Mission, fulfil a useful purpose. The sick poor received at the institution have benefited both spiritually and physically. The freehold of the capacious premises has been offered to the mission on very desirable terms, but the sum contributed by friends in response to an appeal has proved insufficient. The owners kindly consent to keep their offer open until March 25 next. Mr. Wm. Chorley, superintendent, 6, Clephane Road, Canonbury, will gladly supply full particulars.

The Worthies of Past Years.—This poor nation of England hath, for many generations in a succession, had a number of precious, righteous ones, who have, through God's grace, walked close with God, and been kept in a great degree unspotted from the defilements of the ungodly times they lived in. These were the Atlases of their several ages; these have often found favour of God to beg the life of this nation when its neck hath been on the very block. But they are gone, or wearing away apace, and a new generation coming in their room. Unhappy would that day be called when you were born if you should be the men and women that, by degenerating from the power of holiness, should cut the banks which was their chief care to keep up, and so let in a desolating judgment to overflow the land.

Christian Endeavour.

TOPIC FOR FEB. 4.

Things that Endure (Matt. vii. 21-27).

THERE is a large amount of nominal religion in the world. And it consists in speech and act. Men say, Lord, Lord; and men in Christ's name cast out demons, and do wonderful works. How much unreality there is in us all. We are unreal in our attitudes, we bend our heads in apparent prayer, but our hearts are far away. We are unreal in our speech, often saying things to people we do not mean. We are unreal in our prayers, asking for things we have no real desire for. We are unreal in our protestations to our Master Christ, for who of us always does what He would wish? This unreality will not endure beyond the confines of this world. In the dread eternity we shall be judged not by our professions but our possessions; and how awful to hear Him who sits on the throne protest that He never knew us!

We are all engaged in building structures which must be tested. Some build in gold, silver, and precious stones; others wood, hay, and stubble. But whether we wish it or not, our characters are bound to rise tier on tier, brick by brick, course after course. Our life-work proceeds inevitably. We cannot say that we will relinquish and discontinue our building; even this is a part of our erection, for evil, and subsequent chagrin. The choice of the foundation is all-important. No house is stronger than its foundation; should that be weak, nothing will save it from disintegration. The pattern may be beautiful, and the arrangement convenient, but the underground choice and work are the most important. If these be faulty, the whole fabric is doomed.

The wise man chooses the rock. Do you ask what the rock is? The Lord answers the inquiry, by saying, "Whoso heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them." To obey Him, to cling to Him, to take Him as the Lord and King of our life, to will his will and take his way—this is to build on the sure foundation, and the precious corner-stone of which the prophet Isaiah, and the Apostles Paul and Peter speak.

The foolish man selects the sand. It is certainly easier to dig foundations there, if foundations they can be called. "Sand" stands for the profession which is not possession; for the easy acknowledgment of Christ with no obedience or change of life; for saying Lord, Lord, and not doing the things that He says. And indeed one cannot tell the frailty of such a foundation until the hour of trial comes. A row of houses looks much the same from end to end; it is only when an earthquake comes that you can discern which were on the rock and which on sand. Only the man who built them knows for certain.

The description of the storm is very vivid. All parts of the buildings were assailed at once. Rain descended on the roof; floods came against the foundations, and winds against the walls. It was as though a second deluge had broken forth. But it soon detected the rock-foundation from the sand. "He that believeth shall not make haste." There was no need for the wise man to rush from his home for shelter. He knew that there was an impregnable foundation beneath him, and that he had put good, steady work into the fabric. The house of the foolish man fell. The Apostle says of some men that they may be saved, while all the work of their life will be destroyed.

The storm is an emblem of temptation, of trial and trouble, of some awful crisis, of the hour of death, and the day of judgment. These hours come to us all, and woe be to us if we are not built into that living stone to whom coming, we as living stones are built up a spiritual house. If we are united to Christ, we can view without fear the wreck of worlds. If not we shall be swept down with the torrent.

C. E. NOTES.

A Christian Endeavour sailor, who is with the Naval Brigade at the Modder River, writes thus: "Meetings are held every night by our lads, and we have some blessed times here. We have King Jesus with us, and it is at these times that we can realize 'What a Friend we have in Jesus,' amidst all the danger of shot and shell which we are exposed to. We can and do trust Him in all things, and if it should be his will to call us up higher, may it be said of us, 'they have fought a good fight.' Praise God! We have several hundred wounded men lying here, so we lads go tent visiting, speaking a word for Jesus."

In an article, entitled "Some Certain Possibilities for 1900," Dr. Clark urges Christian Endeavourers to listen to the same voice which spoke to Moody in his early career, saying to him: "The world does not yet know what God can do through a fully consecrated man." He adds: "It is my longing desire to realize during this New Year the possibilities of the indwelling of God."

A Question for Ingersoll:

"WHAT HAS TAKEN THE KICK OUT OF MY LIFE?"

GOLIATH was surprised to see young David coming out to fight against a giant. Not less surprised must have been the late Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll when he saw one morning a young man, of about twenty-five years of age, entering his apartments and facing him, the great champion of infidelity, with the question: "What do you consider the right way in which a young man should live? In other words, which do you think would help a young man most, Christianity or infidelity?" Not receiving any reply, the visitor continued: "Perhaps, if you knew a little of my past life, and of the change that has come over me, you would be better able to tell me"—and hurriedly he gave him a retrospect of his past.

It was the story of a "Good for Nothing," shirking school, defying all discipline, mischievous, daring, bold, trying a dozen different trades and positions, and sticking to none—at the same time the pride and the grief of a mother's heart. Afforded facility for riding on horseback, he early developed a passion for horses, which led him to race-courses and later on to America, where he continued to lead a more or less wild life until the blessed truth of the Gospel dawned upon him and turned the whole current of his thoughts and desires into heavenward channels.

It was at a meeting of the Boston Y.M.C.A. that he received the full assurance of personal salvation, and the next evening found him on board the old training-ship Ohio, giving his testimony to the young men there. The next step was to write to his fiancée in New York of the happy change in his life and urge her to come to the Saviour, which she did. They were married soon after, and happily settled with Mr. Sargent, a rich estate owner who had been employing young Roberts before, and had proved helpful in his conversion. During the whole of his lifetime he remained a faithful friend to the young man, who in his turn became instrumental in the salvation of scores of his fellow men.

How he regretted his neglected education! Happily, not long! With his usual energy, he set to work, dragging through the spelling process at a night school and in private classes until able to enter college, where he studied for three terms of six months each. To proclaim the joyful news in his spare time, no matter where—to subordinate every factor in his life to the great cause of Christ—to try the almost impossible in order to be fully equipped as a messenger in the Lord's message—this was the new ambition of the new man, and proved far more fascinating than all the former pleasures of sporting life. Seeing the spell-binding effect of music and singing upon unconverted masses, he began to play the cornet, and was soon able to lead the singing in mission and open-air work.

Invited in 1878 by some members of the Y.M.C.A. to conduct a series of meetings in a little room of the old building, he did so, and God blessed his word above all expectation. The little room could not take in the people. A larger room became also crowded. Finally they had to remove to another building. Hundreds were brought to God as the result of that revival. Largely due to it was the erection of the new Y.M.C.A., which counts among the finest buildings of Boston City.

At the time of the interview referred to, Messrs. Moody and Sankey, Whittle, and McGranahan were on an evangelistic visit to Boston. It was in the year 1877; Mr. Roberts helped in the work as much as his time permitted. One Sunday morning, when returning from the ships at the wharves, where he had distributed religious literature, he read a notice of Colonel Ingersoll's delivering one of his infamous lectures against God, and instantly the Spirit prompted him to go and see the lecturer. What could he say to the wonderful change which had taken place in his heart the moment he believed in the Son of God? Let us quote Mr. Roberts' own words in his book, "Ways and Means," published by James H. Earle, Boston.

Colonel Ingersoll said: "Oh, no doubt you were influenced by some religious excitement or other, and you were carried away by it, such as a revival, or something of that kind."

I replied: "No, it was not in any revival, but alone in my closet I commenced to seek after God." I kept that thought before him—how could he account for the change which had come into my life?

Finally he said: "Oh, you were like a young colt who had been kicking over the traces, until you thought you had enough of this nonsense and would quit."

Here was where I considered Mr. Ingersoll's argument to be a lame one. He was talking to the wrong man about colts, for I had served my apprenticeship at that business, and knew that when it was natural for a kicking colt, he would kick when he was an old horse, unless that nature to kick were changed.

That was just what I had asked Mr. Ingersoll to explain. What has taken the kick out of my life, wherein I had been kicking against God?

If I remember rightly, I said to him, "Colonel, you don't seem to understand how such a change could be brought. Well," I said, "the Word of God explains why you don't understand; for it says, 'The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.'"

He said, "No, I cannot see it in that way."

Again I replied, "It is because the god of this world has blinded your mind, lest the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ should shine unto you."

There was snow on the ground, and I said, "Colonel,

MR. T. D. ROBERTS, BOSTON, U.S.A.

if you were riding out with me in a sleigh, and you had on a pair of blue glasses, would not the snow be to your natural eye the colour which the blue glass would make it, and, instead of the snow being white, would it not be blue?"

He caught my illustration in a minute, and said with a laugh: "I need spiritual glasses, do I?" I said: "You need the Spirit of God if you ever expect to understand his truth, or see the mysteries concerning the kingdom of God. 'For eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him; but God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit, for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God.'"

After some more talk, I said: "Come, Colonel, answer my first question; now you know a little about what I have been, who I am, and what I am trying to do, what would you advise me—to go on the way I am going, or leave it and do as your teaching of infidelity would have me do?"

He said: "I should go on in the way you have been going if I were you, if you are persuaded that is the right way to live."

I said: "Colonel, I am persuaded that is the way to live, and that is the way I intend to go, and you had better come and go that way too. Let us have a word of prayer."

I fell upon my knees, and prayed most earnestly that God would bless my visit that morning to bring light and save this man with whom I had been talking. During my prayer Mr. Ingersoll never moved; but, as I looked up quickly after prayer, his head was bowed, and his chin was resting in his hand against his breast. I reached to him my hand, wished him good-bye, and took my departure.

Since 1888 Mr. Roberts has held the position of president of the Boston Industrial Home, which was started twenty-two years ago by the late Dr. Gordon and others, with the aim of helping the homeless, the friendless, and destitute, by lifting them up to a higher plane of life.

As reports show, God has wonderfully blessed this work, both materially and spiritually, under the efficient methods of an evangelist with thorough business knowledge. On our recent visit to Boston, we had the pleasure of seeing the Home, which in late years has grown into an important institution.

During 1898 no fewer than 534 men and 383 women, discharged from penal institutions, were received into the Home, and over 700 of the total number signed the pledge.

We never saw a more magnificent gaol than the Massachusetts Prison on Deer Island, to which Mr. Roberts kindly conducted us. The passing traveller in a foreign country cannot possibly form an opinion of things and surroundings. He can only speak of impressions. Mine was that the range of buildings along the seashore looked more like a seaside resort than a prison. Inside lofty halls men and women silently at work; throughout the place a scrupulous cleanliness, and the infirmary a perfect gem of a hospital; the vestibule full of flowers, the floors beeswaxed; in the ward two mothers, their new-born babes, lying—would you believe it?—on frilled pillows! What an inducement for a poor, harassed human being to come back to such a place!

Mr. Roberts, to whom we made this remark, said: "For that reason the importance of a Home like ours cannot be over-estimated. Idle hands are the devil's ministers. By giving people the opportunity of earning their living, and by keeping them away from the contaminating influence of those haunts where idleness and crime congregate, we are able to help them without making paupers of them. Every man and woman is placed under the sound and influence of the Gospel, and the many cases of conversion are most encouraging to our work."

Dr. Gordon in his preface to the book mentioned above spoke appreciatively of Mr. Roberts's instrumentality in this special work. In the "Record of Christian Work," April, 1897, Rev. John L. Scudder, of Jersey City, writes: "You will be interested by the mighty work done here by T. D. Roberts, the evangelist from Boston, who is also superintendent of the Boston Industrial Home. For three weeks he has been labouring in this city with great effectiveness. One church alone will receive over a hundred members as the outcome of the work."

"Not Heavy—Not Shortened."

NOT "heavy" is the Ear
Thy prayers are seeking.
Why shouldst thou, seized with fear,
Forbear thy speaking?
As mothers' ears are keen,
Awake or sleeping—
So God, alert, unseen,
Safe watch is keeping.

Not "shortened" is the Arm
To thee extended;
Then bid thy false alarm
Be quickly ended.
That stretched-out Arm is strong,
Almighty ever;
That out-stretched Arm is long,
And faileth never.

Not shortened is God's Arm,
Nor dull his hearing;
He bends with welcome warm,
And both hands bearing
The blessings thou dost crave
In richest measure.
Receive, till thou shalt have Abounding treasure.

Flashes of Light:
From the Convict Cell.

By CHAS. COOK.

"FIVE years' penal servitude!" The man sentenced before me got "for life;" but although stunned by the fact that I was a convict, yet I felt thankful it was so much less than "for life." But perhaps 'tis but a dream.

. . . . . .

A year has gone, I cannot say flown! It has seemed a millennium. Yet how changed I feel! Have seen no darling children, yet seem contented and supported. That chaplain's a brick. Fancy him saying to me:

"Just consider yourself a slave till your time is out. Every action of your life will have to be just what your taskmasters may command you to do. Try and bear up meekly and submissively, and remember that though your body is condemned to slavery, your thoughts, your mind, and heart are free—free to commune with God, free to pray, free to praise, and free to repent. Blessings you little dream of may, by God's mercy, arise out of what is now so bitter a trial."

. . . . . .

It seems impossible that only three years have gone since in our lovely home I saw my own loved little ones and wife, now.

BADGED, AND CROPPED, AND CLOTHED,

I stand—a convict! By birth a gentleman, by education a scholar; but through one sin a felon! Nor would I have it otherwise, despite the awful degradation, for only since this ordeal have I been really free.

Thank God for that man in this awful inferno. He has treated me as a gentleman, and that appealed to my heart.

Yes, it was through his preaching that I first grasped and realized the pure, great, simple fact that salvation was free—perfectly free to everyone who would really, truly, and as a little child accept it with a full determination to repent truly, and, by God's help, strive to lead a new life. He also taught me the great fact that man needs no one to stand between himself and his God but Christ his Saviour; and no man, priest or layman, ordained or unordained, consecrated or not, to be a go-between or medium between Jesus and sinful men. Were it not that I dare not for my children's sakes, some of whom have never known of my disgrace, or where "father is travelling for these long four years," I would, on my release, publish abroad the name and value of the man through whose help I found my very prison a palace, and my penal servitude a pleasure.

. . . . . .

Bravely shone the sun one bright spring morning when outside the door of H.M. Prison at P—— a lady stood waiting. Presently the door opened, and a gentleman appeared. A loving embrace! a cab drew up, and in a moment was driving to the station.

"Thanks be unto God, wife; He has preserved me in body, and set my spirit free to serve Him."

A MURDERER THROUGH DRINK.

Whilst passing through the carpenters' shop in H.M. prison, Portsmouth, I said to a convict—on whose arm I saw the fatal initial L, which told me he had been sentenced "for life"—"For what were you sentenced?"

"For killing a man, the authorities say," answered the man, "but I know no more about it than you, sir."

"Do you mean you are not guilty?"

"No, I don't mean that, I awoke in a police cell one morning, some four years ago, to find I was to be charged with murder.

"I have no more recollection of striking that man than you have, sir. I occasionally did get the worse for liquor, and it appears one night, in a drunken quarrel, I struck a man several times, with this result—he died, and I exist a life convict!"

"Do you seek the Lord in your trouble?" I asked.

"Well, I've tried, but a convict prison is hardly the place to cultivate a Christian life—there's nothing congenial in your surroundings, and there seems no one here to help a fellow."

"God can help you, and you have his Word; and, at least, I will pray for you."

"Thank you, sir; thank you. Good morning, sir;" and the hopeless, dejected-looking man went on with his monotonous work.

Strange to say, before I had left the prison I had spoken to two other men whose experience was almost identical with the above—drink the cause; and until awakened in custody they had no knowledge of the awful sin they had committed.

A BACKSLIDER IN PRISON.

It was at the close of a service for women prisoners in the city of Stockholm that we saw her. Some forty in the congregation had sought an interest in our prayers; but she appeared hardened, until some word spoken in kindness by the lady who was with me touched her heart, and she broke down in tears.

She had been a Sunday-school teacher, had loved the Lord, and had been a worker for souls; but had grown cold, had neglected prayer; then was found in company with an unconverted friend, who led her astray and betrayed her trusting confidence.

"My father cursed me, my mother turned me from her door, and, without food for my babe, I preferred to drop it into the river than see it dying with hunger." Tried and found guilty, she was sentenced to "Imprisonment for life."

Visiting again the following day, we had the joy of seeing her face wreathed in smiles.

"The Lord has restored unto me the joy of his salvation. Oh, how gracious He has been! Will you praise Him for his goodness to me?"

Yet though God has forgiven her, He has not released her; and I presume she still remains the inmate of a prison cell, though a child of God. How fearful are the consequences of sin. Let Christians beware of the beginnings of sin. The blessed Lord had forgiven her backslidings, but He does not blot out the trial, the sentence, the punishment, the disgrace, the stigma. What had this poor girl's backslidings cost her? Penal servitude for life! Awful fate! and more especially so because a child of God is suffering it.

A CONVICT, YET A CHRISTIAN.

After serving nearly twenty years out of a "life" sentence, he was discharged to my care, and became our hall-keeper.

When I first saw him I asked him what he had been "outside." "A soldier, sir." "How long?" "Seven years, sir, and the Duke would tell you that there has never been a mark against my character."

"Now tell Mr. Cook," said Chief Warder George, "how many times you have been reported." He smiled.

"I have no report against me this twenty years."

A MAN WORTH HELPING.

After being with me over a year, we got him parochial work, and though the end may sound like a story book, yet it is none the less a fact: he married and "lived happily ever afterwards," all the world and his wife knowing nothing of his past. It was while reading the Bible in his cell that the light shone into his soul; and concerning his wife (a middle-aged woman, living as servant in the house adjoining Hyde Park Hall), he said to me, "Thank the Lord, sir, we are both rowing in the same boat."

Child-Saving.

HAPPILY there are between seven and eight hundred child-saving institutions in this country, exclusive of ordinary orphanages. Each institution has its own particular province, limited by age, sex, or some other circumstance; but by far the greater number of them are in some way connected with the central office of the Children's Aid Society.

The Society has a staff of officers ever actively engaged in seeking and saving destitute and neglected children; but, besides this, the information and help given in the office of the Society are instrumental in preventing many a child from drifting to ruin. The flexibility of this part of the work may, perhaps, be best demonstrated by the following applications which came to the office within one or two days quite recently.

A widower steps up to the counter with his three girls and one boy. He has no one with whom he can leave his children to be trained and controlled. He is poor, but offers £40 a year out of his income towards their support.

A mother from Lancashire left her child boarded out; and, as she had cause to suspect that the infant was not well treated, one of the Society's agents went to fetch the child, which was placed within reasonable distance of where the mother was in service.

The Society's officers visit some 2,000 children every year. Half of this number are placed in reformatory, industrial, or voluntary homes. Inquirers about these children, years afterwards, prove that about 80 per cent. do well, and much evidence of consistent Christian living has been forthcoming.

The office of the Society is at 32, Charing Cross, S.W.

The Y.M.C.A.

DR. HARRY GUINNESS'S week's mission in Dublin, conducted under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A., was attended by large numbers, and the gatherings, which aroused widespread interest, were remarkable for spiritual power. The appeals of the speaker moved the hearers to tears. Many instances of definite blessing have come under notice, and the children of God were greatly refreshed. The two missionary lectures were vivid and impressive. The mission gave much blessing and encouragement to the Y.M.C.A. members.

As a result of the evangelistic mission recently held at Canning Town, over 100 young men have expressed a desire to join the local Y.M.C.A. An effort is being made to secure new premises, which are greatly needed.

The Dumbarton Association, through the generosity of Lord Overtoun, has freed its building of a debt amounting to about £800.

Mr. Herbert Smart, a worker in connection with the Bristol Y.M.C.A., has been appointed to the secretaryship at Weston-super-Mare, vacant by the resignation of Mr. H. Harrison. Bristol has sent no fewer than eleven of its best workers into the Y.M.C.A. secretariat.

The Anglo-American Y.M.C.A. of Paris have issued their thirty-first annual report, in which it is announced that the Extension Scheme Fund has now reached over £600. The committee are desirous of effecting many needful improvements in view of the forthcoming Paris Exposition. The secretary is Mr. Henry D. Barclay, 160, Rue Montmartre, Paris.

The Derby Association at its annual meeting, presided over by Sir Henry H. Bemrose, M.P., welcomed its new secretary, Mr. Frank W. White, late of Cornhill; and Mr. F. J. Chamberlain, late of Plymouth, was similarly welcomed at the anniversary gathering of the Hanley Y.M.C.A., when Mr. Robert Heath, J.P., of Biddulph Grange, occupied the chair.

The annual social meeting in connection with the Manchester Y.M.C.A. was held in the Association Building, Peter Street, on the 25th ult. There was, as usual, a very large attendance of members and their friends, and a varied programme was provided. Mr. W. J. Crossley, president, occupied the chair. The general secretary (Mr. W. H. Newett) submitted an abstract of the annual report, giving a number of interesting particulars of various departments of work, and adducing statistics which showed the extent and varied character of the movement. Among other items it was shown that 458 Bible classes and other religious meetings had been held, with an attendance of 6,015. Addresses were subsequently given by the Bishop of Manchester and Sir W. H. Houldsworth, M.P

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

FIFTEENTH WEEK OF MEETINGS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

Testimony of Ministers.

In pastoral letters and otherwise, a number of ministers have been giving utterance to their feelings of gratitude for what they have experienced of the Campaign. An East-end pastor testifies that "instead of the interest in the movement being exhausted in its beginning, it is growing steadily. We may reasonably hope that it will go on growing throughout the whole winter, and that the spiritual and moral life of our city will be quickened." One, whose church was a centre of operations, says, "Christians are strengthened in the faith and encouraged in the work. It is felt that lasting good has been done through the meetings."

Many lessons are being brought home to Christian workers. Sabbath School teachers are receiving one on the great value of opportunities lost in the past through lack of individual dealing with their scholars. The church at large is being awakened to the need for a more effective link than at present exists between itself and the growing generation, and to the fact that this cannot be adequately provided by Sabbath Schools alone, as these are at present conducted.

Big Lads and Girls.

In the reports handed in on Monday it was evident that the work among the children was still being most conspicuously blessed. A new departure had been made by Mr. Alexander Mackeith in connection with meetings held in the mission hall of Wellington Church. During the first week they had been conducted on the usual lines, but a restriction was then introduced, allowing the attendance only of boys and girls over fourteen. The outcome was eminently satisfactory, we ourselves being pleased to find—at the closing meeting—a good representation of a class which we had not found at any other campaign service. Speaking to a number of lads in the after-meeting, we were impressed with the representative character of the audience, all whom we met being from neighbouring schools and missions.

Speaker and workers all felt their hearts uplifted by what they saw and heard, and we noticed a specially tender tone in Mr Mackeith's voice as he tried to help on the "Little Faiths." The Pilgrim's Progress lessons opened each evening with a picture of the Cross, and a truly spiritual work was done. A touching feature on the girls' side, was the activity of the members of Wellington Church Christian Endeavour Society, in seeking out and bringing to the services girls in whom they were specially interested.

Another gratifying report was that of a mission conducted by Mr John Stewart (the Children's Evangelist) in Free St. Mary's Church, Govan, and into which the minister (Rev. Robert Howie) and local workers had thrown themselves with great energy. On the closing evening, only those who had been personally dealt with at previous meetings were admitted, yet the audience numbered about six hundred, no fewer than four hundred of whom had come provided with Bibles.

One of the latest and loudest calls for the help of the Campaign workers is on behalf of the fallen women of the city.

Mr. M'Neill in the Western District.

In going from district to district for his fortnightly missions, Mr. McNeill has been obliged to accommodate himself to ever varying circumstances. His meetings during the last two weeks were in St. Vincent Parish Church. A little to his own surprise, it became evident from the opening evening that they were to be largely gatherings of Christians, with comparatively few outsiders. Church members and office bearers came in goodly numbers and from all denominations, and the meetings proved to be of great value as a means of quickening and deepening the spiritual life of the congregations represented. The evangelistic side of the work was also kept in the front throughout, and ministers and workers were cheered by the fact that the Lord was unmistakably working in their midst.

On visiting the mission on Monday week (January 22), we found the evangelist opening the second week with a note of praise to the Lord for what He had wrought. Christians were called on to be up and doing, for it behoved them in such a time to be busy with tongue, and foot, and hand. Wherever Mr. McNeill has gone he has stimulated many humble ones by showing the way in which the Lord uses things "ridiculously weak" to glorify his own great Name. "Speak a simple word to your neighbour during the day, as if you meant it—a kindly word spoken with your own accent and emphasis; and God is behind you and it."

The subject was the story of the four lepers in the gate of Samaria (2 Kings vii.), and the main object of the preacher seemed to be to arouse nominal Christians to the necessity of examining the ground on which their profession rested. In speaking of the great change which salvation brings, he insisted on the element of complete surprise on the part of the individual, and declared that if any of them ever did get over this it would be a bad sign indeed. "If any of you have no feeling of surprise, are you Christians at all? . . . God grant to all preachers, especially, a wave of infinite surprise that they themselves are saved!" Pressing the subject home, he added that "it is awful—the darkness of the decent, respectable, church-going, but unsaved heart; dark in the midst of light, dying in the midst of plenty. . . . The professing Church has lost the blood-heat it had. God give it back as in the Pentecostal days." In closing, the earnest hope was expressed that from such meetings there might go out a company of "cleansed, pardoned, saved sinners," who would be always anxious to tell to somebody this great fact, which is dearest and deepest in their hearts.

Ever and anon there came a ringing appeal to the unsaved, as when he reminded them that this might be the night of salvation for them, and dwelt solemnly on the fact that if they missed it then they might miss it for ever.

Among others who took part in the service were the minister of the church (Rev. J. Bell Henderson) and Mr. Peden (Home Missionary of Claremont Church). As Mr. McNeill required to leave immediately at the close of his address for the service in Renfield Church, the after-meeting was conducted by Rev. Mr. Gibson, and a large company remained to pray.

Dennistoun Division.

Joining the workers of Alexandra Parade United Presbyterian Church (Rev. William Mackenzie) in the open air on Tuesday evening, we found a bright and vigorous testimony being borne. Point was given to the Gospel message by their being able to tell of conversions on the previous evening. On the march to the church a halt was made at every crossing, and invitations to come to the Saviour as well as to the meetings rang out from the lips of the evangelist (Mr. James Marshall) and local workers.

The attendances have been good, and the work is being loyally supported by the neighbouring congregations. In addition to the pastor, Rev. William Arnott (Dennistoun E.U. Church) took part in the service.

Mr. Marshall finds in the great Biblical biographies the basis of much of his preaching. Having begun on Sabbath with Daniel, we found him dealing with Ruth, the personal and definite nature of whose choice of God was vividly brought home, especially to the younger people. The example of Orpah was pictured in the background, as a warning against outward profession while the heart is still unchanged. Illustrations were drawn from a long and rich experience. Telling the story of his own conversion thirty-six years ago, he was urgent on young converts to come out clearly at the first. Two men were leaving the church when a worker asked if they would not like to know the Lord, and found both really ready to yield themselves to Christ, which they did before leaving.

Good Work in Springburn.

Mr. W. D. Dunn began work last week in Springburn United Presbyterian Church (Rev. Alexander Gilchrist), and found himself in the midst of a praying people zealous to win souls. From the first the blessing came down. On Wednesday evening the weather was cold and wet, but Mr. Logan and some fellow-workers from Bethany Hall had brought along their open-air lantern apparatus, and a crowd of between three and four hundred was held spellbound while a series of pictures and texts illustrated a stirring address. As Mr. Logan denounced in strong terms the evils of the drink traffic, we heard fervent responses in low tones from men near us. Mr. Gilchrist assured us that many were hearing the Gospel in this way who repelled all invitations to church or hall.

Through an excellently organized band of workers, a continuous testimony is borne among the teeming artisan population, and the evangelist finds himself labouring in soil thoroughly prepared. Christians are being strengthened, backsliders restored, and brands plucked from the burning. Among the helpers Mr. Dunn found one who had been blessed at his meetings twenty years ago, and another in 1873. Rev. B. J. Davidson, Rev. George Hanson, and other neighbouring workers are lending loyal support.

Mr. Dunn's preaching is of a heart-searching description, and is being used to bring forth the signs of true repentance. Speaking on "The Living Way" (Hebrews x. 20), those who were in doubt were counselled to test themselves by asking (1) whether they hungered more in the morning for the Word of God, or for "news from the front;" or (2) whether they had experienced the difference between praying and "saying prayers."

The after-meeting was a time of the presence of God. A woman, who told of her conversion in 1859, was gladdened by the conversion of her grandson. A mother, with her baby in her arms, had come from Bridgeton (four miles away) because of the joy she had found at Mr. Dunn's previous mission. "Pray for me," came from many a strong young man, and all such left with smiles on their faces. A young girl near us found peace in believing.

Nine o'Clock Meetings.

The impression made by the nine o'clock services in Renfield Street Church has continued to grow during the second week. On Wednesday and Thursday the building was entirely filled; and on Friday nearly so, in spite of a snowstorm before the hour of meeting. Careless, worldly people are finding their way to the meetings in large numbers. "I liked that," said one little accustomed to such experiences; "I'll be back to-morrow." Mr. McNeill has publicly acknowledged his appreciation of the honest work done by many in inviting men and women who are strolling about. He feels it a great privilege to be thus brought face to face with fresh audiences.

In conversation at the close, Mr. McNeill said he had felt very much encouraged by the success which had followed these meetings. Clear-cut decisions for Christ have been made by those for whom the new life means a great change. We met a man of our own acquaintance, from the far East End, who had been caught by some words in the first address, and has been coming every evening. Tramway men and other special classes are being reached through the late hour of meeting.

A newspaper called attention to the fact that two neighbouring theatres dispersed at the same time as the meeting one evening, and added that there was little to distinguish the different congregations—a statement which will, all unwittingly, be eloquent to our readers of the class that is being reached.

The Church Army.

THE varied character of the Church Army's work, the enthusiasm and energy with which its many officers, both evangelistic and social, pursue their efforts for the bettering of humanity, have doubtless contributed largely to bring the organization into its present prominent position before the public.

Upholders of Evangelical truth, rightly jealous for their cause, have possibly been inclined to view the rise of the Army with a measure of doubt, objecting that the evangelists, in the course of their aggressive ministry, occasionally undertake missions in connection with parishes where ritualistic views obtain. Surely, it has been urged with some force, this means the formation of a working partnership, not to say an offensive and defensive alliance, with the arch enemy, sacerdotalism. The reply of Rev. Wilson Carlile is that he dare not refuse any opportunity for even where high church views obtain. The principles of the Church Army do not allow of any interference with direct effort to lead souls to Christ, and the workers must be conceded the right to declare the whole truth, and press for immediate decision. This being so, Mr. Carlile contends, Evangelical believers will surely see no objection to a Church Army mission in a ritualism-ridden district, since in such a locality a faithful presentation of the evangel is obviously greater than in one where sounder views hold sway.

These special church missions, however, now form but one department of the Army's undertakings. The catalogue of agencies is lengthy, but fresh branches of work are being continually added. One of the latest developments is an evangelistic effort to reach the most miserable classes of the population. By means of the slum "Pioneer work" the poorest have been influenced. Their deeply-rooted objection to entering an orthodox place of worship, but, it has been proved, can readily be gathered into a "Pioneer tent." When the sides of the tent are up, hundreds can stand round and listen, even whilst smoking. The tent is pitched in the most suitable spot available, decorated inside with bright mottoes and banners, and provided with comfortable seats. In cold weather it is heated by a stove.

For the work of missioner, a "man to reach the masses" is chosen. It is observed that he "can rarely boast of public school or university education—but what university or public school did St. John the Baptist know? He has had the education which Christ's great forerunner—the first Christian pioneer—had: a call from God to tell the glad tidings to his fellows." Certainly there will be little disposition to dispute the credentials of the workers while they can call forth words of encouragement such as lately fell from a Lancashire vicar, who said that, owing to Church Army evangelistic work, a certain man who, when drunk, had flung a companion through a public-house window was now a devout and valued member and church official; and another, who had been over for drunkenness, was a communicant and industrious worker.

The Army has, in more recent years, undoubtedly fulfilled a helpful purpose in calling attention to the need for work in prisons and workhouses. Recent statistics gave the average daily population of the local and convict prisons of England and Wales as 16,000. Among such a people, and under such circumstances, the work of missioning might well be regarded as especially difficult; but fruit has been seen after many days. In one instance a worker, after attending a conference in Exeter Hall, went with two friends into a restaurant near by, and, while seated there, a pencilled note was handed to him by a well-dressed man, who had risen from another table. It read as follows:

Dear Sir,—An unfortunate mistake brought me to Wormwood Scrubbs Prison, where a few months ago your words encouraged me to hope against a cold world, since which time I have been doing very well indeed, and am to-day writing for newspapers with good results. The past is not forgotten—can never be—but a new life has opened. Many thanks for words of encouragement. Often wished to see you and give you these thanks verbally. Now the opportunity. —Always faithfully yours, (Signed) ——.

The effort which has been made to reach the country's workhouses must also command sympathy. There are no less than 231,606 persons on our roll of indoor paupers, and to the work of preaching the Gospel to this great and unhappy constituency the Church Army evangelists have addressed themselves. By the use of plain terms, and with directness and fervency, they have, by the blessing of God, succeeded in arousing deep interest in spiritual matters. Their congregations have necessarily included representatives of many classes of society, and victims of widely differing forms of sin or misfortune. They deal with the "social failure," shambling and characterless, with shifty gesture and lack-lustre eye; with the ne'er-do-well, able and educated, but mad with the lust for alcohol; with the worn-out, senile toiler, tottering on the verge of the grave. Yet the effects of these have been such as to call forth thankfulness and praise. In such a connection some recent words of the chaplain of the City of London Union are notable: "The missioners were earnest and the services of a helpful character. The addresses were practical, and uttered in words full of enthusiasm, and well adapted to the capacity of the congregations. The pure word of God was preached in all earnestness to awaken the conscience and to touch the heart. I believe that great good has been done."

What may be termed the regular social work of the Army is replete with useful undertakings. There seems to be a special home, wisely and economically administered, to meet the needs of almost every kind of repentant reprobate or distressful unfortunate. Amid so much bustling toil, it is satisfactory to note the consecrated spirit with which the officers seek the personal welfare and salvation of those committed to their charge. The homeliness of the institutions is on their side. In the labour homes, the aim is to have a small number of men, supervised in kindly fashion by a "father" and "mother,"—some devoted married couple, who get to know the spiritual position of each of their "boys." That is to say, the Army's clients are units calling for individual care, as distinct from a mere heterogeneous crowd of ticketed miserables. About 100 outcasts pass annually through each of the seventy-two Labour Homes. Of these it is calculated 50 per cent. obtain a fresh start in life.

The labours of the mission-nurses, of the midnight rescue officers, of the public-house and lodging-house evangelists, also present many points calculated to arouse sympathy. Summing up the work, we may remark that while the Army holds to evangelical principles, and labours so unremittingly in the interests of those "ready to perish," it may well claim an interest in the support and prayers of those who have at heart the spiritual welfare of the masses.

The Mission to Business Men, to be conducted by Mr. Henry Varley, in connection with the City of London Bible Class Union, promises to be one of wide-spread influence and blessing. Special efforts are being made by members of the leading firms in order to secure large attendances, and the arrangements for the musical portion of the meetings are being made on an important scale. The meetings are to be held at the City Temple, February 5-9 and 12-16 inclusive, at 7 p.m.

The Operative Jewish Converts' Institution has enjoyed another quiet and progressive year. This home receives young Christian Jews in distress, and during their period of residence they are taught various trades and instructed in Christian truth. Six converts entered the home last year, and of those who left one obtained a situation in a city office, another is now a parochial agent of the London Jews' Society, and others are also doing well. The funds of the home are assisted by means of bookbinding and printing, which are carried on at the Institution, Palestine House, Bodney Road, N.E. The treasurer is Mr. Alfred R. Pite.

Among London's Work Girls.

THE annual conversazione of the Mission to Girls in Factories and Workshops, with which the name of Mrs. Fisher has been identified for so many years, was held at the Y.M.C.A. rooms, Aldersgate Street, on Thursday evening. The first part of the proceedings was a social gathering, after which a meeting of praise and thanksgiving was held, under the presidency of Mr. M. H. Hodder.

The Chairman spoke a few kindly words of encouragement and appreciation of the useful work undertaken by Mrs. Fisher and her associates, who labour so devotedly to gladden the lives and hearts of girls engaged in the city. Having alluded to the fact that the room at Aldersgate Street had been vacated on account of the expiration of the lease, he was pleased to add that a room had been secured at Falcon Square, where the young women's prayer meetings are now held.

Mrs. Fisher, in giving some details of the past year's efforts, expressed her gratitude for all the help she had received, and said they had been enabled to minister to some 3,000 young women. Since they had been at Falcon Square their meetings had been more numerously attended.

A pleasant duty was then performed by Mr. Hodder, who said many of the friends and associates of Mrs. Fisher, desirous of expressing their warm affection for her, had put into his hand a purse of money, which they wished him to present to her.

Mrs. Fisher, overcome by surprise and thankfulness, feelingly acknowledged the gift. The meeting was then open for anyone to speak of the past year's work. Mr. Downing testified to the cordial reception he had had, and the many happy services held during the midday interval. Miss White, Miss Green, and others spoke of the eagerness with which the gatherings are looked forward to by the girls. In many places of business there is an affectionate regard for the workers who strive to lead these young hearts to a knowledge of the love of God, and the redeeming grace of his Son.

By means of social and musical evenings, the girls had been gathered together in large numbers at the "Welcome," and Miss Borton and her sister told of the many anxious inquirers after truth who had attended the meetings.

Mr. Wates, speaking as an employer, paid a kind tribute to the labours of Mrs. Fisher and her associates, and spoke of the marked improvement in the conduct and lives of the girls where the work had been carried on.

The hearts of all present must have been cheered, while one after another testified, with gratitude, of the many open doors for the extension of the work. It is pleasing to find that employers heartily welcome the workers to their places of business, and render every assistance to those who are seeking to promote the spiritual interests of those in their employ.

Glasgow Y.W.C.A.

THE Glasgow Y.W.C.A. held its annual meeting in the City Hall on Monday evening, the 15th ult. After tea, Lord Overtoun alluded to the loss sustained by the Association in the absence abroad of Mrs. Oatts, the secretary, and went on to express the hope that each member might be stirred up to take some part in the work. The report showed advance in every department, that the members now number over 2,700, and that as workers retire or are called to new fields of labour, others have come forward to fill their places. A very racy and impressive address was given by Rev. Marcus Rainsford, of London, who took as his text "The Spirit also helpeth our infirmities," and pointed out the different kinds of infirmities to which human nature is prone, and the tender love and sympathy with which the Heavenly Father meets these, as well as the Divine power which is in Him to overcome them. The closing address was by Rev. J. Fairley Daly, and was a most thoughtful and helpful one, the subject being two pictures from the Bible of the ideal Christian young woman, Mary of Bethany, typifying the young woman in the home, and Lydia the woman of business.

Leeds Wesleyan Mission.

DURING the past year the three Wesleyan Missions in Leeds have been amalgamated, and from the first annual report of the organization there is every reason to believe that a wise step has been taken in the interests of the movement. A deeper spirit of hope and determination has become manifest, and the new arrangement has happily brought relief from much financial strain.

A derelict mission has been taken over, and a music hall secured for Sunday evening services. There have been signs of remarkable vitality at Oxford Place Chapel, Wesley Chapel, St. Peter's, and the other centres. The influence of the Missions has been felt increasingly by those who are indifferent to their spiritual needs.

Amongst the sick and poor the beneficent work has been carried on with diligence and efficiency, and many instances might be given of the joy and comfort brought to sad homes by this kind and timely help.

Rev. J. Gawthrop writes concerning the meetings held for lodging-house men at St. Peter's:—On Sunday evening 200 to 300 men from the model lodging-houses were gathered into the school-room, and fed with buns and tea. A policeman, who saw them, said there were present some of the worst men in the city. Yet they were most orderly. I was struck with their singing, which led me to test them, and, to my surprise, I found ninety per cent. had gone through Sunday schools.

The patient and heroic service of the Sisters has been abundantly fruitful. Each Sister finds the kind of work to which she is best adapted. One develops gifts for social effort, another has great influence among the young people, a third is specially gifted for ministering to the sick, while a fourth is wise to win souls. Sisters Annie and Mary are co-pastors of the church as well as mission workers, and their visits to the homes of the people are a means of grace. Thus specialists are found for many fields of labour, and the gracious results of their godly toil are manifold and far-reaching.

The Mission has promised 2,300 guineas to the Twentieth Century Fund, and will, of course, fulfil its promise from its own people, and the effort is, of course, kept quite distinct rom all local claims. The superintendent minister is Rev. S. Chadwick, 17, Springfield Mount, Leeds.

Worn-out Cabmen.

EXPOSED, in the pursuit of their calling, to the inclemencies and variations of the British climate, it may well be contended that our cabmen have a right to a special measure of consideration in their old age. With this idea in mind a company of friends, who take a special interest in the welfare of those "cabbies" who are past work, invited some hundreds of men, recipients of small pensions from the Cabdrivers' Association, to a dinner and social gathering. The function took place on Thursday last at St. James's Hall. The men were accompanied by their wives.

Miss H. S. Murphy, sister of the gentleman who initiated the Cabmen's Street Shelter Movement, had undertaken the responsibility of providing the meal. In the course of a forcible address, dwelling on matters of personal and national righteousness, she reminded her hearers that their first duty was to serve God. Madame Antoinette Sterling rendered spiritual messages in song; Sir S. Bancroft promised to provide a new night shelter for cabmen; and a pathetic little speech, expressive of the men's gratitude for the recognition given to them, was made by an aged and weather-worn ex-driver.

Bible Studies.—The Bible studies conducted by Rev. G. Soltau are proving interesting and profitable to many, and there are signs of a revival of faith in and study of the word of God. At the three new centres at Hackney, Richmond, and Ealing large audiences have assembled, and there have been manifest tokens of blessing.

Oxford Letter.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

OXFORD has got back to its normal condition again after the Christmas holidays, and the first week of term has brought us visits from two well-known workers: Lady Henry Somerset, known throughout the world as the president of the B.W.T.A.; and Rev. J. E. Watts-Ditchfield, Vicar of St. James-the-Less, Bethnal Green, so well known as the inaugurator of men's services, and that with such singular success.

The address of the former on Tuesday evening in the Town Hall on her favourite topic of temperance was a powerful plea for individual effort against the drink curse. Speaking of the growing power of vested interests, she urged that organization must be met by organization. The diffidence of all political parties, she urged, was a sure sign of the influence of "the trade." Illustrating her appeal from the war in South Africa, she said thousands were volunteering for the front in what they deemed to be, rightly or wrongly, the cause of liberty. "But what about the shackles at home?" she asked. Let them, one and all, unite in the cause of a greater liberty. One day lived by Christians as Jesus lived would give the answer to the problem. There was nothing so great in all the world as personal influence. Let them bring it to bear on this question.

Mr. Watts-Ditchfield came from London to address the annual meeting of men held on Monday in connection with the Sunday afternoon service at St. Aldate's. Rev. Canon Christopher presided. Mr. Ditchfield's address will not soon be forgotten.

After giving a few incidents in connection with his work in Bethnal Green, showing how, in answer to prayer, over £20,000 had been raised in two and a-half years, he said he wished to hit every man in the room. His subject was "A Bow Drawn at a Venture." The man in disguise, the man who is discontented, the man with a home, the man with a sin, were each described; and then the speaker said: "I may not have succeeded as yet in hitting all present; but I shall do so now—I speak of the man whom God wants! Is there a man here who will get up and say 'God does not want me'?"

One illustration his hearers can never forget. It went right home to the hearts of the 150 men present. He told of a potman, who, when converted to Christ, gave up his situation, joined his band of workers, and took a district. The seeds of disease had, however, been long sown, and he began to fail. One day, when Mr. Watts-Ditchfield called, to his surprise the man's wife said he had gone. Thinking he was dead, he then found that the sick man had left the house. He returned after a short time, and it was then ascertained that lying on his bed he had been thinking of his district, and of the men who had not yet come to Christ, and determined to make one more appeal before he died. Dressing himself, he had gone and pleaded for the last time with the men in his district. He died that same night! Readers of The Christian will not be surprised to find that the writer heard a remark next day from one who was present: "He made us all feel ashamed of ourselves," and that already the meeting has borne fruit.

Another Romish Sisterhood for London.—The French Protestant journal Le Signal reports that the Sisters of the Good Shepherd of Nancy have sold their establishment to another congregation, and intend to continue operations in London. Why in London? The question is asked by Le Signal, and answered. "Are we not told by the clericals that Catholics are wickedly persecuted in Protestant countries? Can it be that the statement is not true?" A correspondent informs us that the Sisters have been made uncomfortable at Nancy because of their notorious cruelty to children placed under their care. Not for the first time do Papist congregations that have been found out in Roman Catholic countries seek refuge in our Protestant land, where toleration often makes room for hurtful licence.

Scottish Notes.

FRIENDS will be glad to have, mainly through Mrs. Todd Osborne, the following particulars regarding the movements of Scottish Christian workers who have offered for service with the army in South Africa. Mr. J. W. Moodie (the Soldier Evangelist) and Mr. W. C. Charteris sailed by the Kinfauns Castle on January 20—the former to rejoin his old regiment, the 78th Seaforth Highlanders; and the latter to work among the Highland Light Infantry. The following are awaiting War Office instructions:—Mr. Lennox Fraser, who goes to the Cameron Highlanders; Mr. W. A. Boyd, for the Royal Irish Fusiliers, under General Gatacre; and Mr. J. Young, who is to labour among the King's Own Scottish Borderers. Messrs. J. Garrioch, R. Kerr, and H. Talbot Crosbie, hope to sail on February 3, taking with them a large tent, to be used for reading, writing, and refreshments, and, when possible, for meetings. Mr. Adam Tarvet is with the Argyle and Sutherland Highlanders, at the Modder River; and Mr. Charles J. Anderson (Glasgow) with the Second Northumberland Fusiliers, at East London. Among other volunteers for Christian work at the front are Rev. W. W. Beveridge (Port Glasgow), and Dr. Young, missionary at Aden, presently on furlough.

Mr. Wallace, evangelist, of the General Assembly, has just held a fortnight's mission in the Free Church at Letham.

At a meeting held last week in the Castle Mission Hall, Montrose—Colonel the Master of the Erroll and other officers being present—a branch of the Army Temperance Association was formed among the men of the 3rd Royal Highlanders. Seventy-eight men were enrolled, and were promised the use of a room for the purpose of holding meetings.

A notable address was delivered at the annual meeting of the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society by Dr. Main, of Hangchow. Calling attention to the general recognition of the fact that the kind of work most likely to overcome prejudice, ignorance, and superstition in the foreign field is that of the medical missionary, he passed on to declare his belief that if China is to be evangelized, it must be through the Chinese medical missionary.

During last year 741 patients were treated in the Glasgow Sick Children's Hospital, sixty-two of whom were infants under one year. The number of cases treated at the dispensary was 7,128.

Much new interest in work among the Jews has been aroused by a successful series of meetings in Glasgow, Dumbarton, and other towns, addressed by the Rev. Samuel Wilkinson.

The Y.M.C.A. travelling secretaries are directing special attention to the desirability of paid secretaries being appointed more widely for work among young men, the latest recommendation of the kind that has come under our notice being for the town of Dumbarton.

The report of the Glasgow Home Mission Union shows the number of co-operating congregations to be now 188, fully one-half of these sending in returns which show 1,225 persons gathered into services, and 471 united to church fellowship. Year by year the work of the Union is securing a more satisfactory place among the activities of the churches.

Lancaster Town Mission.—The half-yearly gathering of this organization recently took place at Lancaster. A large number of friends took part. From the report given by the secretary, it appeared that the workers had zealously maintained the aggressively evangelistic character of the movement. Councillor Satterthwaite, who presided, observed that the gentlemen who took so lively an interest in the working of the Mission were the busy men of the town; who, after a hard week's work, were willing to devote a considerable portion of their time on the Sunday, which so many people made a day of idleness, to the promotion of this good work. As to the congregations, it was evident that some who did not care for a set form of religious service derived good by attending the services held by the Town Mission.

Are Brothers Bothers?

I HAVE had a nice letter from a little Dutch girl in South Africa, who is one of my nieces, and does the "Searcher" every week. She feels very sad about the war, as she has six uncles in it, and does not know if they are alive or dead. She says she prays every day for peace, and hopes that her little English cousins are doing the same.

Her English is not perfect, but she writes very well for one so young. Speaking of her brothers and sisters doing the "Searcher," she says: "Then I have a bother called Ado, but he always wants to do it, and never does it." You will smile at her spelling: of course she means a "brother"; but I am afraid sometimes there is very little difference between the two in some families. I hope none of you who are brothers will become bothers to those around you.

Then there is the other part of her sentence: "He always wants to do it and never does it." I know a good many boys who are like that (and girls, too), who are always wanting, and intending, and talking about doing things; but who, somehow, never persevere. Do you remember the two boys that our Lord spoke about, and their replies to their father who sent them on an errand? The one said, "I go, sir, and went not;" the other refused, but "afterwards he repented and went." I am sure your parents and teachers could give you quite an interesting little talk upon that subject, and perhaps some day you may be thankful that my little Dutch friend ever wrote her letter.

A Child's Rebuke.

"DO you ever pray?" asked a tiny bit of a girl of an avowed infidel one day as she had strayed into his office from an adjacent room on the same floor.

She was a pretty, bright child, and the young lawyer had been pleased with her fair face and winning ways, and had often, by means of candies and other small gifts, encouraged her to come; and at this time, although the office was crowded with clients, he had called her to his side and given her a seat upon his knee, where she had remained unusually quiet, until a pause in the conversation had given her opportunity for the question which seemed uppermost in her mind.

"Say, do you?" she persisted, as he hesitated, visibly embarrassed. Although he was now an open follower of infidel doctrine, he had in his boyhood a Christian home, and, somehow, he could scarcely have explained why, he was ashamed to meet the honest blue eyes of that five-year-old child, and frankly acknowledge that he did not pray.

"Do you?" he inquired at last, desperately; hoping thus to change the, to him, very obnoxious subject; for there was an unmistakable smile showing upon the faces of his visitors at his evident unwillingness to answer.

"Oh, yes, of course!" she answered promptly, not in the least disturbed by the question; "once every night and morning, besides lots of other times. But say, do you? You know—you did not tell me."

"Didn't I?"—the colour actually crimsoning his forehead. "Well, I think I might say, 'God bless my little child!' Do you think that would do?"

"Yes, sir," naively, "but I think you would much better pray for yourself."

"I could have stood up and faced and answered the most scathing rebuke ever levelled at infidelity in public," he said, in repeating the story afterward to a company of friends in my hearing. "I could have laughed in the face of the most eminent divine who dared to urge upon me the duty of prayer; but that child's question completely nonplussed me. I believe in all the defeats I ever experienced, I never felt so unspeakably little as I did that day."—Christian Standard.

Keep on Praying.

ONE James Smith, an English labourer in the navy yard on the Thames, had a little boy, Johnnie. James was a very intemperate man. After the death of his wife sorrow kept him sober for a while, but he took to his cups again and, as poor Johnnie expressed it, "got badder and badder all the time."

One night the drunkard awoke, a most uncommon thing for him at such an hour, and lay very still, for he heard a sound. It was his motherless boy praying by his bedside. He heard him say, "Please God, make daddy a better man, for Jesus' sake." James Smith could not sleep any more. He rose very early and went to his work. He came home early that night without having drank a drop of liquor. His heart was melted. He said to Johnnie:

"What put it into your head to pray for your worthless old dad?"

Johnnie told him that it was because he loved him; and besides he had been to a Sunday class where the teacher taught him the commandment, "Honour thy father and thy mother."

"Then keep on prayin', keep on prayin', little lad," said James. "I believe God has answered you already; I've been prayin' for myself, that God would make me a better man."

The prayer was answered. James Smith reformed, and from that time lived a steady, Christian man.—Wesleyan Methodist.

Weynken's Testament.

WEYNKEN VAN RENESSE was a young girl of eighteen, who lived in the old city of Bruges, in Flanders, three hundred years ago, when the people who loved and read God's Word for themselves were persecuted and killed for what was called their heresy.

A good man named Tyndale had translated the Testament into a language the people could understand, and his Testaments were to be found here and there in families brave enough to seek the truth for themselves.

Weynken's father had received one from the hands of Tyndale, and when he died he left it to his daughter.

She was head nurse in a family of kind people who loved her very much, and no doubt she taught her little charges the beautiful stories of Jesus that she read in her Testament.

But one day a friar came to the house and accused Weynken of being a heretic.

Her kind mistress wanted to prevent her from confessing the truth, as she knew what the consequences would be.

But Weynken boldly spoke out and said, "Yes, I do believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and I read his Word and love it."

So she was sentenced to a very terrible death. They gave her a whole week to decide if she would give up her faith in Jesus. But she held on, wishing to save her soul, even if it meant losing her bodily life.

And so she died, leaving her dear Testament to the family she had lived with, and it has been treasured and read, and handed down to children's children ever since, while the story of her faithfulness to Jesus is not forgotten yet.

Notes & Comments

MESSRS. Morgan and Scott have now in the press, to be issued in a few days, the British edition of the authorised popular Life of D. L. Moody. This is the forerunner of the more comprehensive work now being compiled by his son, Mr. W. R. Moody, which will be published in due course. Both volumes will be sold in the interests of the Northfield Institutions, and are the only ones which are authentic, and issued with the sanction of the family, in accordance with the expressed wish of Mr. Moody himself. Each will contain an introduction from the sympathetic pen of Rev. F. B. Meyer. (Paper, 6d.; cloth, with eight illustrations, 1s.)

The annual winter mission to business men, arranged by the City of London Bible Class Union, commenced in the City Temple on Monday evening. It is being conducted by Mr. Henry Varley, and is to be continued until the end of next week. The attendance on the opening night comprised a large number of the city merchants and their employés, who had subordinated other claims and considerations to one common desire to take part in what promises to be a stirring mission. Mr. Varley extended a hearty and brotherly welcome to his audience, and his faithful and earnest delivery of the Gospel message was listened to with appreciative eagerness. A feature of the services is the careful attention which has been given to the musical arrangements, and our readers will join with the workers in praying that many may be led into the Kingdom by both the preaching of the Word and the service of praise.

The Anglican bishops have sent out an impressive "Call to United Prayer." It is the last year of an eventful century, and they think it will conduce to the welfare of all the world if Christian people will join in praying unitedly on the first Sunday in each month and the following day. The sorrows and anxieties of the present war, the national sins of gambling, impurity, and drunkenness, and especially the unhappy divisions that affect the church just now, are suggested as suitable subjects for intercession. They urge that prayer be made through the year for the outpouring of the spirit of love, zeal, and brotherliness, for the removal of all that hinders Godly union and concord for the realization in practice of the spirit of Christ. This appeal should find a hearty echo among Christians of all denominations.

As the formal announcement regarding the Bishopric of Liverpool cannot be long delayed, we desire to emphasize the need of prayer that so important a sphere may be filled wisely. In the midst of so many anxieties and perplexities, the Prime Minister must feel that all questions of this nature are especially bewildering. We remember reading of a Prime Minister of the Queen who besought the prayers even of some youthful visitors that he might be rightly guided in suggesting names for two bishopries. Liverpool has been for so long the scene of the grand and fruitful labours of the venerable Dr. Ryle that the appointment of a successor is more than usually important.

The reign of the Queen is generally spoken of as a peaceful one; it, therefore, comes upon one with something of a shock to be told, as we are in the Home Magazine, that war and preparations for war in her reign have cost £2,500,000,000. We spend now £42,000,000 a year on the Army and Navy. The present war will add an enormous sum to the heavy total already against us. War is, indeed, a game of "beggar-my-neighbour," if it may not be called "beggar-everybody." He loses who wins, as well as he who is defeated.

Dr. Barnardo and his council, determined to prove the national character of their Institutions, have resolved to reserve one thousand or more places in their various Homes for the free admission of any destitute boys or girls, the children of soldiers, sailors, or civilians, who may be orphaned in the present war.

Among those whose bravery and self-sacrifice should be warmly recognised in connection with the war are the ambulance and medical staff, including the Indian bearers, who have all freely risked their lives in order to rescue and minister to the wounded under fire. If it is better to save life than to take it, this spirit is the highest that can be shown on the field of battle. Nor should the newspaper correspondents who cheerfully undertake the risks of battle in order to furnish the public at home with independent accounts of events be forgotten. The perils of war are theirs, with but little of its glories. And while abroad the spirit of self-sacrifice is being shown, it is not wanting at home, as is shown in a striking incident recently. A P.C. of the name of Funnell, after rescuing two women from a burning house at Dalston, plunged a third time into the flames to save another, and lost his life.

A curious sentence occurs in a recent letter to the Morning Post from its gallant young correspondent, Mr. Winston Churchill, who escaped from the Boers. He hid among the trees, and prayed "to that Higher Power which interferes more often than we are prone to admit." Mr. Churchill continues: "I prayed long and earnestly for help and guidance. My prayer, as it seems to me, was swiftly and wonderfully answered." Mr. Churchill, we may mention, is the eldest son of the late Lord Randolph Churchill, and has already distinguished himself by much personal courage.

Sir Sidney Shippard, K.C.M.G., D.C.L., who has been a judge in Cape Colony, and a Deputy High Commissioner for the Bechuanaland Protectorate, in dealing with the native question in South Africa, regards the loyalty of the natives in the present crisis as evidence of the effects of British rule. He urges that one of the first cares of the Government after the restoration of order should be "the establishment of a sound and liberal educational system." Further, he goes on to say:—

> Missionary efforts have doubtless done the natives much good in many ways, and chiefly in teaching them milder manners, the use of decent clothing, and the benefits to be secured by honest labour . . . But how far they will ever be able to comprehend the subtleties of dogmatic religious teaching is doubtful, but the attempt to instruct them is praiseworthy and well meant.

This is grateful testimony so far, but no student of the history of British colonization can overlook the influence which the teaching of the Christian religion has exercised in the development of the Empire, and the elevation moral and spiritual, of the native races. The preaching of salvation through Jesus, and Him crucified, has been the most powerful factor in the true civilization of most of our possessions, and there has been no need to introduce "the subtleties of dogmatic religious teaching" where the Gospel has been preached in sincerity and in truth.

It is gratifying to learn that, in spite of the demands entailed by the war, the sense of responsibility towards our great dependency is so strong, in this time of exceptional trial, that the Lord Mayor has opened an Indian Famine Fund. Subscriptions may be addressed to his lordship at the Mansion House, E.C.

The change in the ruler of China will doubtless be accompanied by an alteration in the Government's attitude towards the missionaries. It is not hopeful to read that the new Emperor, nominated by that astute old lady, the Dowager Empress, is a son of a prince who is head of more than one secret society. One of the societies with which his father is connected is understood to have had a good deal to do with the recent murder of Mr. Brooks, the missionary. There is therefore need for urgent prayer that the new Emperor may not be guided by the prince's unfriendly methods of resisting the introduction of Christianity into China. The fate of the Emperor Kwang-su is uncertain; it is quite possible that he has died, for in China such a fact is often concealed for several weeks before being announced publicly.

Not long ago it was found that a telegraphic cable, which had been laid on marshy ground in Tonquin, had been destroyed by the inroads of tiny but persistent insects. The cable failed to carry the electric current in consequence of this insidious damage, and was entirely useless. The incident may suggest a reason for the failure of some of our prayers. The continual interruptions, mental and social, which rob men of their proper seasons of prayer, may result in communication between the soul and its Maker being suspended altogether.

"Rusticus" writes in the Puritan a suggestive account of an experiment initiated five years ago among London working men to befriend them by means of opening his garden for a quiet Saturday afternoon. All he stipulates for is honest souls who may come and sit under the trees, talk, and spend a quiet time away from the town. Three thousand have accepted this brotherly invitation in the five years, but not one has solicited for alms or personal assistance in any form, and not a farthing's worth of damage has been done to flowers, fruit, or trees. "Rusticus" is persuaded that personal brotherliness is the crave in men's hearts—not doles. They long for a realization of comradeship. Is not this the secret of the success of almost all kinds of clubs and gatherings of men? There may be drink and gambling and other accessories, but the fundamental desire is for comradeship.

Christians ought to know how to meet and satisfy that; "Rusticus" shows us one way.

The indebtedness of Scotland to John Knox and the Reformation we all know to be great, but few perhaps have realized what Cardinal Newman once said in a letter:—

Has it ever drawn your attention that the English nation would have come back, or probably so, except for the Scotch? It is the Scotch Protestant party now which is the life of the opposition to us in Parliament and Exeter Hall.

We sincerely wish that Scotch influence over English thought and life—if it be of this order—were stronger than it is. It comes, no doubt, with Scotch ministers and the thousands of Scotchmen that dwell on this side the border, as well as with Scotch members of Parliament, and it generally represents a sturdier faith and life than we have south of the Tweed. Our Protestantism needs more of the spirit of the Covenanters.

A Roman Catholic newspaper, in the endeavour to qualify its inevitable admission in regard to John Ruskin, that he was, in his early days, very antagonistic to the Roman Church, says:—

This hostility can be traced in his writings up to mature age. . . . [but] there took place a change in his religious opinions, which became very marked during later life, and adds the unjustifiable insinuation:

and so the change went on until some years ago his venerable neighbour and friend, Father Laverty, was able to assure us that Ruskin accepted all the Catholic doctrines; though, strange to say, he did not think it necessary to enter the fold.

Of course the word Roman has, we assume, intentionally been omitted from this Jesuitical statement, and it is true that John Ruskin believed the cardinal and essential doctrines of the Christian faith, but it should be quite unnecessary to insist that his opinions in regard to Romanism remained unchanged. How strong those views were is well known to every student of his writings; but it may be said here that, in a recent issue of his noble Stones of Venice, he reprinted part of a letter from his father, which he considered to bear upon a passage as to the exclusion of papal ecclesiastics from all share in the Venetian Councils, an exclusion which he believed to be due to "her knowledge of the spirit of the Church of Rome."

In giving prominence to that letter, he repeated that he endorsed the opinions expressed in it. Some of them, referring to the British Constitution, were as follows:—

It is a creation essentially Protestant, growing with the growth, and strengthening with the strength of Protestantism . . . It was admitted by all that by the very act of abandoning the Roman religion we became a free and enlightened people. It was only by throwing off the yoke of that slavish religion that we attained to the freedom of thought which has advanced us in the scale of nations . . . I do not expect any statesman to discuss the point of transubstantiation between Romanist and Protestant, but can any statesman that shall have taken even a cursory glance at the face of Europe hesitate a moment on the choice of the Protestant religion?

Stronger expressions than these might be quoted, but it is hardly necessary to do so. We may, however, perhaps add that not very long ago Mr. Ruskin wrote in terms of unqualified praise regarding one of the Evangelical volumes issued by our own publishers, a little book in which the truth as it is in Jesus is simply and clearly taught.

The baseless assumptions of Roman Catholicism are well illustrated in an article by Father Clarke, a Jesuit, in the Nineteenth Century for the current month. He sets forth the following extraordinary statement of what our Lord dealt with in his post-resurrection talks with his disciples:—

Our Lord instructed his disciples on the nature of the Church which He had come to found on earth, its constitution, its government, its discipline, its sacraments, and above all, on the sacred doctrines which it was commissioned to teach to mankind. He bequeathed to it a body of dogma, clear, definite, and unmistakable, which was to be the substance of all its future teaching. This sacred deposit He placed in the hands of his twelve apostles. After the death of the last of them no sort of addition was to be made to it.

A more curious conglomerate of probabilities, fancy, and fiction it would be difficult to conceive.

It is to be hoped that when the new century dawns, it will not have proceeded far on its way without proper provision being made for the inspection of the numerous monasteries and convents which have sprung up in all parts of this country. There is abundant evidence of the necessity for such a regular and strict inspection of these institutions as shall prevent the virtual imprisonment of young men and women against their wills. The writer was shown the diary of a nun who had thus been prevented from leaving a convent into which she had gone under most specious promises of personal liberty.

The pages of this lady's diary were pathetic to read, for they told of the cruellest suppression of all affection, and the exercise of a merciless authority on the part of the Mother Superior. Every attempt of this young woman to return to her home was thwarted with the cleverest ingenuity; and we have sad reason to believe that her case was only one of many which could be brought forward. It is high time that the same rules of Government inspection which apply to other public institutions were carried into force with regard to these "religious houses."

The report of Professor Ince on the "Preliminary Examination of Candidates for Holy Orders" is not an assuring one. The most serious thing in it is the revelation it gives of the ignorance of candidates both of the Old and New Testaments.

It is no exaggeration to say that not an inconsiderable number of the candidates would show to disadvantage if examined side by side with the top classes in good elementary schools. The Psalms part of the paper was generally worse done than the Kings and Amos part. . .

The Gospel is clearly the harder subject, and unfortunately familiarity with the words seems to encourage intellectual sloth. Few candidates had thought out the meaning of the words of Christ, or even taken an intelligent view of the circumstances under which the Gospels were composed.

Is this altogether the fault of the candidates? Those who have to do with their preparation ought to see that they know something of the Scriptures of which they are to be expounders. The fact, we fear, is that, amongst students in all churches, too little is known of the Scriptures themselves, and too little attention is given to them as compared with human dissertations upon them and against them.

Dean Milman, whose biography has just appeared, had an explanation of ritualism, which, no doubt, had a great deal of truth in it. Young clergymen, he thought, were in many cases unequal to the strain of preaching some hundred and fifty sermons in a year.

They are almost driven into other ceremonialism. . . . Further than this, undistinguished (however good, active, and zealous they may be), poor, hardly able to keep their place in society, can we wonder that they invest themselves in their priestly dignity, and are tempted to console themselves for their inferiority in most respects by assuming the belief in their sacerdotal superiority?

There is yet another explanation, which will account for many, though by no means all, of the ritualistic clergy. Many of them, in their college days, are openly wild, and make no secret of their intention to "have a good time to finish up with, before taking orders." To such men, when ordained, a spiritual, devotional service would be unbearably dull. Lacking the spirit, they naturally turn to the ceremonial form of worship, and compensate to ear and eye for that which is lacking in the heart. The profession made by every clergyman at his ordination is that he is moved by the Holy Ghost to take upon him that responsibility in the Church. Where this is true, the Holy Spirit will not leave him without messages and power to deliver them. Such ministry is not human, merely, but the working of the Spirit through men.

A correspondent calls our attention to the deplorable amount of bad language which assails one's ears in the streets and in trains and vehicles. We are afraid that the wicked and foolish habit of swearing has not really diminished, as some would have us believe, although it may have altered some of its phrases. One prolific cause of bad language is, we think, to be found in modern fiction and dramatic plays. Few historical novels, and hardly any theatrical representations, are free from this evil perpetuation of a foul habit. Young people become accustomed to reading and hearing language which ought to be banished from a civilized nation; and the step from merely hearing to using the language is perilously short. Christian parents cannot be too careful as to the books which their children read, for the "written word remains" in a sense other than the proverb meant.

The Lord's Call to Repentance.

MANY are hearing the Lord's call to England at this time, and a widespread desire exists for a day to be set apart in which we should all unite in owning our sins and the sins of the nation. Already in many places special services have been held. At the invitation of the Evangelical Alliance, Sunday, January 7, was observed by some, and now the bishops have invited the Church of England to observe Sunday next, and these arrangements have been very limited in character and extent. With respect to February 7, it is to be feared that owing to the short notice, a large number even of the Church of England people will not be prepared to observe the day. Meanwhile, before the bishops' announcement an invitation has been sent to observe February 28 (Ash Wednesday) as a day when we should humble ourselves before the Lord and seek the fulness of blessing which He intends for us by this chastening of our nation. This proposal has the support of the following among other representative servants of God:—

Professor Handley Moule.
Prebendary H. W. Webb-Peploe.
Rev. F. B. Meyer.
Rev. C. A. Fox.
Rev. J. B. Figgis.

Will the Lord's servants each in their own locality co-operate so that "all that in every place call on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" may draw near to Him, and in heart, at any rate, to one another. Radstock.

Wanted: "A Loftier Tone."

IN Lord Rosebery's speech on the opening of Parliament there was a fine sentence in which he pleaded for "a loftier tone and a truer patriotism."

The appeal comes not before it was needed. There has been a sad absence of seriousness, not only in the attitude of some of our statesmen, but also of many of our fellow-countrymen in this time of national crisis.

As Christians, we dare not ignore this phase of a controversy which, in its political aspect, cannot be treated in these pages.

It is dishonouring to God when politicians talk of the "impossibility" of carrying out the principles contained in our Lord's teaching, and when even our Prime Minister attributes the disasters in the Transvaal merely to the insufficiency of Secret Service money, and the cumbrousness of our constitutional methods. It does not need a very keen analysis to discover in this national crisis far higher, deeper causes than financial reasons, or the existence of old-fashioned machinery of government. Words uttered by a bishop years ago echo in our ears: "The first object of the true politician, as of the true patriot, is to keep himself and his party pure, and then to secure victory." It is a melancholy exhibition of how far our politicians have travelled from "the kingdom of God and his righteousness" when they put on one side Christ's principles as "impossible," and urge a reliance on money and prestige.

This war, it has been said, has acted as litmus paper in detecting the presence of acids which are corrupting our national and social life. The wholesale turning aside from even the formal attention to Divine worship; the immense growth of gambling and the retrogression in temperance; the love of money and the demand for all manner of evil pleasures—surely these phases of our life have more to do with our "pitiful humiliations" than the supposed causes mentioned by the Prime Minister? Already many have learned some of the lessons which the war was meant to teach. Some who have long disregarded the claims of God's House have returned in penitence; many who had grown formal and cold in their prayers have now found new calls for contrition and intercession; and people generally seem to be listening far more attentively to "the still, small voice" which at last has a chance of making itself heard amid the clangour of the world.

Who could estimate the value of any such change in our current thought? A moment's consideration of what would have been the result of immediate victory for the British arms will give an idea of the lesson we have had to learn. No one can doubt that, if our army had triumphed easily, and at little cost of life, the British Empire would have seen an extraordinary increase of the godless pride which ignores all sense of Divine Government. Instead of this, we have had a sharp, bitter humiliation in the eyes of an unsympathetic world. Thousands of homes have been shadowed by the Angel of Death; hundreds of gallant men will never return to their loved ones; and, even now, we are faced with the sad certainty that "the end is not yet."

What a call to prayer there is, under these circumstances, that into our national life may flow the clear, pure stream of righteousness, that multitudes may be awed into repentance, and be turned from their idols to serve the living God. His messages are not to be read through the envelope in which they are enclosed, but we cannot doubt that nevertheless He is sending each one of us a message which it is perilous to ignore.

"Wanted: A loftier tone" might well apply to others besides statesmen. We want "the upward look" in our churches, our houses of business, our homes. If we exclude any sphere of our life from the influence of God we are limiting the power of the Almighty. His rule is not meant to apply to sections of our experience, just as it is not confined to certain districts of the world. Let us all take "a loftier tone," and claim the kingdoms of this world as the kingdoms of our God.

II.—Finding God.

By Rev. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

THE knowledge of God is attainable. Not the knowledge that comprehends Him—the finite never can comprehend the Infinite—but the knowledge that apprehends Him, that is persuaded of the reality of his existence and of the nature of some of his attributes, that emboldens a man to say, "I believe that God is." It is almost inevitable that man—with his habit of observation and with his power of inferring, placed in the midst of such a system of things as constitutes the universe, endowed with such a nature as has been bestowed upon him, and having such a panorama of history to contemplate—should come to the invincible conclusion that behind all and moving in all is some great Power—intelligent and righteous. It is not necessary that anyone should be a scientific man to do this; all that is wanted is the power to observe facts and to draw an inference, the power bestowed on us all. There can be no doubt that multitudes who would not be called intellectual have

THE PERSUASION THAT GOD IS,

because to their minds the universe bears such plain marks of intelligence, power, will, and goodness. Dr. Flint says that "the minds of multitudes may readily be supposed to rise legitimately from perception of the visible universe to apprehension of the invisible personal Creator, although either wholly unconscious or only dimly and inaccurately aware of the nature of the transition; and although, if called on to indicate the conclusion at which they had arrived, they would employ far weaker reasons in words than those by which they were actually convinced in thought. The principles of the theistic inference may be very badly determined, and yet the theistic inference itself may be perfectly valid."

This knowledge of God may not be very operative in the life, may lack that quickening touch of personal contact with the Invisible which will enable us to say, "I have found God." It is a remarkable fact that natural religion has never successfully held its ground alone; atheism, polytheism, and pantheism having always been more popular and claimed more disciples. The great men who have held it alone have all failed to effect any deep and extensive reformation. They did not turn men from the worship of the idols they themselves rejected, nor to the service of the true God in whom they believed. Some disturbing thing comes in and renders nugatory the right conclusion of the reason, obscures it, robs it of its proper force. The knowledge of God thus gained is inadequate to do for man all that he needs: true as far as it goes, it yet lacks some quality by which he may be thoroughly illumined and transformed in every part of his nature: it is like a ray of light without warmth, or life, or transforming power.

But the knowledge of God, the real finding Him, is always represented in Scripture as the most operative influence that can touch us. What is there of God, then, which even this wonderful universe cannot express or convey to us? How much nearer to God must I come than this order of things admits me before I can say I have found Him, and before I can be quickened and energized by Him?

The darkening cloud that obscures God, the hindering thing which keeps us back, the counteractive in our nature which nullifies the knowledge we gather from the constitution and order of things, is Sin. We must, therefore, know God in some other light than as the Creator and Upholder and Ruler of the universe, if we are to know Him truly; and if we are to be saved by the knowledge, we must know Him as the God of Grace. Some have an intimate knowledge of Him in this character who know little of Him in any other light. They are like children who have the closest fellowship with their father, yet know nothing of the splendour of his intellect or the wonder of his achievements. That intimate knowledge, that personal fellowship, that childlike understanding of the Almighty is the privilege into which we need to be brought before we can be said to have made the great discovery.

We never know God until we know his love—whom do we know until we know his love?—and we never know his love until we know Him in Christ Jesus. Creation cannot tell sinners of forgiveness, nor enemies of reconciliation, nor depraved beings of cleansing and spiritual renewal. Its message is of a different kind—on a different theme. Grace alone can speak to us of these things, and

GRACE SPEAKS IN JESUS.

"God was in Christ," and he who would find and know God must seek Him in Christ. "Jesus is the effulgence of God's glory, and the very image of his substance." The wisdom of God has a brighter manifestation in Him than in all the marvels of this inexhaustible universe, and the power of God—the moral power by which He subdues hearts and wills to Himself—is greater in the cross than in all the forces that move countless worlds. In Jesus is the very heart of God. "God is love." Jesus is "God manifest in the flesh."

Jesus Himself was most emphatic in declaring that the knowledge of Himself was the knowledge of the Father. "This is life eternal, that they should know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou didst send." "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father." The experience of believers agrees thereto. They know that to find Christ is to find God. Their hearts declare that Jesus is not merely one of the sons of men: Luther said, "on earth is not his fellow." They are conscious that they have found "in Him all the fulness of Godhead bodily."

ACQUAINTANCE AND KNOWLEDGE.

There is a great difference between having a man's acquaintance and having the knowledge of the very man himself. You may be familiar with his figure and form and countenance, with his voice and many of his modes and peculiarities of thought, and yet be profoundly ignorant of the real man who is behind all. But some day an event occurs which shows his heart to you, how noble and self forgetting and self-sacrificing he is, how ready to serve you at the expense of himself, and from that time forward you regard him in a new light. You have touched him—heart to heart, spirit to spirit.

Most persons have only an acquaintance with Christ; it is concerned with externals, and is not an inner shining that brightens and warms the heart. They know the facts of his earthly life and the views that are entertained of Him—some high, some low; but they do not know Him in Himself. So the people of his own time knew Him when He was upon earth, and they could have pointed Him out to anyone; yet were their eyes holden by unbelief, and they had no spiritual vision. It is we need. Even the light in the face of Jesus is as darkness until God opens the eyes of our hearts to see it. "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus." And this light shines in part in every one. "There was the true light, even the light which lighteth every man coming into the world." It will grow more and more unto the perfect day if we "seek the Lord while He may be found, and call upon Him while He is near." We must also walk in the light while we have the light, lest darkness come upon us. Remember Cornelius, whose prayers and alms were a memorial before God, and to whom Peter was sent to declare the way of life more perfectly. "He that seeketh"—i.e., is always seeking—"findeth;" i.e., is always finding. There is no limit to our knowledge of Him who is past finding out into perfection.

The late Mr. D. L. Moody.

MEMORIAL MEETING IN LONDON.

THERE have been many meetings in London and the provinces in memory of the late Mr. Moody, and it will be long before the people of God relax interest in the work associated with his name, or cease to rehearse the deeds which the Lord wrought by him. No meeting in this country, however, has been so large and enthusiastic, so warm and stimulating, as that which was held on Tuesday evening in Exeter Hall. Convened in compliance with a widely-felt desire, and at the invitation of a committee representing various Evangelical denominations, it filled the spacious building, which, for a full half hour before the formal beginning of the proceedings, resounded with the melody of Gospel song.

Mr. T. A. Denny, a well-known friend of the late evangelist, presided, supported by a number of gentlemen who from time to time and in various ways promoted the work of Mr. Moody, both in this land and America. The opening hymn was, "Look, ye saints, the sight is glorious," which having been sung, Mr. Theodore Howard led in prayer. The Lord was praised for what Mr. Moody was and did; and prayer was made that all that he began in the fear of God and for the love of Christ might be continued with abundant fruit. Finally, the Lord was besought to let the mantle of Moody fall upon a multitude of men and women. Among those who were through sickness were—Prebendary Barlow, who was sorry not to be able to bear witness to the life of so true a prophet; Lord Kinnaird, who felt that we should never again see the like of Moody; and Sir George Williams, who telegraphed his prayer that God would prepare many to follow in the footsteps of the departed saint. Illness also kept away Canon Trotter and Rev. G. Campbell Morgan. Among others who regretted absence were—Lord Overtoun, Mr. C. Boardman, Rev. Dr. Thornton, and Rev. F. B. Meyer. Mr. F. N. Charrington's message was: "Thousands in East London will for ever thank God for Moody's visits."

In the course of an address full of sympathy, the Chairman spoke of the moral greatness and spiritual power of the man. The effects of Mr. Moody's labours are everywhere, direct and indirect, and they will not soon pass away. He thanked God for the loan of the man to the present generation, and urged prayer to God to send another devoted and able worker to fill his place.

Words of kindly appreciation were spoken by several friends. Mr. M. H. Hodder emphasized the importance of the Noonday Prayer Meeting at Aldersgate Street, started by Mr. Moody in 1867, which in due course became the point of departure for many institutions, some of them of national importance.

Mr. J. H. Tritton spoke in particular of the London work. Having in mind the way in which large buildings were filled month after month to hear Mr. Moody's preaching, and the rich fruit which God gave to his servant's endeavours, he was constrained to say, "We will abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness, O God!"

Mr. J. H. Putterill claimed Mr. Moody as a pillar of the Y.M.C.A., and read an interesting communication from Ireland. The author, an active worker, said that the Association in Ireland was greatly indebted to the evangelist. More than that, the churches of the Sister Isle have ever since been more active and more evangelistic in their operations. There are testimonies out of number as to the abiding character of the work; and many who were converted under Mr. Moody's preaching and teaching have since entered upon labour for Christ in the home and foreign field. In conclusion, Mr. Putterill mentioned the part played in the work in London by Messrs. Robert and W. T. Paton, both of them now departed, but greatly revered.

Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor spoke of the work of Mr. Moody in Northfield and Chicago. The geniality and energy of the man were described, also the popular respect and affection for him. The tenderness of the evangelist and his largeness of heart were mentioned with admiration, also his home life. "To know Moody you must see him at home, and then you will agree with Professor Drummond's description of him—'He is the greatest human I ever met.'"

The next speaker was Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, whose reception was specially cordial. Taking his name as an acrostic, he spoke of Moody as—

Mighty—in the Scriptures;
O riginal—terse, pointed, and practical;
O rthodox—in the doctrine he preached;
D evout—and devoted to his Lord;
Y oung-hearted; which he ever was.

In a few words of personal testimony, Mr. Spurgeon recalled a memorable Lord's Day, when, having said "Farewell" to an audience at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, he was about to return to the Antipodes, not knowing whether he would again come to the old land. Mr. Moody was to preach in the evening, and many were standing around to say "Good-bye." Putting forth from the vestry, in his own daring way, the company of officers and friends, Mr. Moody knelt in prayer with him, and asked that, if it were God's will, the son might succeed the father in the pastorate of the Tabernacle Church, and that prayer, so simple and loving, would never be forgotten. When he once asked for "a corner" in his heart, Mr. Moody replied: "I have no corners in my heart; come right in!"

Mr. Spurgeon was thankful for Moody's life and influence, and asked that God would make all his people a little like him.

Prebendary Webb-Peploe also referred with joy to the life and labours of the evangelist, especially in his native town of Northfield. He spoke of his own association with him and with mission work in England and America. Having learned the Gospel, he preached it with all simplicity. He realised what it was to be utterly consecrated to God, and was absolutely forgetful of himself. He worked for the glory of God, and was ever content to keep in the background. One Sunday at Northfield, the auditorium being crowded, he noticed Mr. Moody to be sobbing while the love of Christ was being depicted; and when it was expected that he would speak, he got up and said: "What! preach after that? I guess I should be ashamed! Just go home and think!" And the people had come from miles round on purpose to hear him! The dry wit of the evangelist and his readiness of speech were also mentioned with cordial appreciation. "May we," concluded Mr. Webb-Peploe, "following in the steps of those whom God has taken, learn to live by the Son of God, and for the Son of God, so that by-and-by we may know what it is to be with the Son of God in glory!"

Brief testimonies were given by other friends:—Mr. A. A. Head, who traced his conversion to the meetings held at Camberwell in 1875; Rev. E. Bacheler Russell, whose very interesting story is told on page 20; Mr. A. Churchill, who spoke of the Down Lodge Hall at Wandsworth, in which the work of the 1883 mission has been continued; and Mr. Tom Richardson, who, though never spoken to as an anxious inquirer, was yet arrested by Mr. Moody's preaching on the words, "What think ye of Christ?" His secularistic notions were then shattered and God had since owned his poor endeavours in a most gracious way. The work which he is privileged to do at Rotherhithe is widely known, and was described as "following Moody as Moody followed Christ."

After the addresses, Dr. Harry Guinness gave a limelight exhibition illustrating Mr. Moody's work. Before entering upon this operation, he said that by God's mercy he owed to Mr. Moody his call to a definite interest in evangelistic work. He loved Jesus before meeting with the departed preacher, but he did not love souls. Moody led him to more blessed ministry, in regard to which it is time that the Church of Christ should wake up. Not upon a man should the mantle fall, but upon all the Lord's people. He prayed God to help him to make a fresh start in the great work.

The slides dealt with the man and his work, scenes in his daily life, and institutions of which he was the honoured founder. The large audience listened with deep interest to the addresses, and followed the panorama with evident pleasure.

With much appropriateness the hymn which the evangelist so much loved was sung, with the popular refrain, "Then shall my heart keep singing." In the course of the evening allusion was several times made to the hymns sung by Mr. Sankey, and their place in mission effort, among all sorts and conditions of people gathered to hear the Word of God.

COMMEMORATION AT DUBLIN.

The Committee of the Dublin Branch of the Evangelical Alliance have set apart Friday, February 9, for the commemoration of the great and important work accomplished through the instrumentality of Mr. Moody in Dublin and in Ireland. Three meetings will be held on that day in the Christian Union Buildings, which are themselves the most conspicuous memorial of his mission in 1874. Perhaps in no city in the United Kingdom or in America, in proportion to the numbers accessible, was the success more remarkable, or the results more abiding. As a permanent result of this mission, the Christian Union Buildings were erected at a cost of over £16,000. They are the home and centre of varied activities, including a daily prayer meeting, the annual Christian Convention, and various missions held from time to time.

On subsequent visits to Dublin, in 1882 and 1893, Mr. Moody was cordially welcomed, and great numbers attended his meetings. It is therefore right and fitting that the Christian people of the Irish metropolis should remember the man and his work, and return thanks to God for all that He accomplished through this beloved and honoured servant. The committee are making an appeal to the Christian public in connection with these commemoration meetings for a thankoffering to assist in removing a debt of about £900 which has been incurred in effecting necessary alterations and improvements in the buildings.

Humanitarian League.—With a view to the suppression of the so-called sport of hunting park deer a memorial has been forwarded to the Marquis of Salisbury requesting that no further appointment be made to the Mastership of the Royal Buckhounds. The petition has been promoted by the Sports Department of the Humanitarian League, and its 220 signatories include the Earl of Stamford, Viscount Harberton, Viscount Powerscourt, Lord Coleridge, Lord Rendel, seventy members of Parliament, as well as a large number of bishops and other church dignitaries, Nonconformist ministers, &c.

Echoes of a Great Revival.

AN esteemed correspondent, Mr. J. R. Miller, of Glasgow, sends us the copy of a letter written over sixty years ago by the late Rev. William Chalmers Burns (afterwards of China), with reference to the well-known revival at Kilsyth and Dundee. It will be remembered that while the sainted Robert Murray McCheyne was travelling in Eastern Europe and Palestine, inquiring into the progress of the Gospel among the Jews, Mr. Burns supplied his place in parish work at St. Peter's, Dundee. Mr. Burns's father was pastor at Kilsyth, and just at that time the great revival broke out there. Returning to England, McCheyne wrote to Mr. Burns inquiring how the work had been proceeding, both at

DUNDEE AND KILSYTH.

The reply was given in a letter, dated November 18th, 1839, which Dr. Andrew Bonar briefly summarizes in his memoir of his beloved friend. The communication itself will be read with interest at the present time. From a copy in the handwriting of Dr. Bonar, carefully preserved by a fellow elder of Mr. Miller's in Finnieston Free Church congregation, we make the following extracts from Mr. Burns' letter:—

"Before coming to your congregation, I had spent seven years of my life (the period since my conversion) without ever seeing a single instance of open and visible transition from darkness to light. An awakened sinner seeking after Jesus with his whole heart, I do not remember to have seen from the time I myself began to feel interest in the Spirit's work.

"Besides the Sabbath preaching, I continued the prayer meeting on Thursday evening, and the male and female classes, which were attended by about the same number as when you were here. But that so few seemed, under my ministry, awakened to supreme concern about their souls. Only two or three persons seemed awakened by me.

"At the time I was called to attend my father's communion at Kilsyth, there was indication of some revival—increasing earnestness in prayer among the younger Christians. One person, to whom I was remarking the general deadness, told me that she had seen several persons last Sabbath shedding tears; and in the male class, the last time I was there, there was more than usual solemnity; one young man in particular wept profusely, who has since been savingly converted. I left Dundee on Tuesday, July 16th, to be present at Kilsyth on Sabbath, 21st. The marvellous outpouring of the Spirit of God, which was witnessed on Tuesday, 23rd, kept me there. I returned on August 8th. The accounts given by Mr. Lyon, missionary here, who went to supply for me in Dundee, and the fact of my being detained by having been an instrument in the work, had produced a deep impression.

"I cannot say that I returned to Dundee with the distinct expectation of a similar work there. Also, I was on my return, believing that I must be worn out by the labours of the preceding fortnight. I had rather the idea of taking rest than of beginning as constantly in the same blessed work. With this idea, I met with the young men's class on Wednesday, and dismissed them without any particular indications of the Divine presence; and on Thursday requested Mr. Law to take my place at the prayer meeting. This he did, and all went on as usual until, just before concluding, I rose up to say a few words to the people on my return to them, and what had kept me.

"I felt, in speaking, powerfully impressed with the necessity of improving the time as a call to awaken sleeping sinners. Under this impression, and after addressing them urgently, I intimated that I would wait a few minutes to converse with any who knew they were as yet unconverted, and would join with them in pleading for the outpouring of the Spirit to convert.

ABOUT A HUNDRED REMAINED.

I addressed them upon a passage of Scripture, entreating them to believe on the Lord Jesus, and felt unusually the solemnity of my position. In prayer there was very deep solemnity—some were in tears, all seemed in deep earnestness.

"After the blessing was pronounced (about half past ten) a considerable number lingered in the passage even after the lights were put out; and when, in passing to the vestry, I began to say a few things about Kilsyth, and the hardness of their hearts in resisting the power of God, on a sudden the power of God seemed to descend upon them, and they were in a moment,

BATHED IN TEARS.

It put me in mind of the scenes I had left, and I was at that moment inflamed with the desire and elated with the hope of seeing similar revelation of the Right Hand of Jehovah.

"I called on Mr. Thoms, who was beside me, to pray; and before we parted I intimated there would be another prayer meeting, that we might wrestle for the Spirit until it was given. On Friday, accordingly, more than the usual number assembled, and Mr. Baxter conducted the meeting without anything occurring, except that before the blessing I again invited the same class to remain behind. There might be present from 150 to 200, but the number increased while we remained together. In prayer with them I felt more than I had ever done, except at Kilsyth,

THE PRESENCE OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.

While pressing on them the Lord Jesus, all at one time seemed bathed in tears; and one or two persons who had been convicted under your own ministry cried out for mercy.

"In prayer, also, immediately after the address, the tender frame increased upon them, so that, in concluding the meeting at half-past eleven, Mr. Baxter and I felt it still our duty to give any that chose an opportunity of conversing with us in the vestry. And I think I shall never forget what I saw when I opened the door to admit those that wished to see us! They seemed to be pressing towards the door like a pent-up flood; and when it was opened, they rushed in like the same flood, when it has burst its barriers and carries all before it. They pushed forward the tears literally streaming from their eyes, and some of them like persons who had been seized with a frenzy.

WITH BREATHLESS ANXIETY,

"One young man (the individual who had been weeping in the class) screamed out and gasped for breath, so that John Wighton and another man had to hold him in their arms for half an hour! When we proposed to pray, all, as if seized with one impulse, threw themselves upon the ground, weeping and crying after Jesus to come and save them. In singing Psalm xlv., especially

Thine arrows sharply pierce the heart, the souls of all seemed so much on fire that one said 'he never heard such singing as then.'

WE PRAYED AND SPOKE

with them, and dismissed them at half-past one o'clock. At the special request of the people, we intimated another meeting on Saturday night, which was larger than the former ones. Mr. Baxter first officiated; the people were in the same frame as on the preceding night, so that we both remained till Sabbath morning had come in.

"On Sabbath I preached with more than usual liberty, though I had scarcely time to do more than choose the subject before going up. I invited the unconverted to meet me in the evening in the church at seven, saying that any others might come also. I intimated also public prayer meetings for every night during the week. All went on as usual at night while I addressed inquirers from Luke vii. 32-52, the woman that was a sinner; but after service was over, on my way to the vestry, I found many still keeping their seats. I therefore returned to the desk; and, after giving out a psalm, asked Mr. Caird to pray and read a chapter (Luke xv.), adding at my request a few most suitable remarks. I then prayed, and spoke upon Isa. liii. The great part (many hundreds were present) were in tears, and many were almost overcome either with the agony of conviction or a transporting sense of the love of God. We separated about twelve. I was in no degree excited, and enjoyed (as I have done all through this wonderful period) most refreshing rest.

"On opening my Bible next morning my eye rested upon Acts xviii. 9-11, and truly I had need of some such support, for

THE WHOLE CITY WAS IN AN UPROAR.

Many said that we were gone mad; and few of the people of God, except those who had been present, sympathized with us. Some even charged me with an intentional effort to ruin the interests of vital godliness in the city. On Monday and Tuesday (Mr. Baxter having to go to Edinburgh to attend the meeting of commission) I conducted the service myself. On Wednesday Mr. Stewart, of Lochee, assisted. On Thursday Mr. Hamilton, of Abernyte, conducted most of the service. On Friday and Saturday I was alone. During the whole week our services were crowded to suffocation, and hundreds went away without obtaining admission. Nothing characterized these meetings except unusual special attention. We generally separated at ten. I began this week, also, the plan of meeting in the forenoon to converse with those that were anxious.

"Sabbath, August 18th, was one of the greatest days of the Lord's power. When I was preaching on Isa. liv. 6, many persons sobbed and cried aloud; but this was little regarded, as the impression on the audience was so great in general. A greater number have attributed their awakening to that discourse than to any other single sermon I have preached, except that at Kilsyth, on July 23rd.

"I have given you a specimen of our meetings in the first week. They have been continued, with a few exceptions, every night since then.

DURING TWO MONTHS

the attendance was very great; since then smaller, many that used to come from the country not being able now to do so, and some falling away who at first seemed impressed.

"The chief instruments have been Mr. McDonald, of Urquhart; Mr. Cumming, of Dumbarney; and the ministers sent at the communion season. Mr. Horatius Bonar's labours have been specially owned for conviction and conversion. Mr. McDonald told the people once that if any one denied this to be a work of the Spirit, they might, on the same grounds, deny every revival that had ever taken place in Scotland; he had seen similar outward effects under his own ministry. He conversed with eighty persons; and of these said 'that not a single case seemed other than a work of the Spirit.'

"Several hundreds have been awakened. Glory! Glory! Glory to the Lord Jehovah! Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

*"He Knoweth our Frame."

PSALM ciii. 14.

TAKE the sunshine of to-day,
Leave the coming sorrow;
God will surely make a way,
Through each dark to-morrow.

Do not let a thought of dread
Cloud your path with sadness;
While amid life's flowers you tread,
Thank Him for the gladness.

O remember, restless heart,
God is always guiding;
You can bid all fear depart,
In his strength abiding.

Leave the future in his hands,
Wait with trustful meekness;
God will choose—He understands
All our human weakness.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, February 11. Job xl.

JEHOVAH finally takes up the argument, and deals with his child. All through the long discussion, He had been waiting that He might have mercy, waiting till the storm of the perturbed spirit was allayed, waiting till the clear heaven was again reflected in the placid surface of the patriarch's bosom. How true this is of all God's dealings! Job had often challenged Him to speak before, but heaven had maintained its silence, because the lesson was not perfectly acquired, and Job had not reached the true posture of humility and faith. Now, however, as he was returning to himself and his rest in God, the voice of God is heard pleading with Him.

> Where is thy haunt, eternal voice—
> The region of thy choice?

Not in the storm-rent mountains, not in the valleys scored with torrents, not in the whirlwind only, the fire or the thunder, but in the still small voice, pleading in the heart.

In those days, when as yet the Cross had not come in view, Nature presented the chief works of God, and it is on one of the mightiest of these that the Almighty focuses his child's attention. The hippopotamus, or river-horse, is the chief of the ways of God. The consideration of this mighty beast must have still further quickened Job's sense of insignificance. Ah, it is a good thing when a man feels his littleness and nothingness in the midst of this great universe, and lays his hand upon his mouth.

MONDAY, February 12. Job xli.

What a magnificent description of the crocodile! There is nothing to compare with it in any page of the world's literature. The inference is that the Maker of so marvellous an animal must be superlatively great. If the creature be so wonderful, what must not the Creator be? If you cannot approach or tame the monster, which buries itself in the seething water and eludes your sight, how helpless you are to follow the track of the Divine Providence, or bend it to your will!

One great lesson from all these chapters seems to be the desirability of acquainting ourselves with the works of God in Nature. No devout student in the school of this instructress can ever leave it without loftier conceptions of Him whose handmaiden Nature is. A great God is the goal which they must reach who travel, from the tiny gnat that blows its horn, or the smallest humming bird that glances in the sunbeam. Nature is always beautiful, but to the ordinary eye of men's curiosity or admiration she does not unfold her choicest aspects. There is a colour in the rainbow which evades, and a music in the waterfall which eludes, and a note in the storm which remains unheard by any, save those whose heart is pure and childlike and full of the love of God. If this be yours, adopt some line of natural study, have your hobby, as they say. It may be a shell, an egg, a fossil, a cone, an orchid, but each of these may lead your thoughts to God.

TUESDAY, February 13. Job xlii.

In the earlier part of this chapter we have Job's penitent reply. In his first sentence he own's God's omnipotence over nature as contrasted with his own feebleness, and goes on to acknowledge the justice and holiness of God in contrast with his own sin.

What an epoch is inaugurated in the history of the soul when it ceases to hear merely, and begins to see! There is too much of hearsay religion in the world; too little of that which comes of direct vision. You have heard of God from men like George Müller, or John Paton, or D. L. Moody; but why do you not prove Him for yourself?

When Job had confessed that perfect as he was there was more evil in him than he knew, and had abased himself before God in dust and ashes, placing his hand upon his mouth, and confessing himself to be vile, there was no further need for God to keep silence. The sluice gates which had pent in the blessing were therefore opened, and at the earliest moment in which Job could receive God's best gifts to the fullest extent, and with the least injury, the river of God poured forth its plentiful supplies.

In the case of Job, of Mary, and Martha, of the Syrophenician woman, and in many other instances in Scripture, it is clear that God's delay did not mean denial, did not mean that He had disregarded or forgotten his servants' case, but that He was preparing them for the blessing He had prepared for them, which was to be according to heaven's measure, pressed down, and running over. God takes care not to give us power until we have reached a position of humility and penitence where He can help us without injury.

THE BOOK OF PSALMS.

WEDNESDAY, February 14. Psa. i.

This psalm begins in the Hebrew with an exclamation, "Oh the blessednesses!" An exclamation of strong emotion, as though it were the result of the Psalmist's reflections. The trend of those reflections may be gathered from the tenour of the psalm.

The righteous man is described, first with reference to his outward life, then to his inner. He is compared to one of the most beautiful objects in nature; and lastly, he is thrown into strong contrast with the wicked. Perhaps the psalm will best open up to us if we consider it under these divisions; and let us be careful to see that each of the characteristics of the righteous man appear in our own life and conduct.

It has been often said that walking leads to standing, and standing to sitting; that the counsel of the wicked leads to the way of sinners, and this in turn to the seat of the scornful; that the wicked becomes a sinner, and the sinner, scornful. There is a regular deterioration of character in those who yield to the solicitations of their own nature. However enticing their life may seem, it has in it the seed of decay: "the way of the wicked shall perish." True blessedness is only possible for those who steadfastly oppose the will of God to the delights of sense. Joseph knew this blessedness in Potiphar's house; and Jesus, when He refused to use his Divine power to turn stones to bread.

Would you be kept from yielding to desires and tastes like these? There is but one antidote—delight in the law of God. Let it be your daily study. It is antiseptic to carnal desire. They plant the eucalyptus round some cities in Italy to keep out the bacillus of the plague. It is not enough to read the Bible. You must meditate upon it. Then comes the evergreen leaf of a daily fresh experience, and the ceaseless prosperity of the purpose and industry of our life.

THURSDAY, February 15. Psa. ii.

St. Paul applies this psalm to the resurrection and ascension of Christ; but is there one age to which it has not been applicable? Men are quite prepared for you to talk about religion until you demand that they should be bound in the bands of obedience, and tied by the cords of loyal subjection to God. When this comes within measurable distance they gnash their teeth. Let even a dignitary of the Established Church press home an unpalatable truth, and demand that men should literally heap coals of fire upon the head of their enemies, and he is assailed with an outburst of uncontrollable rage and hate. Religion is well enough so long as men are asked to patronize it, but they vehemently resent it when it conflicts with their interests.

Nothing, however, can alter God's decrees. Before the dayspring had its birth, or the sons of God first shouted for joy, it was agreed between the Father and the Son that the supremacy over the hearts of men should be assured to Him. We see not yet all things put under Him. Nearly 1,900 years have passed since He emerged from the open grave, the first begotten of the dead, and the Prince of the kings of the earth; and, as we look upon the face of the world, the dream of prophets and saints seems further away from fulfilment than ever. But let us never forget this Divine "yet"—"Yet have I set my King." Canute's throne on the seashore was threatened by the advancing wave, although he were a king of unconquered prowess; but let the tides of time dash never so proudly around the throne of Jesus, it stands sure and supreme.

What God has effected in the heavenly places shall yet be repeated in our world; and this planet also, which has broken away from its allegiance, shall be filled with men who kiss the Son, and lay their swords at his feet.

FRIDAY, February 16. Psa. iii.

There are times when adversaries accumulate. As Luther said, they are "as numerous as tiles upon the housetop." They rise against the soul, as the Scottish clansmen, at the call of their chief, from behind every stone and bush. At such times they are profuse in prophecy, and predict our downfall, because they suppose that by some sin, like that which David perpetrated, we have alienated the Divine help. They cannot understand how God can help those who have sinned against Him. They do not ween how instantly and absolutely God forgives the soul that abandons itself to Him in repentance and faith. There was as much help for David as though he had not sinned at all. Indeed, I sometimes think that the weakest and most sinful have the larger supplies of Divine help, if only they will dare to cry with the Psalmist, But Thou, O Lord. . . .

Lie down and sleep, O harassed and driven soul. It is useless for thee to rise up early, and sit up late, and eat the bread of care. Granted that ten thousands of the people ring thee around, God is in the inner circle encompassing thee with songs of deliverance. There is a picture of Satan sitting beside the prostrate form of the sleeping Saviour considering Him, his face dark with malignant hate; but there is a divine arrest placed upon his malevolence, he is bound as by a spell, there is an invisible shield around that precious form. Such a shield is ours. We are hidden in the secret place of the Most High, encompassed behind and before, and covered by a strong and loving hand. Be at peace, child of God. As a babe might be hushed with its nurse's lullaby in the keep of a strong castle, though the beleaguering foe should wait around the impregnable wall, so thou mayest lay thyself down to sleep. The responsibility of thy safeguard is with God.

SATURDAY, February 17. Psa. iv.

It is good to know that God hath set apart him that is godly for Himself. It is as though, driven forth from all other hearts, He takes refuge in the pure and holy one. Such a man is God's peculiar treasure. He retreats into his converse with such an one as a husband, weary with the strife of the world, seeks the society of his pure, strong, loving wife. What converse there is between God and the godly soul! It cries, and the Lord hears. Its enemies are his. Its perils and temptations are his. The godly man often finds himself, as David did, beset and surrounded. At such times we must stand still, not fretful, not vindictive, not wishing to avenge ourselves, but communing with our own heart, and being still. How often one thinks of the great Robert Hall, when, heated by an argument in defence of what he deemed to be right, going by himself into a corner of the room, and saying in a low voice, "Calm me, Lamb of God, calm me." The heart which knows God can afford to be still.

Such a man is independent of the sources of human joy. Others must have their corn and their wine increased, or gladness evades them; he wants only that God should lift his face above the high mountains, and send shafts of light into the lowland valley where he dwells. This is his supreme good. There is no good but one for him, and that is God.

Let us often turn the Psalmist's affirmation into prayer, and ask that God shall put gladness into our heart. By nature it is a stranger there, and we cannot create it; but God can put gladness into the most sorrowful heart that ever wearied for death, and complained against the slow passage of the heavy moving hours.

Other Lands.

An "Open Door" in China.

A WONDERFUL CHANGE.

THE veteran Chinese missionary, Dr. Griffith John, has been greatly cheered lately by a remarkable change in the attitude of the Chinese officials in Yochou. On his previous visits he has been repulsed by incivility, and, twenty years ago, even by stones. "All that is now changed," writes Dr. John, "and so great is the change that I found it almost impossible on this visit to realize that the Yochou of to-day could be the same place as the Yochou of former days. Often did I stand still and ask myself: 'Can this be Yochou?' I found it difficult to believe my eyes and ears. It seemed too good to be true!"

SYMPATHY IN PLACE OF INCIVILITY.

Dr. Griffith John makes it clear that the alteration in the official manners towards the missionaries and their work was not due to there being different men in office. The district magistrate, who was on this occasion so sympathetic to the missionaries, was the same man who had treated Dr. John with great incivility so recently as 1897. He now expressed himself delighted with the prospect of a mission being established in Yochou. The Taotai was just as pleasant.

"He and I had met in 1880 at Ch'angsha," writes Dr. John, "he being at that time the district magistrate of Shanhua. He recognised me at once, shook me by the hand, and said, 'We are old friends.' He then took us into a private room, where we found a table covered with cloth of faultless whiteness, and spread with refreshments in the shape of foreign biscuits and sweetmeats. We had tea served in the foreign style, with milk and sugar. His champagne we did not drink, and his cigars we declined with thanks. His Excellency is a most affable man and a great talker. We discussed all manner of subjects for about half an hour, and parted the best of friends."

A REMARKABLE PROCLAMATION.

After sites had been procured by the missionaries—the district magistrate foregoing the usual yamen fees as a sign of sympathy—they had further evidence of official approval in the form of the following proclamation:—

1. The tenets taught by the London Missionary Society have their origin in exhorting men to be good.

2. The object of building chapels is for the purpose of preaching and exhorting men to cast out the false and adhere to the Truth.

3. Officials, civil and military, will therefore protect both those who come to teach and those who wish to learn Christianity.

4. Those in authority have long ago received their instructions, and it is the duty of all respectfully to obey.

5. I hereby command the Gentry in charge of the militia and police to make it their duty to make this known to all.

6. Should reckless men and rowdies attempt to give trouble, the authorities will punish them severely and show no leniency.

A STIRRING APPEAL.

Dr. Griffith John concludes his deeply-interesting letter with the following appeal, which we commend to our readers:—

"Now that we are in possession of Yochou, we shall have no difficulty in working the whole of the Siang Valley, where we have, in all, more than twenty congregations of Christians already. Yochou is an important place in itself, and will make an exceedingly attractive mission station. But it is also the key to the whole of Hunan, but especially to the cities on the Siang, the London Missionary Society's sphere in the province. The Hunan missionaries will find at Yochou a quiet home and a safe retreat, should there be any trouble or fear of trouble in the more inland cities. We might have begun at Hengchou, but the risk of temporary failure would have been greater. At Yochou there is not, so far as I can see, any risk at all. It will be as easy to carry on work there as it is here at Hankow. Everything is now in full working order, but we want more men. The London Missionary Society ought to have ten men at least in Hunan. The call from Hunan is a Divine call. It is my constant prayer that the directors of the London Missionary Society may have the faith and courage to face this call, and send us the men we need."

South African Letters.

THE kindly interest which so many readers of The Christian, in various parts of Great Britain, have shown in the work of the Colonial Missionary Society in South Africa, leads me to feel that they will be glad to see the following extracts from letters received "from the front." My hope is that many will be led to pray that the men and women who are so bravely standing at their posts of duty may be helped to be faithful to the end.

Zulus in Natal.

Rev. G. John Pugh, who has charge of the Table Mountain Mission, Cato Ridge, writes that the work among the Zulus continues to give him much encouragement, and that his workers are conscious that they are doing the will of the Master.

Our fellow-workers, Misses Whitly and Wright, are well, and God is prospering their abundant labours amidst many difficulties and disappointments. Their work has grown so much that the need of a larger and more suitable building for worship is seriously felt.

What a picture of faith, when those who are only a short distance from the war talk of extending their work!

Johannesburg.

The following letter from Rev. Frank C. Rollin, B.A., tells its own story. It is beautiful to note that he asks us not to be anxious on his account.

I am quite safe, and believe that God is with me. I am the only Congregational minister who has been allowed to stay here. The authorities have very kindly given me a "permit," so I am all right. I have been treated with the greatest kindness and consideration by all. My best thanks are due to all the officials for their great courtesy. I have received several special privileges from them. Of course my church has suffered very considerably through the present trouble. I have had to give up the morning service for the present, owing to lack of congregation. The evening service, however, keeps up wonderfully well. The Sunday School is progressing splendidly; my only trouble is the lack of workers. I have to combine in myself all the offices of the church and school.

Ladysmith.

Special interest is now centred in Ladysmith, where our friends, Revs. C. Thomson, Fred H. Tapp (who went out two years ago from Harley House), and A. J. Andrews are shut up. The last-named is at the front as chaplain to the Natal Volunteers. He is reported as "playing the hero in ministering to wounded men." Writing from Maritzburg, Rev. John Fernie says:—

We are getting very anxious about Messrs. Thomson and Tapp, as the bombardment of the town seems to be going on with great severity. One letter from Mr. to Mrs. Thomson was got through, and reached her on December 7. At that time the shelling of the town had done little harm; but reports—or rumours—since are more serious. It is said that the Town Hall and Congregational manse are both destroyed. Mr. Thomson, who wrote at that time in fairly good spirits, said his health was good, and he was able to hold Sunday services on his front verandah. The church had been taken by the military for a hospital. Since the starting of the camp at Ladysmith he has acted as "Presbyterian" chaplain to the troops. Whether that holds good now I cannot say. The Gordons have their own chaplain with them.

Mr. Thomson, when he wrote, was living at home with one or two (Presbyterian) ministers who had taken refuge there. Part of the population had been moved four or five miles out to a spot which the Boers promised to respect as "neutral ground." Others are living between their own homes and caves dug out by the riverside, going and coming according to risks in the houses. . . . After expecting Ladysmith to be relieved two or three weeks ago, we are greatly cast down at its being now worse pressed than ever, and the enemy in an impregnable position between our troops and it. We fear for its holding out, while its surrender would be a disaster that we dare not let ourselves think of.

A later mail has brought me two letters containing much that is too tender and private to quote, though they had to be so written as to be passed by the Censor. But the dominant note is of trust in God, though shells are falling round the writer. Mr. Thomson says:—

But don't be anxious about us. The Lord reigns over all, and not a sparrow can fall to the ground without his word. We commit all to his keeping, and it is well whatever comes. Only a little while, and I hope to have you all (i.e., his family) back again.

Mr Fernie in a private letter to me adds:—

We cannot be too thankful that we have such a man as Mr. Thomson in Ladysmith. He never makes the least pretence, or in anyway calls attention to himself, but he never fails when there is a bit of urgent or self-denying work to be done. He is always the same—always to be relied on.

Vryburg.

Referring to Rev. R. Olver, of Vryburg, whose pathetic letter was recently published in The Christian, Rev. J. P. Ritchie writes on December 28 from Port Elizabeth:—

I have just had an interview with one of the deacons of our church, who was ordered to quit as a dangerous individual, along with 400 English residents. They had experienced grievous hardships on the way; got as far as Christiana in the Free State, when they were intercepted and ordered back to Vryburg. Rev. R. Olver was among them in this first exodus, it having been falsely reported that he had expressed himself desirous of having every Dutchman shot. On the return of the fugitives the slander had exploded, and he received a "permit" to remain, when the second expulsion took place. . . . There is no means of communication yet available with Vryburg, so that in the meantime no help can be sent, even if it were available.

A South African Emergency Fund is being raised in connection with the Colonial Missionary Society. Funds are sent to Capetown and Durban, to be forwarded as soon as communication is open. D. Burford Hooke.

Notes from New York.

THE American Bible Society has taken up with vigour the translation of the Bible into Filipino dialects, and the circulation of the Scriptures in our eastern possessions. Translations into the dialects of the Tagalos, Pangasinans, and Visayans are already in progress, and scholars are studying others. Instead of depending upon missionaries from here for circulating the Word of God, two natives are to be sent into the interior as colporteurs. The Society also has in view a plan for distributing Bibles on the ships that come to Manila, similar to that worked very effectively at Port Said.

The Editor of the Capital News, of Topeka, Kan., the home of Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, author of "In His Steps," has offered the entire management of the paper to that gentleman for one week, beginning March 13. Mr. Sheldon, during that period, will have full control of every department of the paper, both editorial and advertising. A large sale of the paper may be safely predicted during that period in all parts of the country, and the cost to the enterprising editor of the advertising his paper will receive between this date and then will be comparatively small.

The Committee appointed by the House of Representatives at Washington to investigate the case of Representative-elect Roberts, of Utah, has delivered majority and minority reports. Five out of seven declared for his exclusion from the House on the ground of his being a polygamist, while the other two think he ought to be allowed to take his seat and then be promptly expelled. The State of Utah in general, and the Mormon Church in particular, will receive a practical proof of the fact that this nation is not so indifferent to the observance of the laws of God and of Congress as many people think. Roger Martin.

The Indian Famine.

THE communications which we continue to receive from the famine districts are deeply pathetic in their accounts of the extreme suffering which exists. According to Mr. John Elliot, government meteorological reporter, an area comprising nearly two-thirds of India is suffering from the most severe drought of the century.

Mr. W. M. Oatts, who is touring in the East under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A., describes the state of Rajputana: "No rain has fallen since August (Mr. Oatts' letter is dated January 17). The famine is raging. You see poor creatures wandering over bare fields, picking up dried leaves, pulling up some roots here and there, and all looking so thin and hungry. At several points we passed Relief Works where thousands of men and women were employed, receiving as remuneration 1d., or 1¼d. per day."

Mr. Oatts goes on to describe the work connected with Dr. Colin Valentine's Medical Missionary Training Institution, Agra. The Beggars' Church was started eleven years since, in a time of need, and has been carried on ever since. On Sunday, January 14, 2,186 poor creatures attended—the blind, the lame, the leper, men, women, and children, with all kinds of deformities and sores. Not one person had on a whole garment; they were clad simply in rags. The children were pitiful to behold. There came a company of over twenty persons, carrying small bundles on their heads. They were farmers from a district 120 miles away—a few months before were well-to-do, but now had lost all. Here was a poor woman who had crawled on all-fours for more than a mile, in order to be present. Starving as these poor creatures are, they would not accept food from the hands of Christians, so money had to be given. The average dole was ½d., sufficient, that is, to purchase two meals.

Mr. Watson Grace, the secretary of the Friends' Foreign Mission Association, writes to us as follows from 15, Devonshire Street, Bishopsgate, E.C.:—

"In the midst of some of the worst famine districts in the Central Provinces and in the native States of Central India, the Friends' Foreign Mission Association is at work, and receives weekly reports from its missionaries, showing wide-spread and growing distress. The sum of £2,500 has already been contributed, mainly by members of the Society of Friends, to the fund which the missionaries of the Association are administering. Relief is chiefly being given by the employment of famine-stricken natives in works of permanent utility, such as the sinking of wells and the deepening of tanks."

Rev. Dennis Osborne, well known as a minister and evangelist of the American Methodist Episcopal Church in India, and who is due to arrive in England within the next few days, wrote from Poona on January 5: "I am coming as a missionary to plead for the starving, the orphan, and the destitute, under the terrible combined visitation of plague and famine, which has ravaged India for more than three years. I shall be deeply obliged for the privilege of speaking upon the subject in the churches.

Mrs. J. C. Lawson, who, with her husband, a minister of the American Methodist Episcopal Mission at Aligarh, N.W.P., India, is industriously labouring to alleviate the suffering, writes under date January 17: "Last week there were 70,000 people on relief works in the Hissar district alone. We found a woman trying to sell, for two rupees, her little girl of two years, and a dear little boy of six. We told her we would care of the little ones, and take her too. I have never see a more grateful creature. Yet we have to refuse many appeals."

The Gospel in Madagascar.

By Mrs. J. PEILL.

MADAGASCAR is represented in our school maps on so small a scale, that few of us realize its extent, or remember that it would need four Englands or seven Scotlands to make an island of equal size. The Gospel was first taken there by a small handful of missionaries eighty years ago. The writer has seen and conversed with their very first native disciple, who was taught to read and form letters traced on the sand of the sea-shore.

MALAGASY CHRISTIAN FAMILY.

It was not, however, at the coast, but in the highlands of the interior, that the light was set on a candlestick and began to give light to all the ruling tribe of Hova people. Superstitions and cruel customs gave way before it; knowledge was increased, and the light began to spread north and south from the central province of Imérina. But owing to the fewness of the missionaries and the shortness of the time—(where was our own land eighty years after the first introduction of the Gospel?)—only a comparatively small part of Madagascar has yet been evangelized. In fact, fully two-thirds of that great island still lies in

THE DARKNESS OF HEATHENISM.

Even in the evangelized province of Imérina there still remains much superstition, and many still cling to the ancient heathen customs, secretly hating the white men's religion, and longing to get rid of it. Their opportunity came, as they thought, soon after the French occupation. Full of confidence in the idols and heathen charms with which the rehabilitated witch-doctors had provided them, they came boldly up to the French fire, expecting that the bullets would fall harmless from bodies rendered invulnerable by the charms that covered them. The results proved the death-blow to heathenism in Imérina. No Hova now wants to wear charms, and the witch-doctors have made haste to go into other lines of business.

These charms consisted of little bits of sacred wood, strung into a necklace of crocodiles' teeth, real or imitation, and of horns filled with a dirty mixture of honey, ashes of selected plants, and other substances prepared with incantations while stirring over the fire. They also wore on the forehead a round flat shell called a failana, and a band of dark blue cotton round the head was supposed to render them invisible to their enemies.

Bands of these warriors rushed upon the villages and forced the defenceless inhabitants to assist them in demolishing their churches and schoolhouses, and in burning all the Bibles and hymnbooks they could find. After that they compelled the unhappy villagers to follow them to the desert or forest, the men to march in their ranks, the women and children to live as they could in camp. Great sufferings were endured, and many died of starvation in these camps.

But meantime the Christians had fled from their village homes to the capital or to a mission station. Many village pastors, teachers and local preachers, gathered about us at Ambohimanga, some taking the opportunity to study French and attend my classes, all coming regularly to the weekly prayer meeting and Bible reading held by Mr. Peill. These faithful Christians were a great joy and encouragement to us at a very trying period, and we count it a privilege to have been able to help their faith and steadfastness.

One of these earnest native pastors, with his family, is seen in the photographic group. The wife is just as zealous a worker as her husband, especially in visiting and exhorting the people in their homes. The two boys are both promising scholars in our mission school, and by God's blessing will yet be his messengers to carry forward the light in Madagascar.

Capital Punishment.—At a meeting, under the auspices of the Prison Reform Department of the Humanitarian League, held last week in St. Martin's Town Hall, W.C., Dr. Josiah Oldfield lectured on capital punishment. The chair was taken by Rev. Dr. W. Douglas Morrison, late Chaplain of Wandsworth Prison, who, speaking from a long personal experience of such scenes, expressed the opinion that the carrying out of the death-sentence "necessitates the repression of every sentiment of humanity in the human heart." Dr. Oldfield, after carefully criticising the various arguments alleged in support of the gallows, and showing that many of them had been used long ago in favour of hanging for theft and other petty offences, made a strong plea for a tentative discontinuance of the death-penalty. Referring to some answers he had received from the judges on this point, he said that the Lord Chief Justice had expressed himself as "opposed to capital punishment;" but one of his colleagues, with a levity which the lecturer deprecated on so serious a subject, had written that, in his opinion, it was not capital punishment, but the murderer, that should be "suspended for a time." The lecture wil appear in the Humane Review for April United Protestant Demonstration.

In view of the remarkable activity of Romanism, and the leanings in the same direction shown by many nominal Protestants, it is of the greatest importance that those who value political freedom, liberty of conscience, and Evangelical truth, should make their voices heard at the present time. That this is a widespread conviction is certain from the enthusiasm which characterized the united demonstration of Protestants held on Tuesday last week in the Royal Albert Hall. A goodly body of influential clergy and prominent laymen occupied seats on the platform; and though all the boxes were not available for the occasion, there was a very large attendance, gentlemen, of course, being in the majority. In fact, some 3,000 applications for admission had to be refused.

The tone of the meeting itself was but another evidence that Protestants are determined to uphold and maintain the principles on which the nation has been nourished, and to resist with vigour every attempt to introduce Mass and the Confessional in the Established Church.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH.

presided, and representatives were present from 163 towns, and delegates from seventy provincial organizations. No fewer than 221 telegrams expressing sympathy with the object, also cablegrams from Sydney, Agra, and Cairo, and a letter from Bishop Cabrera, of the Reformed Church of Spain, were received.

The speakers were cordially received, and their utterances loudly applauded. The Bishop of Sodor and Man, and Lord Kinnaird, who intended to be present, wrote regretting unavoidable absence.

Prebendary Webb-Peploe opened with prayer and a portion of Scripture. "Fight the good fight" was then vigorously sung, the gathering entering into the spirit of the words.

The Earl of Portsmouth was the first to address the assembly. He began with a question as to what the bishops had done to restore law and order in the Church. From all parts of the building there were answers of "Nothing," and exclamations to the effect that "things were worse than ever." That demonstration, said the Chairman, was a proof that the protest, which their opponents thought would be smothered under the excitement of war, was as keen as ever. It was impossible to charge Protestants with any wish to embarrass the Government at a time of national emergency; they only asked the Government to stand by its pledges. "It is for Protestants to review by what the bishops have done." Men of all classes agree as to the responsibility of the bishops; Lord Salisbury has said it was their duty to restrain the lawless clergy, and if they did not do this they deserved to be punished themselves. The Prime Minister did not proceed to say how he proposed to punish the bishops, but perhaps he had in mind the action of his great ancestor, William Cecil, who in the days of Elizabeth made a complete sweep of the whole bench of bishops!

Lord Portsmouth went on to criticise the attitude of the Archbishop of Canterbury, who had described the Protestant movement as a "little fire among a little straw." The Primate knows better now, for since that date he had at least learnt something, and had confessed that the Church was unquestionably in a critical position. That crisis will continue so long as the bishops retain irresponsibility and their unconstitutional right of veto. His Lordship strenuously denounced the course taken by the archbishops in dealing with points submitted for their decision—the reservation of the Sacrament, ceremonial use of incense, and the use of processional lights. The archbishops had not dared to pronounce any action upon reservation. They had condemned the use of incense and altar lights, but we owe them little for that. The bishops had told the public that the clergy had conformed, but this was merely with the object of lulling the people into a sense of false security. If the bishops did not act, the clergy were perfectly

FREE FROM ANY OBEDIENCE.

Proceeding, the Chairman spoke with hopefulness as to the prospects of the Protestant cause. If the bishops, and those waiting on events, imagined that this was a mere quarrel between parties in the Church, they would find themselves disappointed. It was the Protestant faith that was at stake, not a mere church or sect. Upon Protestant principles rest the vigour of our race and the freedom of our homes. The agitation would be continued until the Church of England was saved as a Protestant institution, even though, through the apathy and cowardice of those within her, reform is rendered impossible, and disestablishment and disendowment offer the only remedy to an embittered people.

The Right Hon. J. W. Mellor, Q.C., M.P., then submitted the first resolution in the following terms: "That this meeting, believing the preservation of the Protestantism of the National Church to be a matter of paramount importance, and that the revival of the Mass and of the practice of auricular confession is disastrous to the spiritual and moral welfare of the nation, pledges itself to uphold the principles of the Reformation, as being the only effectual guarantees of civil and religious liberty."

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH.

From Photograph by Messrs. Elliott and Fry, 55, Baker Street, London, W.

There were two things, remarked the speaker, for which the people of this Empire would fight—first, for their religion; and, secondly, for their country. They knew how they could fight for their country—many of them descendants of, and successors to, the

GREAT PURITAN IRONSIDES.

Their ancestors fought and died for the Protestant faith, and they had to ask themselves, What had they done? He urged all to make up their minds to do something to support the Protestant cause, remembering that there were constitutional means of which they could avail themselves in the struggle. The Government had promised to take up the question if the bishops did nothing in the meantime; and this being so, it was the duty of the public to call upon them to keep their pledges. "We want an honest, simple bill that will compel every man to obey the law." Some would charge them with being "extreme" Protestants; others would insinuate that theirs was a "narrow" Protestantism. Their answer was simple: they took their stand on the Gospel. If that was narrow, then they were narrow; if that was extreme, then they were extreme. Other people said, "You will stir up strife." He did not dispute it. In this matter they had to deal with Mr. Ready-to-Halt, the man who went about saying, "Leave it to the bishops;" and with Mr. Feeble-Mind, who said they were

"STIRRING UP STRIFE."

What? Were they to neglect to defend their religion for fear of stirring up strife? It was by sitting with folded arms that they had allowed things to drift into so shameful a strait. Half the clergy were against them, but the laity were on their side. The speaker concluded by remarking that the state of matters in the Church had become intolerable, and for the sake of the Protestant religion they must pray that God would extend his right hand to the Church for help and defence in its hour of need.

Canon Woodward (Liverpool) seconded the resolution. In the course of his address he contrasted the state of affairs in England—doctrinal and ecclesiastical—before and after

THE REFORMATION.

> There was a time when God, who was Love, was obscured, and his loving-kindness libelled. The intellect and conscience alike were under despotic sacerdotal rule. Sinful and unhappy man must resort to his director for confession and absolution; to Virgin, saints, penances, indulgences, and payments. Then came extreme unction and purgatory. Into the midst of all this mediæval darkness came evangelical Protestantism, proclaiming liberty of access, and entrance into the presence of the Holiest through Jesus Christ and the grace of the Holy Ghost. Having reviewed the growth and effects of Protestantism on our national life, the speaker said they had been told to be careful as to controversy; but a higher authority than archbishop or bishop had commanded that they should contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints; and whatever might be the immediate result of this strife, or the power of the adversary, in God Almighty's sovereign wisdom, the time would come when the apocalyptic angel would sound his triumphant note, proclaiming "the kingdoms of the world have become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and He shall reign for ever and ever."

Mr. Austin Taylor, of Liverpool, moved a resolution pledging the meeting to support any well-considered Bill in Parliament having for its object the putting an end to the anarchy now prevailing in the Established Church. He declared in fearless and emphatic terms that the bishops had only of the Ritualistic question. They had given opinions, pronouncements, and declarations; but the Mass and Confessional were as rampant in the Church of England as they were twelve months ago.

Mr. J. W. Fraser, in seconding the resolution, referred to the half-hearted, halting way in which the bishops acted, practically apologizing for asking their clergy to conform to the law. Mr. Fraser forcibly appealed for influence to be brought to bear upon the Legislature to redress Protestant grievances.

The next resolution was proposed by Mr. F. A. Channing, M.P., affirming the necessity of maintaining the control of Parliament over the Church as the only means by which, at present, the voice of the Protestant laity could be effectively heard. They were, he said, face to face with rebellion against truth and authority. They had to deal with rebels, some of whom they could afford to despise. The men they had to dread were those who came with catch phrases and watch-words, winning recruits even among the intellectually acute and discriminating. Having referred to the pernicious superstitions, vitiated and corrupt practices of the darkest ages, which they were told to cherish, Mr. Channing said they were resolved to keep the right to think and act in the dread but inspiring responsibility to the all-wise and all-merciful God.

Rev. W. R. Mowll (Brixton), in an earnest and powerful address, urged the demand of a voice for the laity in all the departments of Church life. He strongly advocated education preceding legislation. The young must be educated in the mighty truths of the Protestant faith. Referring to the doctrines of the Church of England, as contained in the Thirty-nine Articles, he asked, in the name of all that was holy and pure, how far were those doctrines preached from the pulpits of the Church of England to-day? Apart from what Parliament could do for them, the bishops could, by a stroke of their pen, alter the existing state of things and cancel the orders of any rebellious curate. Holding up the Bible, Mr. Mowll declared, above loud and incessant cheering, that that was the CHARTER OF OUR LIBERTY.

As long as England had her Bible, she had a mighty bulwark against the foes of freedom and religious thought.

All the resolutions were carried with enthusiastic acclamation, and the result of the great gathering will assuredly be a further consolidation of the forces working for the suppression of Romish practices carried on in so-called Protestant churches, and without let or hindrance on the part of rulers and leaders of Church thought and action.

During the evening a cablegram was despatched to Field Marshal Lord Roberts, praying that God would vouchsafe his guidance and protection to officers and men fighting for the vindication of the honour of their country.

The National Anthem was sung spontaneously and with much fervour. Again, at the close, the familiar words were sung; and the proceedings, which were hearty throughout, were brought to a close by the Benediction.

Manchester Waifs.

THE Homes of the Manchester and Salford Boys' and Girls' Refuges and Children's Aid Society, which are situated at Strangeways, Manchester, contain a large and increasing family of helpless children, drawn from many quarters, and whose interests lie near the hearts of numbers of sympathetic friends.

At the six Orphan Homes there are now resident 113 children. The Open-all-night Shelter, during last month, had under its care fifty-five children. Sad to relate, thirty-two of these were admitted between ten at night and four in the morning. Most of these were restored to friends, but five had to be retained. The various branches of the Homes continue to be systematically conducted, and the workshops and institute, as well as the messenger and shoe-black brigade, are proving effective means, whereby instruction is imparted in temporal and spiritual considerations.

Many are the cheering letters received from boys and girls in distant lands brought up in the institutions, expressing gratitude and love for the home to which they owe so much. From Canadian farms and training ships come welcome tidings and thankofferings. The following is an instance of many encouraging communications:

Enclosed please find 20s. We consider this small thank-offering the least we can do for the old place, from which we have both derived so much benefit in times past. Willingly do we become from this date annual subscribers to the noble work, and trust that by its influence many more may be helped.

The hon. secretary, Mr. Leonard K. Shaw, will be glad to furnish full particulars of the institutions. He may be addressed: Broom Holm, Cheetham Hill; or at the Refuge, Strangeways, Manchester.

Points for Workers.

ILLUSTRATIONS FROM THE WAR.

AT the present time practically the sole topic of conversation in Great Britain is the terrible war which has been raging in South Africa since October. It may be, therefore, useful to some speakers who would like to draw spiritual lessons from this carnal conflict if we suggest some illustrations connected with it.

"Misled by Guides."

This phrase occurred in the General's despatch which recounted with frankness the terrible mistake he made in approaching within a dangerous proximity the lines of the enemy. But what a thought the words carry to any who have seen their fellow-men "misled by guides" in matters of eternal importance! How many a young man, entering on a commercial or professional career, has been "misled by guides," who told him that the roads of pleasure and sin were quite safe, only to discover too late that he was bound hand and foot by the enemy of souls. One recalls the story of the Alpine travellers who were found frozen to death, not more than a hundred yards from the path which would have led them safely into the village below. "Misled by guides"—ah, we all know how our hearts have turned aside from the old, safe paths, and found to our sorrow nothing but disappointment and danger.

"There shall be no turning back."

Such were the brave words with which Sir Redvers Buller encouraged his men in their desperate attempt to reach Ladysmith. But though they crossed the River Tugela, and stormed the height of Spion Kop, they had, after all their gallant endeavours, to retrace their steps. With Christ as our leader, "there shall be no turning back." We have but to follow and victory is secure. Not a few who once pledged themselves and their houses to serve the living God said: "There shall be no turning back." But, alas! some of them are now backsliders, defeated by the fierce onslaught of the enemy. Let them return penitently, and, in the strength of the Lord, resolve that "there shall be no turning back."

"Officers have not yet learned the value of scouting."

In this sentence we have one explanation of the failure of some of our churches and missions. Mr. Moody understood "the value of scouting" very early in his remarkable career. In his directions to workers we read—"Search out every family. . . . It would be well to ask some friend to go with you." The way to fill our churches is to follow our Lord's command, and go out into the highways and "compel them to come in." This is not "scouting" in the military sense but in the evangelical sense. Mr. Moody scouted when he paid two visits to this country before coming for the great revival of 1875. He studied the enemy's ground and the enemy's methods. All that prayerful preparation and common sense could do was done, and similar "scouting" we commend to all who conduct missions, and to ministers and deacons who want to see their churches filled.

Kettering.—Pastor S. de Courcy, of Kettering, writes:—"We have in connection with our mission work, in which we reach a large number of people of the working class, an institute where men and women come in the evenings to read. We are urgently requiring books for our library, and shall be glad if friends can help us in the matter." Address 25, Tennyson Road, Kettering.

Cambridge Notes.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Cambridge Inter-collegiate Christian Union has been addressed this term by Rev. J. O. Dykes, D.D., Principal of Westminster College, and by Prebendary Webb-Peploe. The latter is always welcome in Cambridge, and large numbers assembled last Sunday to hear him.

Last week a well attended meeting was held in connection with the Congregational Twentieth Century Fund, when Rev. Dr. Guinness Rogers was the chief speaker. The movement is being well taken up in Cambridge, and it is said Emmanuel Church has already promised £500.

The Protestant Reformation Society held a meeting in Cambridge last week, when their organizing secretary, Mr. W. Limbrick, spoke on Ritualistic manuals for English children.

The University Church Missionary Union has been addressed by Mr. John Jackson, of the Mission to Lepers in India and the East; and by Mr. Barbrooke Grubb, the pioneer missionary to the Gran Chaco, Paraguay (S.A.M.S.). Both meetings were well attended.

The last two Sundays; he University pulpit has been occupied by the Hulsean lecturer, Professor Mason. The first Sunday this term he dealt with "Invocation of Saints," and last Sunday he denounced the introduction of mediæval rites and ceremonies into the Church of England. Professor H. C. G. Moule is continuing this term his series of devotional addresses on doctrine, in Holy Trinity Church, on Monday evenings. Last Monday his subject was "Grace and Sacraments."

Public Morality.

THE London Council for the Promotion of Public Morality promises to occupy, with great usefulness, an important position in the life of the Metropolis. Its initial public gathering was held on the 1st inst. at St. Martin's Town Hall.

The Bishop of London, who presided, expressed the hope that the Society and the object it had before it would soon take deep root in public convictions. Those interested in the movement had taken great care and spent much time in thinking out the possible action the new Society should inaugurate. In dealing with the objects which they set before themselves he desired to avoid all exaggerated language. The first thing they had at heart was to do their work in a plain, practical, and business-like way, knowing what they were doing, and facing the problem exactly as it was. They recognised that, in the long run, in all attempts to benefit mankind they could only succeed if they were able to claim the sympathy and support of every right-thinking man who gave the subject any consideration. The desire they had chiefly before them was to cope with organized temptations to immorality. All they could hope to do was to see that men should have less temptations to vice than incitements to virtue. Their object was to see that no difficulty was placed in the way of any one who wished to keep to the path of virtue. They had to trust to the wisdom of experience, rather than the dreams of enthusiasm. They believed that the Society which they were founding would bring to light a great many things which were now carefully hidden; and they further believed that, when they were brought to the light, steadily, persistently, remorselessly, before that light they would perish. They had begun with a due sense of the responsibility which attached to them in making such a beginning; but they meant to go on steadily, until they had accomplished at least the result of compelling public opinion to consider a matter which was of the greatest importance to public welfare. A motion was subsequently carried: "That this meeting recognises the need for concerted effort to meet the organized immorality of London, welcomes the formation of this Council, and bespeaks for it the liberal and continued support of those who have at heart the social and moral well-being of London."

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

SIXTEENTH WEEK OF MEETINGS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

As new districts are entered with the Campaign work, fresh difficulties are encountered, but additional reasons for thanksgiving also come to light. At Tollcross the meetings were languishing, but after the evangelist had caused it to be widely intimated that Mr. J. R. McAusland (the Gospel tenor soloist) would sing, the largest hall in the district was crowded. When a children's mission was begun at Bishopbriggs, local workers ready to deal with the youthful inquirers were not numerous on the first two or three evenings; but it became manifest that the movement was of the Lord, and by Thursday many were asking what they could do to help. Here, too, the work spread from children who were blessed to their parents, and in some homes both generations are rejoicing in the Saviour. Last Monday Rev. J. T. C. Gullan called attention to the prejudice against Evangelical effort which appears to exist in the minds of a large number of the younger artisans of the city, and special prayer was asked that this barrier might be removed.

As Mr. McNeill goes from church to church on Sabbath mornings and afternoons, it is interesting to find buildings which are usually thinly attended filled to the extent of discomfort. A large proportion of the regular attenders are never seen at the evangelistic meetings, and so would not otherwise be easily reached with the trumpet call. But the preacher is ever welcomed and appreciated. His intimate acquaintance and deep love for the old Scottish Psalms and their music enables him to reach the hearts of many; and the exquisite pathos and unerring taste with which he uses the Lowland Doric in his preaching disarm any antagonism aroused by the directness of his appeals. One of the most touching features of these services is his yearning for the prayers of God's people on behalf of the evening meetings. His own estimate is that night after night, in Renfield Street Church, a thousand people have been gathered by 9.15, 900 of them being men averaging rather under than over thirty years of age. Church members are specially urged to invite careless neighbours and acquaintances to accompany them to St. Andrew's Hall on Sabbath evening, where the audience continues to fill the great building. Probably the influence of the Campaign meetings can be more adequately realized there than at any other centre. The very atmosphere seems to be filled with a spiritual thrill, and the large number of anxious inquirers at the close of each gathering is but a portion of the fruit reaped.

On the afternoon of Sabbath, January 28, Mr. McNeill was in the pulpit of his old fellow-student, Rev. Donald Cameron (Free St. Paul's); and the key-note of his mesage was, "Christ's Presence our Salvation, Individually and Collectively" (Mark iv. 35). A keen insight into the mind of the sacred writer was manifested, as he showed "what manner of Man" the Saviour was. Pointing out Jesus as the grandest Example of faith as well as the great Object of it, the closing appeal to the unsaved was one of great power.

"STONY GROUND."

At several of the centres of work during the past week we found the meetings comparatively small, and the audiences largely composed of workers and other Christian friends. In each case the surrounding district had been faithfully visited, and the people personally invited, while the open-air work was being done in a prayerful, earnest spirit; yet the people did not come in any great numbers. These "stony ground" places are much on the hearts of God's people in Glasgow, and they present a great opportunity for praying ones everywhere to join in intercession. It is noticeable that in such localities ministers and evangelists are making good use of the gatherings to give "straight talks" to the professing believers who attend. In one or two instances indeed the missions have almost assumed the appearance of Christian conventions; and there is promise of much good resulting in days to come.

The present territorial method of work is producing excellent results in different directions, but there are portions of the city area in which the local churches and missions are quite unable to do what is required. It becomes increasingly evident that after the present arrangements have been carried out there will be need for a second campaign, in which large bands of workers from all parts shall join hands in order to carry the Gospel to the sunken and sinking localities. May the Lord grant wisdom and grace that this may be done to the glory of his name!

RUTHERGLEN ROAD DISTRICT.

One of the stiffest experiences was in connection with the mission in Rutherglen Road district, held in Augustine Free Church. The locality is densely populated with working people, and very needy in a spiritual sense. Besides the difficulty already referred to among the younger men, there was a wide-spread apathy among people of all ages. During the first week the meetings were addressed by Rev. William Baird (United Presbyterian evangelist) and Rev. Jones S. Stewart (Strichen); while for the second week Rev. Matthew Dickie (Sanquhar) took the place of Rev. William M. Clow (Edinburgh).

The preaching was searching and faithful. Pastor (Rev. J. T. C. Gullan) and speakers were men of prayer, and we found them alike urging upon the people the need for much waiting upon God in connection with the work, frankly declaring that if the Church were set right there would be different results apparent. Mr. Dickie, although a substitute, spoke with the confidence of one assured of being sent by God with a message for some in the neighbourhood. Systematic door-to-door visitation was kept up in the surrounding streets, the minister taking the lead in this, as in other departments of the work. Crowds were wanting, yet the workers were encouraged and strengthened by what they saw of the goodness of the Lord, both at open-air and after meetings, among those who did attend.

REV. JAMES SMITH (COALSNAUGHTON).

After giving a much appreciated series of addresses at St. George's Cross Tabernacle, Rev. James Smith (Coalsnaughton) joined the body of Campaign workers a fortnight ago. His first mission was in Hood Memorial Congregational Church (Muslin Street), where there was a sweet season of refreshing, and both he and the local workers regretted that arrangements previously made compelled them to part after so short a time together. Last week he was located in East Campbell Street United Presbyterian Church (Rev. Dr. Shaw Stewart), the district surrounding which has proved to be another of the slowest in the city to move.

An earnest body of mission workers, led by their experienced missionary, are using every means to stir up the people round about, and by means of the open-air services the Gospel bell is being rung in the ears of very many. The indoor gatherings have been bright and interesting, while the preaching has been characterized by great force and directness. Running through the whole service was the evidence of a longing for earnest, believing prayer that "the mighty power of God may be manifested." On Tuesday evening the subject was the "Conversion of Saul," coupled with Matt. xviii. 3; and from many points of view the necessity and characteristics of the great change were vividly and lovingly pointed out.

Mr. John Anderson (assisted by the staff and students of the Bible Training Institute) is taking charge of a mission in New City Road Congregational Church (Rev. William S. Todd), but here again the response from the neighbourhood has not been hearty, though the meetings have been bright and interesting.

GOOD WORK AMONG SEAMEN.

Our hearts were much uplifted by a visit we paid on Thursday evening to the Seamen's Chapel, in Brown Street, Anderston, where Mr. James Macfarlane (evangelist) is labouring. After the preliminary prayer meeting, a procession was formed for a march eastward along Broomielaw, and a great crowd gathered round at once when a stand was made at Glasgow Bridge (Jamaica Street). A new start was being made with about a dozen lanterns—each composed of a light, square wooden frame, with white linen stretched round the outside, and bearing short texts and invitations painted on the sides—carried on the top of light poles, and the result was such that the number is to be increased as speedily as possible.

The evangelist expresses great gratitude for the loyal and efficient support of the local workers, led by Mr. John Morrison (chaplain), Mr. James Taylor (secretary), and Mr. Galbraith (librarian). The meetings have been well attended, and have been very cosmopolitan in character. Seafaring men of many nationalities, and of different creeds, are mixed with a sprinkling of residents in the neighbourhood; while the Holy Spirit is moving many hearts to the conviction of sin, and to salvation by faith. A German sailor had come to the city for one day only, but was caught in the Gospel net, and went away a new creature in Christ Jesus. A Highland woman who had been dealt with often before found the scales falling from her eyes as the Word was preached. One young man who had found his way in only on the evening before he was to sail for a long voyage, was led from darkness into light; and when he named his ship, a worker said the first mate had also visited the Institute earlier in the evening seeking help. Another man we met had been converted twenty years ago in the old Glasgow Bethel, but had fallen away through drink when far from Christian fellowship. He had been once more arrested at the open-air gathering, and restored to the peace and joy in believing which he had lost for so long. Several young people have given bright and clear testimony to what the Saviour has done for them.

Mr. Macfarlane has special qualifications for working among the classes here represented, his strong attitude on the drink question appealing to men specially exposed to that sin. The Gospel stories are presented with great eloquence and dramatic power. We heard him deal with the story of blind Bartimeus (Mark x.) in a fresh, original manner, using it as an illustration of the way to be saved, which, he said, corresponded to a window of a room, the purpose being to let in light. The key-note of this address, as of all the preaching, was that there is cleansing but no cure for sin. He insisted that all must come, like Bartimeus, without being able to see the way: the seeing being possible only after the coming.

A fine spirit was manifested in the after-meeting, and the Christian men and women present found much to do in talking with those who remained. Some who had been enlightened on previous evenings were present to tell of it; and the heartiness of the responses proved how near and how dear were the spiritual things.

The men being mainly strangers unacquainted with the city, have in many cases to be sought out and brought to the services individually. The Sailors' Home and the surrounding boarding houses are visited just before the meeting opens, all who are willing, or can be induced to come, being accompanied to the chapel; and men are being saved who have been brought in after this fashion. Those from Roman Catholic countries form the most difficult class to deal with. A French-Canadian whom we met was the subject of many prayers, and similar cases are met with every evening.

Ealing Home for Girls.

As London, in its ever widening area, encroaches further and further upon field and hedgerow, it absorbs from time to time old-fashioned mansions which in former days were delightful country homes. Such a building is the St. Mary's School for Girls at Ealing, one of the many useful institutions known as the National Refuges. Wonderfully changed, and added to, and modernized with wisdom and taste, the old mansion makes an ideal Home, cosy and comfortable, and at the same time a model of what sanitary science can accomplish.

The institution is notable for the all-round character of the instruction it affords. After passing through the school—which, by the way, is subject to the supervision of the Education Department—each girl undergoes a course of practical training in all departments of domestic duty. The snowy output of the laundry, the neatness of the house, and the excellence of the outfits made in the needlework room, bear witness to the soundness of the instruction given. In these days of a famine of reliable domestic servants, it may well be considered satisfactory that so many girls are grounded in the arts of successful "service." A is observable throughout the establishment, and habits of restraint and courtesy are inculcated; but, beyond that, one is reminded at every turn, by embossed texts, by printed words of pithy appeal and reminder, or by the sound of "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs," of the high aims of the institution. Scriptural instruction is given daily. Nor is there any lack of means for physical exercise. At the rear of the Home is a capacious asphalte playground, a play-room, and a wide expanse of lawn, in addition to a good kitchen garden, where an enterprising girl, appreciative of the modern movement in favour of women gardeners, may commence studies in the production of potato, carrot, or beet crops.

One of the most interesting incidents of a visit to St. Mary's Home is a glance at the great kitchen when a cooking lesson is being given. A batch of eighteen bright and cheery little lasses, white-aproned and sleeved, are standing at the temporary tables, their gleaming pile of utensils before them, each eagerly waiting the word to "fillet plaice," or "crack eggs." Presently they set briskly to work, and the result is subsequently seen in a well-prepared meal for all the children in the Home. These cookery lessons are given in a scientific style by a professional lady, who subsequently awards marks according to method, knowledge, and result, and explains any matters difficult to be understood.

The complete character of the education afforded enables the directors to observe the peculiar abilities of each girl, and to encourage her in choosing that for which she is best fitted. The majority, passing out into situations at the age of fifteen or sixteen, are usually placed with Christian families as undermaids. A careful oversight is, however, still given, in order that the girls may be helped to persevere in the ways of righteousness, and guided and advised in times of difficulty.

The girls are, as a rule, motherless; but kindly consideration is exercised in dealing with each case on its merits. There are a few children, for example, whose fathers still live; but in one instance the unfortunate parent has lost both hands as the result of an accident, and in another he is suffering from a terrible form of cancer. Other little ones, again, have been rescued from circumstances of grave moral danger; but all present an appearance and exhibit a quickness and thoroughness which reflect credit upon the institution. The call for their services is so great that for each trim young person who goes out there are ten or more applications. The responsibility of maintaining the various institutions in connection with the National Refuges is, of course, a heavy one. The Secretary is Mr. H. Bristow Wallen, 164, Shaftesbury Avenue, London, W.C.

A Clergyman's Conversion.

On Sunday week, at a meeting of men held in his church, Rev. E. Bacheler Russell, Vicar of Leyton, told the story of his conversion. Mr. Moody was the instrument in God's hand to deliver Mr. Russell from a worldly life, and to introduce him to the Saviour. Some 300 men listened to the story, which was told with great force and power. In the course of his narrative, the Vicar said:

"It was on March 12, 1875, that I was brought from darkness into the marvellous light and truth of the Gospel. Up to that time I had no idea that I was not what could really be called a Christian man. I was as ignorant of the simple plan of salvation and the Gospel message as a man could possibly be, though living in the midst of a Christian community, and in a Christian land. I had my racehorses; I spent a great deal of time at the card table, in the ball room, in the theatre. With shame I must say it, I began to gamble; I had a horse which carried everything before him, and consequently I was very much elated, and so lay on more and more, until the tide turned and

I LOST HEAVILY.

Then I was troubled. Just at that time a great deal was said in the daily papers about Mr. Moody and his work in Scotland. He was announced to be coming to London, and one day just before that time I came home from the racecourse weary, depressed, worn out. Everything had seemed to go wrong, and there in my room all alone I knelt down—you may think I was very foolish and very ignorant—I knelt down before a painting of my father, who passed away in my childhood, and I made a vow before him, and in the presence of God, that I would not go to another race meeting until I had asked Moody whether it was right for a Christian man to go to races.

"On the day when Moody was to hold his first meetings in the Agricultural Hall I was tempted to go to the theatre. I went, and never had such a miserable time in the theatre before. The next evening I went to the Agricultural Hall, and sat close to the platform. That night I listened to the message—I was not thinking much about it—and I heard the singing of the hymn by the gifted Mr. Sankey, "Come home, come home, O prodigal, come home." No doubt that had some effect upon my soul, but I did not go into the after-meeting that night. The following night I went again, and after the meeting went into the inquiry room—it was quite a new thing in those days, and I was one of the first to go. Very soon Mr. Moody came to me, and when I asked him whether he thought racing was wrong for a Christian man, he shook me by the hand—oh, such a grip, it seemed to come from the heart—and he said,

'ARE YOU A CHRISTIAN?'

If anyone had before implied that I was not a Christian I should not have liked it, and should have thought it very rude and impertinent. But I didn't with this man. For the first time in my life I realized I was not what he meant by a Christian. 'No,' I said, 'I am not,' 'Do you want to become one?' he said. 'Yes, I do.' 'Very well,' said Mr. Moody, and then he asked me to wait a few minutes whilst he spoke to someone else.

"After a while I was going away, like Naaman, in a rage, passing Mr. Moody, who was talking to two young men. Then he gave me another grip, which seemed to soothe me at once, and he said, 'Well, is it all right?' 'No,' I answered, 'it's not all right.' 'Oh,' he said, 'but you must not go away like that. Bring a chair, and sit down with us.' I did so, and speaking to us three young men, he said, 'There are three things that I want you to do—believe, receive, trust Jesus.' Afterwards we knelt down and he prayed. Then I went away, and as I didn't feel anything I thought it was not all right.

"That night I went back to my hotel, and I went right up to my room. I didn't want any food for the body, and in my room I prayed as well as I knew how, 'Lord, I believe, help Thou mine unbelief.' The next day I arose about ten and didn't want any breakfast. After a while I made my way to Mr. Moody's prayer meeting at Exeter Hall. Pale and ill-looking I know I was, and I sat near the platform, feeling absolutely miserable. I knew now I was wrong, but I longed with my whole soul to get right. Mr. Moody told the audience about his inquiry-room meeting the night before—how he was talking to two young men and a third came up to him. It was then, on the 12th day of March, 1875, that the light broke into my soul, and as I sat there, miserable up to that moment, I thought, 'What a fool, what an utter idiot, I have been. I have been praying, "Lord, I believe," and I never believed at all.' Here, now, for salvation and took it, and I believed God. And oh, the peace that came into my heart and soul in a moment. Oh! what a change! Mine was what is called a sudden conversion; but every man's conversion is a sudden conversion. One moment we are this side the line, and another we are that; there can be but one moment in passing over the line.

I PUT FORTH MY HAND

"I was a very happy man before; I don' believe any man was happier apart from Christ. Put me on the back of a good horse, and there was nobody happier than I was. Now in comparison it seemed as if I never knew what happiness was before. I went on the platform before all the people, and said to Mr. Moody, 'Do you remember me?' 'Why,' he said, 'you are one of the three young men I talked with last night. Is it all right now?' 'Yes,' I replied, 'it's all right now,' and he said, 'Thank God for it!'

"It was subsequently my great privilege, with Henry Drummond, afterwards Professor Henry Drummond, to take a part in young people's meetings. I want to say what I think was the secret of Moody's life and power. It was simply that he was a man who sought to live solely for the glory of God—'none of self and all of Him!' For twenty-four years, with many, many failures, I have followed Mr. Moody's Master, and the way grows brighter and brighter still."

Scottish Notes.

A CONFERENCE, under the auspices of the Lanarkshire Christian Union, was held at Cambuslang on the afternoon of Saturday, January 27. Subject, "The Glory of God." Mr. Hugh Macfarlane presided, and addresses were also given by Rev. J. Burleigh, Blantyre; Mr. John Colville, M.P., Motherwell; and Mr. Samuel R. Clark, of the China Inland Mission.

Mrs. Stirling Boyd reports that 2,093 children were sent last year to different country houses by means of the Edinburgh Children's Fortnightly Holiday Fund, being an increase of 145 on the numbers for the previous year. A gratifying feature in connection with this fund is the noticeable increase in contributions received from parents and others in charge of children, voluntarily offered in gratitude for the kindness experienced.

At the annual meeting of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association, held last week, some interesting figures were presented. The average attendance at the poor children's Sabbath dinner was 1,779; the number helped in day refuges, 446; total since the beginning in 1875, 11,447. Boys and girls to the number of 7,424 were sent to the country under the the Fresh Air Fortnight scheme, making 75,513 since 1885; while 3,800 more was sent for a day in the country, bringing the number of such treats to 27,782. The number helped through the Inquiry Committee and otherwise was 1,220, bringing the total during twenty-six years to 21,477.

The annual meeting of the Scottish Protestant Alliance was held in Glasgow on the evening before the great gathering in the Albert Hall. Mr. W. C. Maughan presided, and there was a good attendance of ministers and leading laymen. Resolutions were passed expressing approval of the efforts made in Parliament to stop the abuses of Ritualists in the Church of England.

*The Tale of a Cabbage.

MEG was born in a London slum, and lived in a cellar in one of those tall, tumbledown houses. You clattered down a flight of stone steps, which led into a totally dark passage, and pawed along a wall till you came to a crazy door, which opened into the awful place Meg called "home." There was a heap of rags in one corner of the room, a couple of orange boxes turned upside down, and a very rusty fire-grate, by way of furniture. Meg's mother had a hard fight trying to get food for her little family, who were always hungry because they never had enough to eat. Often and often there was no breakfast, nor dinner, nor tea; and Meg and the little ones would be forced to roam about the streets and fight with the dogs in the gutter, and round the costermongers' stalls, for stray pieces of crust and rotten fruit. These were hard times.

In good times Meg and her brothers and sisters had whole chunks of clean bread, and sometimes it was actually smeared over with dripping! But never, I am afraid, at the best of times, did they know what it was to have really as much as they could eat—except when they went to the farthing breakfasts in the winter at "th' Harmy."

But in the desert of Meg's life there was one little "oasis." It was up a narrow court and one of a row of houses.

Meg knew the exact hour to a minute when her funny little knock would open that door wide, and a smiling girl in a scarlet blouse and big apron would bid her "Come along, dear;" whereupon Meg would patter along after the slum captain into what she regarded as little less than fairyland.

Meg learned a great many things in her corner by the stove. She learned that behind the great doors which men call Death there is a wonderful, beautiful country, where people are never hungry, or thirsty, or cold, or sick, or miserable. She learned, too, about the Friend of the children—the Jesus who died that she might come into all this bliss. Perhaps if you paid a visit to those slums when self-denial week was near, you would think the people hadn't very much to deny themselves of. But the captain knew better, and so did little Meg. The meeting in which the captain explained her plans was a long one. What could she do, poor starved mite? And yet her whole heart and soul were in this effort.

Meg drew her rags closely round her and shivered as she left the warm hall. As she went scudding along the streets, swiftly and silently as a little rabbit, she passed a row of barrows, and one coster said to the other: "Look at that there poor little 'un; seems to me she's half starved."

"Ay," said the other; "how they lives puzzles me. Hey, Cis! take this!" and he pushed a flabby, faded cabbage into her hands.

Meg's eyes danced as she thanked the man! A whole cabbage; who'd ever have believed it! She'd had next to no food all day, and it was all she could do to keep from nibbling it there and then; only the thought of her hungry little brothers and sisters stopped her. Still, her mouth watered, and she ran faster than ever, hugging her precious vegetable tight.

Just before Meg reached her court she slackened her pace. She forgot that the wind was chill, and that she was famished and tired. Slower and slower she went, and at last she retreated into a dark doorway and stood lost in thought.

. . . . . .

The Captain and her Lieutenant were getting ready to go to bed. Just as they had taken up their bedroom candle, there was such a knocking and banging at the door!

"Whoever can it be at this time of night?" they said.

Both of them went to the door, and the Lieutenant held the candle while the Captain undid the bolts and let down the chain. The minute the door was opened in bounced Meg, panting and breathless.

"Oh, Captain!" cried Meg; "it's—it's—for Jesus, for the meetin'. I had to bring it now; couldn't take it home—we'd eat it sure, if I did," and Meg thrust the flabby wilted cabbage into the astonished Captain's hands.

Little by little the facts began to dawn upon the Slum Officers—facts which were verified next day by the costermonger. Oh, how the Captain hated to take that cabbage from Meg! But, as she looked into her happy, beaming face, she dared not refuse. It would have broken Meg's heart if she had.

"God bless you, dear!" she said, as she bade her good-night; "you are the first to give anything for the sale."

Somehow the story of that cabbage leaked out, and you may be sure something more tasty than a raw cabbage found its way to Meg's cellar before long. And one after another who had "nothing to give," and "nobody could expect them to give anything," changed their minds and brought along their offerings, and the amount raised in that corps was the wonder of all beholders. In one of the most conspicuous places was Meg's cabbage. It had been hard work keeping that vegetable alive for the occasion; but it had been done—to Meg's satisfactian at least. She beamed all through the meeting, and never had a longing for even one little nibble.

And the angels looking down from heaven saw it with Meg's eyes—to them it was the most beautiful thing there.

Personal.

C. J. BENNETT.—I am glad you have recommenced, and hope you will soon be quite well again. This quarter began with No. 209.

LINDSAY BROWNE.—Thank you for your note. I hope your brothers will like their new school. Perhaps, after they have settled down there, they will find time to begin again.

RUBY HORNE.—Yes, it has been indexed to your name.

MRS. ARBUTHNOT.—I am so sorry to hear about my little "nieces," Jean and Elizabeth, and trust they will soon be restored to health again. Please give them my love and good wishes for their speedy recovery.

MANSFIELD WHITE.—Yes, you may use ruled paper; it is better for you. You must always give the name of the book, chapter, and verse to all answers. OTHER "NIECES AND NEPHEWS" PLEASE TAKE NOTE.

ELSIE KNIGHT.—Some little time ago a new rule was inserted, that no papers would be counted correct that arrived later than Wednesday, and for Scotland and Ireland later than Thursday morning. That is why your name did not appear.

MARY COOTE.—I am sorry to hear of your loss.

JOAN DUNSFORD, IRIS (the Sun Dial), EVELYN WOOD, ELIZABETH AND EDNA PEART, VIOLET CONSTABLE.—I am glad to welcome you as new "Searchers," and trust the study will prove interesting and useful.

Christian Endeavour.

TOPIC FOR FEB. 11.

"Seek first the Kingdom of God" (Matt. xiii. 44-46).

THESE two parables unfold the double way in which souls are led into the full enjoyment of the life of God. Primarily they refer to the Jews, to whom Christ was then offering the Kingdom; but they are true universally. The difference between them consists in this, that the first man comes on the true life, as it were, suddenly and unexpectedly; whilst the other discovers its secret after prolonged and anxious search and comparison.

It is the custom in the East to bury treasure. In the absence of banks, there is no other way of preserving precious things from the hand of the spoiler. Whenever the foot of the invader treads the land, the inhabitants hasten to bury their valuables. If then they die, the clue to the buried treasure is lost. One day, a husbandman, driving his plough across a field, hears a chink. Its course is arrested and diverted. He hastens to the place, and to his great joy discovers coffers of golden coins, which bear the marks of considerable age. They are too heavy to carry away, and so, at any cost, though he sacrifice his all to obtain it, he purchases the field. Then at his leisure he exhumes his prize. No one can challenge his possession; many envy him.

So we are all called to drive the ploughshare of daily duty, scoring long furrows across the field. Each morning we start out to the inevitable duty. We plod on, expecting, anticipating, forecasting nothing. There comes a day, however, which is to date a new era with us. We seem to stumble across a character, a book, a letter, a voice of entreaty and invitation, which had never come to us before, which we had never expected for ourselves, which we had heard of as falling to the lot of others. But we suddenly realize that we are within touch of the greatest of all treasures. We hide the blessed discovery, concealing it in our secret soul, though, almost in spite of ourselves, our step is quicker and our laughter more contagious for very joy. We have found Jesus—nay, we have been found of Him. The early Disciples (John i.) and Saul of Tarsus (Acts ix.) are with marvellous accuracy. All sudden conversions, too, may be classed under this heading. But let us confess our joy, not hide it.

Some have thought that the merchantman seeking goodly pearls must be the Saviour Himself. The parable may be so rendered, but it is not the most obvious or natural interpretation. It is better to think that the soul of man is here represented seeking for the secret of blessedness. In other words, this parable is an exact epitome of the Book of Ecclesiastes, in which Solomon is the merchant in search of the chief good, endeavouring to discover it in any quarter which seemed likely to disclose it, and at last brought to the fear of God and obedience to his commandments.

Jesus is the pearl of great price. Pearls are the result of suffering, for we are told that each pearl is the effect of some wound which the oyster has received, or some grit of sand which has irritated it and been covered by a secretion of mother-of-pearl. It is through suffering that Jesus is what He is to us and to all men. Pearls are exquisitely pure. Their texture is so light and lovely that it seems worthy of the pure ocean depths where it was woven. They seem to be the concentrated of the purest, rarest quality. But what can rival the purity and beauty of our Saviour's character? Pearls are hidden to all, save those who seek for them. The great ships pass over the oyster-beds, unwitting of the priceless treasures which lie below; but the pearl-fishers moor their ship in one chosen spot, and let down the trained divers into the still, deep water, who return presently with their spoils. So Jesus is hidden from those who have no thought or desire for the best that life can bring. But when anyone is set on finding Him, He will be found of them. "They that seek Me early shall find Me." "He that seeketh, findeth."

There are many pearls in this world, but they are not perfect. Some flaw, some discolouration, some excrescence impairs their value and beauty. Jesus alone is the priceless pearl, with whom nothing can compare; to win whom, as St. Paul said, a man may well be prepared to risk the loss of all things, and to count them as dung. Have you found Him? What joy there was as Andrew said to Peter, and Philip to Nathanael, "We have found the Christ."

C. E. NOTES.

The Christian Endeavour Movement was nineteen years old on February 2.

Most earnest, enthusiastic meetings were held last week at Bristol in connection with Rev. F. B. Meyer's presidential visit. They were attended by the clergy and ministers of the neighbourhood, and in the evening Endeavourers crowded Broadmead Chapel to overflowing.

* * *

The Prison Committee at Raleigh, N.C., held a Christmas service in the State Prison. The prisoners themselves decorated the chapel. Christian Endeavour cards, with Christmas greetings on them, had been previously sent. Much tender feeling was manifested during the service.

Jesus at Jacob's Well (John iv. 5-26).

Golden Text (John iv. 24).

LAST week we studied a conversation between Jesus and Nicodemus, a Jew, a Pharisee, a man of high position; in a house, at night. To-day we listen to a conversation between Jesus and a sinful woman, a Samaritan, a woman from the common ranks, by the roadside, at midday. All things quite opposite except the subject of conversation; Jesus Christ was ever the Good Shepherd seeking lost sheep (v. 4; Luke xix. 5), and just as He tried to lead Nicodemus to accept everlasting life by showing him he must be born again, so now He tries to lead this poor sinful woman to accept everlasting life by drinking of the "Living Water," to be found only from Himself.

Key to Blackboard Plan.—The well and the water-pot suggest the whole incident. How much depends on that little word "If."

"If thou knewest the gift of God."

"If thou knewest who it is that saith to thee, etc." Verse 10. The big letter "W" divides the lesson up for our study.

The Weary Saviour (6).—This shows the true humanity of Christ, "He was weary": (Matt. viii. 24), "He was asleep"; (John xi. 35), "He Wept"; (John xix. 28), "He was thirsty"; (John xix. 28). He was true Messiah, too, though the woman did not know it (25, 26); (see also ix. 37, xviii. 5).

The Woman of Samaria (7, 9).—Explain about the Samaritans, how they were a sect despised by the Jews, had little religion, etc. (Acts x. 28). The Jews were very strict in this matter. (Turn back to introduction for what sort of woman she was).

The Well (5, 6, 12).—It was Jacob's well we are told (Gen. xxxiii. 18-20). It was probably about 100 feet "deep" (11); it is now dry. Hewn out of solid rock, the cool water would be most refreshing on a hot day. See the contrast Christ draws between Jacob's well and the "well of water springing up unto everlasting life" (14). Trace other "wells" in the Bible; the Jews obtained all their water from these sources (Gen. xvi. 14, xxi. 30; 2 Sam. xxiii. 15).

Verses 10, 13, 14. Water.—Turning aside from the woman's questions (verses 11, 12), Jesus takes the well and its water as a beautiful illustration of Himself as God's gift to men and as satisfying to every human soul—"shall never thirst" (Isa. lv. 1; Matt. v. 6). Shall we put it very simply.

GIFT of GOD GIVEN for the asking } Matt. vii. 7; 2 Cor. ix. 15; Eph. ii. 8.

There are three necessities for life, viz.: 1. Bread; 2. Water; 3. Light; and Jesus Christ is all three (chap. vi. 33, 35; iv. 10, viii. 12).

Verses 21, 24. Worship.—Before there can be true worship there must be sorrow for sin, and so Jesus has to bring to this woman's mind her past sinful life (verses 16-18), after which he proceeds to explain to her what worshipping God means.

Verses 20, 21. No mere form or ceremony can be accepted by God as worship. The place matters not either. The heart's adoration (verses 23, 24) is the only way to worship, be it in a barn or cathedral, on the sea or on the lonely common. The condition is "sincerity, true and genuine."

Note the word "Father" used by Christ (verses 21-23). For worship such as the Father cannot approve of see Isa. i. 11-15; Ezek. xxxiii. 31,32; Matt. vi. 5; xv. 8, 9.

Verses 13, 14. Whosoever. Golden text for last week, "Whosoever." Mr. Moody says: "You may write on every water pot of the world, 'Thirst again.'"

Trace the following:—Psa. xxxvi. 9; Jer. ii. 13; Ezek. xlvii. 9; Zech. xiii. 1; xiv. 8; Isa. xii. 3; xli. 17, 18; Rev. vii. 17; xxii. 17.

Lessons from the Weary Saviour.—That He knows how we feel when tired, thirsty, weary and troubled (Isa. liii. 3, 4).

Woman.—To talk often in prayer with Jesus, and He will satisfy us, and reveal Himself more and more to us (iv. 26).

Well.—The wells of earth will not quench soul-thirst; only the Well of Salvation can do that.

Water.—Jesus will not only put the well in our hearts, but He will make us overflow to help others (John vii. 37-39).

Worship.—When we go to God's house let us put aside everything, and with the heart's true love worship Him in spirit and in truth.

Whosoever.—This means you, me, and everybody else.

A Mission at Dr. Barnardo's.

AT the Boys' Homes, Mr. James B. Wookey had placed himself unreservedly at our disposal for the special evangelistic services of January, and proved God's messenger to many of the lads. Mr. Wookey's love for the souls of his hearers fitted him to win the ears and hearts of a somewhat critical and difficult congregation. That God enabled him to win the ears of all was evident to those who were present at the meetings, while there is abundant testimony coming in from all sides that many a heart was touched, and touched deeply, by the story of God's love in Christ. Sin was shown in its true character as directed against God, and as a violation of the Father's love. Its consequences in this life and the next were faithfully pointed out and driven home, but Mr. Wookey never failed to point to the Redeemer from sin's guilt and power.

I asked a lad, who came to see me before leaving for a situation, if he were a Christian. "Yes," he said, brightly. I rarely rest satisfied with an indefinite "yes," so asked further, "When did you give your heart to Christ?" The answer came at once, "Since Mr. Wookey's Mission began." "Which is the best; the old life or the new?" "Oh, the new!" said the lad, but with a ring in his tone which only experience can give and no one can simulate.

A number of letters, too, have reached us, showing that the writers were "troubled in spirit," while others took advantage of the opportunity given to have a private talk with the evangelist.

But perhaps the greatest sign of encouragement and cause for thankfulness is an evident change in the tone of the household. We are looking for greater things yet, and believe that a work has begun which, by God's grace will not cease.

W. H. Finney,
Chaplain of the Boys' Home.

At the Girls' Village Home, earnest prayer ascended that the Lord would send his servant, Mr. J. B. Wookey, to us in "the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel," and we have every reason to believe that our petitions were answered. The faithful message was listened to by the children of our Home with rapt attention. It awoke many careless ones, and stirred up God's true children to a closer walk with Him. We look confidently for the "increase" on the good seed sown in Christ's name.

Oliver W. Darling,
Chaplain of the Girls' Village Home.

With the Soldiers in South Africa.

THE secretary of the Soldiers' Christian Association, Mr. Arthur H. Wheeler, has reported to his committee on the work in South Africa. Having visited De Aar, Mr. Wheeler proceeded to Orange River, where Messrs. Davies and Heath were actively engaged in hospital visitation. "We soon erected a large tent, and from the moment it was up it has been thronged with men for reading and writing, and in the evenings for meetings. It is not too much to say that men are pressing into the Kingdom; there has not been a night without several distinct conversions to God, and backsliders being restored. After encouraging the brethren, I went on to Belmont, to confer with Dr. Barrie, who is stationed with the Canadian contingent.

"At Modder River I found Mr. Percy Huskisson, of the South African General Mission, and our branch secretary at Wynberg, doing a grand work, having secured an iron building for the purpose of a soldiers' home. I took the opportunity of visiting the Boer camp, and the site of the battle of Magersfontein. I could not help thinking of the many lads who had fallen who had taken part in our conventions at Exeter Hall. Among them was Colour-serjeant McMillan of the Black Watch (who spoke last year in the afternoon). When his officers were cut down, he called out:—'Men of A Company, prepare to meet your God. Forward, charge!' Then he himself fell mortally wounded, and died singing hymns. On the way to Enslin I passed many smaller camps, promising boxes of literature, for which the officers commanding were devoutly thankful, as they had nothing to read."

Mr. Wheeler gives very favourable accounts of the progress of the various agencies at other centres, and also mentions the exceedingly sympathetic attitude of the officers towards the work, and their readiness to help in every possible way.

Appeals are being received for additional tents for the use of the workers, which, however, cannot be responded to on account of the lack of funds. Communications for the Soldiers' Christian Association should be addressed to the office, Exeter Hall, Strand, London.

"AT MODDER RIVER."

A booklet under this title, issued by the South African General Mission, contains some striking incidents in connection with the work of the Society's agents after that memorable engagement. The opportunities for service are, as a matter of course, particularly numerous on such occasions, and readers of this little book will follow, with mingled feelings of pleasure and pain, the movements of those who minister to the sick and dying in their hour of need. (1d. Arthur Mercer, 17, Homefield Road, Wimbledon, S.W.)

GIFTS FOR THE SOLDIERS.

In view of the numerous useful gifts which are being made by thoughtful friends of the soldiers, a suggestion by Miss E. Stewart Sandeman, 11, Boulevard Carnot, Cannes, Alpes Maritimes, France, is worthy of consideration. Miss Sandeman says; "I have found it a good plan to embroider neatly on a strip of silk some short and earnest words, such as 'God guard you,' and sew it in the inside of the tam-o'-shanter. Known to the wearer, it is hidden from the casual glance, as anything public and hackneyed in such things is apt to do harm rather than good." Workers at Soldiers' Homes will gladly direct efforts in this line.

Services for Men.—The men's services conducted at St. Peter's, Highgate, by Rev. A. H. Hart, are a potent factor in the religious life of North London. The annual report which has just been issued, shows that the interest taken in the services is unabated, the average attendance being about 500. The mission work carried on among bricklayers, masons, carpenters, and labourers has also been blessed. A service is held in their canteen, close to some great buildings which they are erecting. From various sources the workers have heard of homes made happy through the agency of the mission. Mr. Hart's address is 4, Hargrave Park, Upper Holloway, N.

About Books.

THREE MINISTERS.

BIOGRAPHIES of three ministers are before us. Though varied in temperament, these good men were harmonious in spirit, and each exercised a noble influence in his particular sphere.

First comes Josiah Viney: A Record of his Life and Work. By Henry Johnson (5s. Elliot Stock). It is the story of a man content to render a quiet service, but indefatigable in the discharge of the same. In the words of his friend, Rev. R. Lovett, who writes a brief preface, the book is "an example of wholehearted consecration to the service of men out of love to Christ, and a stimulus in the pathway of daily unassuming devotion to those duties which lie close to the hand of every one of us." In this we heartily agree. A native of London, Mr. Viney held several pastorates in the Congregational body, being esteemed by his brethren in the ministry, and beloved by his flocks. His memory is blessed in Herne Bay, Bethnal Green, and Highgate. During later years of his life, he did a most important work as treasurer of the Congregational Schools at Caterham. He will not soon be forgotten by those who knew him as a man and a Christian. This volume, with its excellent portrait and other illustrations, is a welcome monument of one who was privileged to exercise the ministry for fifty-six years, and who testified on his eightieth birthday—"A life spent in the service of Christ is the happiest life upon earth."

Next comes a larger book—Charles A. Berry, D.D.: A Memoir. By James S. Drummond, his fellow-student and co-pastor. (6s. Cassell & Co.) The story of the Lancashire lad who achieved such fame as a preacher that he was invited to succeed Ward Beecher as minister of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, U.S.A., has often been told; but here we have it in reasonable fulness, written at the request of Mrs. Berry and with her personal assistance. The narrative shows us the persevering youth, the student of whom a distinguished career was early predicted, and the minister who willingly spent himself in the cause to which he devoted his life. At Bolton and at Wolverhampton he did an all-round work; and as the years sped by he became much in request for platform and pulpit service throughout the Congregational denomination and beyond. He laboured with zeal in the interest of Free Church Federation, and was the recipient of academical and ecclesiastical honours in recognition of his talents and labours. Long life was hardly consistent with such strenuous endeavour, and, as is well in memory, death robbed the Church of this worker just a year ago, at the early age of forty-seven. Inability to agree with all the sayings and doings of the man must not stand in the way of hearty acknowledgement of his industry and devotion in Christian life and work. The volume contains a striking portrait, also appreciations by Drs. A. M. Fairbairn and J. Guinness Rogers.

The most substantial book of the three is Alexander Moody Stuart, D.D.: A Memoir, Partly Autobiographical. By his Son, Kenneth Moody Stuart, M.A., Moffat. (6s. Hodder & Stoughton). The fine photogravure frontispiece affords an admirable idea of the subject in his maturer years. Combining intellectual strength with a gentle disposition, Dr. Moody Stuart was an exemplary Gospel minister. He was a native of Paisley, and died in 1898, at the advanced age of eighty-nine. He will long be remembered with affection for his pastoral labours in Holy Island and Edinburgh, also for his efforts in promoting the Jewish Mission of the Free Church of Scotland, and in helping the cause of the Gospel in Hungary and Bohemia. He celebrated the diamond jubilee of his much-blessed ministry in 1897. The narrative before us is compiled with much skill, and its substance is as rich as its style is attractive. Here we have recollections of McCheyne and the Bonars, of Duncan Matheson and Peter Jackson; and those who knew these worthies will revel in the pages that tell the story of one who was like them all in heart and mind. Dr. Moody Stuart was pre-eminently a man of prayer, and precept and example are beautifully associated in the story and teachings of the book. The letters, devotional diary, and selected sayings breathe the spirit of the classic memoirs of McCheyne and Andrew Bonar. Strong in the advocacy of truth, and withal gracious in controversy, Dr. Moody Stuart rendered a great service to his generation by his addresses and writings, and it was witnessed of him that "his life was a living one to those who sat under his ministry." There are several illustrations besides the portrait.

STORY BOOKS.

SOME of the very readable short stories contributed by the late Talbot Baines Reed to the Boy's Own Paper are published in book form for the first time in Parkhurst Sketches and other Stories. (2s. 6d. Religious Tract Society.) "Boys we have Known" and "Boys of English History" are included; and both these are useful as well as interesting.

Out in Life's Rain, by Mary E. Mann, illustrates the folly of pursuing a vain ambition. The chief character was a workhouse girl. Adopted by a good clergyman, she did not know when she was well off. She listened to the enticements of a worthless father, and suffered much through his wickedness and her own ingratitude. A well-constructed and impressive story. (Hutchinson & Co.)

The name of the author is a sufficient indication of the lively character of A Captain of Irregulars (5s. Nelsons). The writing is in Herbert Hayens's best style; and the illustrations are by Sydney Paget. The scene is laid in Chili, in the second decade of the century. Needless to say, the "irregulars" were engaged in securing the independence of Chili from the yoke of Spain.

Dr. Gordon Stables writes a stirring tale with the title Kidnapped by Cannibals (3s. 6d. Blackie & Son). Leaving home under a sense of wrong, a Scotch lad takes to the sea. There is a mutiny on board the ship, and, with others, Willie Stuart is cast upon an island in the South Seas. Why and how, with attendant experiences and subsequent adventures, furnish the warp and woof of a story that will rank among the author's best.

Marget at the Manse, by Ethel T. Heddle, is a volume of Scottish tales, which owe much of their point and interest to a worthy housekeeper, of whom the bachelor "meenister" of Pitcurbie says: "There was no spite about Marget, and her gossip was never ill-natured; only, the shadow of humbug and deceit always aroused her deepest ire." The stories, nineteen in number, are alternately grave and gay, and the humour, combined with good sense, comes out well in the Scottish dialect. There are illustrations drawn by Gordon Browne. (6s. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.)

The Three Homes: A Tale for Fathers and Sons, by Dean Farrar, is now in its thirty-first thousand. Whether light stories or erudite discussions, the works of this eloquent and resourceful writer are sure of a wide circle of readers. The vitality of this story, however, does not depend upon its authorship, for it was (for reasons given in the preface) originally issued under a pseudonym. For the past few years it has stood in the list of Dean Farrar's works, and it is well worthy of commendation for its intrinsic interest and the useful lessons which it inculcates. (Cassell & Co.).

The February number of National Righteousness contains a portion of a striking letter relating to the Opium Question, written in the year 1882 by the late General Sir Arthur Cotton, K.C.S.I., together with a portrait of that valued and esteemed officer. (1d. Morgan & Scott.)

Out of the Shadow Land. This song, which was specially composed by Ira D. Sankey, and sung by him at the D. L. Moody Memorial Service, and which appeared in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN, is now published in both old notation and tonic sol-fa. (2s. 6d. per 100, or 6d. per dozen. Morgan & Scott.)

A specially attractive publication, by the Early English Text Society, is The Pilgrimage of the Life of Man, "Englisht by John Lydgate, A.D. 1426, from the French of Guillaume de Deguileville, A.D. 1335. Edited from three fifteenth-century MSS. in the British Museum, by Dr. F. J. Furnivall." The first part of this singular work forms Vol. LXXVII. in the Extra Series. The chief interest of Lydgate's poem lies in its supposed relation to Bunyan's well-known allegory; and Dr. Furnivall expresses the prevailing judgment that this "pilgrimage" had not to do with "The Pilgrim's Progress." (10s. Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.)

A book with a soul is Enlisted; or, My Story. It is from the pen of Elise Sandes, and embodies incidents of life and work among soldiers. Imaginative stories may have their interest, but this true tale holds you because of its spiritual origination and significance. The pages outline a life of service at once strenuous and noble; faith and works in holy combination form the substance of the narrative. Here we have the history of Christian devotion in the establishment and direction of Soldiers' Homes. The book is in its second edition, which includes chapters about the work in India. We bespeak for the pages a still wider circle of readers. There are portraits and several other illustrations. (Paper, 1s., cloth, 2s. Cork, Soldiers' Home; London, Partridge & Co.)

Obituary.

MAJOR A. W. COCKBURN.

THE death is announced of Major Alexander William Cockburn, late Royal Engineers, who passed away last week at his residence at Blackheath, aged forty-eight. A devoted Christian, he gave, while in India, addresses and Bible readings which were blessed to many, but of late his health had prevented him from taking an active part in his Master's service. The memory of his saintly character will long be prized by a wide circle of friends.

REV. DR. NIXON.

The death of Rev. Dr. William Nixon removes the oldest minister of the Free Church of Scotland, or indeed, it is believed, of any of the Evangelical denominations. Dr. Nixon was well known for his long connection with Montrose, and he could well recall the Disruption period, when he came out with almost all his congregation. He was Moderator of the Free Church in 1868, and was the oldest Moderator. Dr. Nixon was an able debater, and when he was well above eighty he showed great vigour in his speeches in the Free Assembly against the idea of tolerating the Higher Criticism in the Free Church. In his nonogenarian days he still possessed much vivacity, and was generally able to attend one of the Sabbath services at Burntisland, walking nearly a mile to the church.

REV. WILLIAM BIRCH.

The news of the death of Pastor William Birch, which occurred in Jersey on January 22, will at once recall to many some fragrant memories of the deceased worker's labours at the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, where for years he preached weekly to the second largest congregation in England, the Metropolitan Tabernacle being the largest. His style of preaching was earnest, homely, and affectionate. Subsequently he left Manchester for New Zealand, and was pastor for some years of various churches in Australasia. A few years ago, when his health failed, he settled in Jersey, where a mild climate seemed, for a season, to promise renewed health. On Sunday, January 28, a memorial service was held in the Free Trade Hall, Rev. George H. McNeal preaching to a crowded congregation from Num. xi. 29: "Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets." Hundreds of Mr. Birch's old congregation were present, and many who had passed through his Orphanage.

SIR THOMAS GRAINGER STEWART.

By the death of Sir Thos. Grainger Stewart on February 3, Edinburgh has lost not only one of her famous physicians, but a well-known Christian leader. An elder at Free St. George's Church, presided over by Dr. Alexander Whyte and Rev. Hugh Black, he was always ready to assist any movement which aimed at evangelizing the city. Sir Thomas had to resign his classes about a year ago owing to illness, and lately all hope of his ultimate recovery was abandoned. He was only sixty-two, but his career was full of distinction, reaching a climax in 1898 with the honour of being president of the British Medical Congress.

Sir Thomas had a deep interest in foreign missions, and was an enthusiastic supporter of the student movement. In the world of medicine he was an important personality, and attained to the Presidency of the Royal College of Physicians in 1890. He was Physician in Ordinary to the Queen for Scotland. Apart from his many contributions to medical journals, Sir Thomas contributed some most interesting articles to the Free Church Monthly. He was intensely loyal to the Free Church of Scotland, and she has lost by his death a wise counsellor. Of a gracious and kindly character, Sir Thomas will be missed for many a day by his friends in Scotland, and by the wide circle of medical men who have in past years attended his lectures.

The Churches.

 The Editor will be glad to receive "post-card" notes for this page, of SPIRITUAL PROGRESS AND EFFORT in the Churches. They must be prompt, reliable, and NOT TRIVIALITIES; and be accompanied by sender's name and address.

Church of England.

In conjunction with the Archbishop of Capetown and the military authorities, the Church Army is arranging for a number of experienced evangelists to proceed to the front in South Africa, for the purpose of assisting the military chaplains among the troops and in the hospitals.

The Bishop of Ripon is reported to be suffering from a severe attack of influenza, which has rendered him very weak. Though he is now improving, he is still confined to his bed, and his medical advisers state that some weeks must elapse before he will be able to resume his public duties.

At the annual meeting of the subscribers to the Manx Clergy Sustentation Fund, the Bishop of Sodor and Man announced that the movement had during the past year produced £530, which had been of considerable assistance in augmenting the stipends of the poorer beneficed clergymen in the Isle of Man.

Rev. W. Odom, vicar of Heeley, Sheffield, gives some interesting parochial facts and figures in connection with his work. "During 1899 the baptisms numbered 486, the parish magazine reached a circulation of nearly 14,000, and the attendances at communion numbered 1,853, the largest in the history of the church."

The Pioneer Tent Missions which are being conducted by Church Army Missioners in the slums of the metropolis, and the large provincial towns, are meeting with encouragement. At one of these missions the work was interrupted by a gang of roughs who invaded the tent, but before the close these same young fellows were among the most attentive, and at the conclusion they went in a body to the vicar and asked him to start a Bible Class that they might attend. Fifteen of them had not been inside a church for over ten years

Congregational.

Mansfield College Council has appointed Mr. Frank Lenwood, B.A., the present senior student of the College, to a lectureship in the New Testament. In addition to his regular teaching, Mr. Lenwood will exercise to a certain extent the function of University pastor, and will in various ways endeavour to serve the best interests of the Free Church students of the University.

It has been suggested that the establishment of a scholarship at Mansfield College, Oxford, which should be open to candidates from all the Free Churches of the country without any regard to denomination, would be a fitting way of honouring the memory of the late Rev. Dr. Berry. A committee has been formed and promises of generous contributions have already been made which justify the hope that such a proposal would command such a large amount of sympathy as to make its success certain. It is calculated that the amount required will be £1,600. Mr. Geo. Cadbury is hon. treasurer, and the hon. secretary is Mr. James Rutherford, Corporation Street, Birmingham.

Baptist.

The annual meeting of the church at Teignmouth and Shaldon (Rev. S. J. Thorpe) was cheered by interesting accounts of progress in various departments of work. The church is in a flourishing condition.

Pastor W. Carey Sage, M.A., B.D., of Duffield, who is president of the Belper Free Church Council this year, has started a united local preachers' theological class, attended by members of all the Evangelical Free Churches. The class meets twice a week.

At the annual meeting of the church at Worthing, the pastor, Rev. A. W. Leighton Barker, presided, and the reports showed that considerable progress had been made. For missions, Sunday schools, and other objects between £200 and £300 had been raised. Thirty new members have been added to the fellowship during 1899.

In connection with the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of the late Pastor Oncken, of Hamburg, who accomplished such a valuable work on behalf of the Baptist churches in Germany and adjacent countries, a denominational demonstration of the various churches of Hamburg is to be held, at which addresses on Baptist principles and doctrines are to be given.

At the Rochester Church (Rev. G. Anderson Miller) the missionary anniversary was celebrated on Sunday, January 28, when sermons were preached by Rev. J. H. Anderson (from India), deputation from the Baptist Missionary Society. On the following evening a public meeting was held, Councillor S. J. Hart presiding. The services were of an inspiring character.

In connection with a recent gathering in connection with the Baptist Deaconesses' Home and Mission, Doughty Street, London, John Street Chapel schoolroom was crowded with the poor people of the slums, who accepted the invitation of the sisters to a tea and meeting. At the meeting Mr. Larment, of Forest Gate, and Mrs. Smetham, of Stoke Newington, sang and gave addresses. Kindly words were spoken by the Sisters Constance, May, Lizzie, Annie, and Hilda. After the meeting useful garments were distributed, with a text almanac, to all the guests. It was a remarkable demonstration of the good work being done—a work only limited for want of more means.

At Major Road, Stratford, E. (Rev. W. Knight Chaplin) a piece of land adjoining the chapel has been acquired for the erection of new Sunday schools and lecture hall, and for the enlargement of the church. Foundation-stones were laid on the 30th ult. by the Mayor of West Ham, and Mr. Henry Wood, J.P., treasurer of the Baptist Union. An address was delivered by Rev. John Bradford, president of the London Baptist Association. In the evening Mr. H. J. Cook, J.P., presided over an enthusiastic public meeting. The inauguration of this extension work, in a densely populated artisan district, has been attended with much encouragement to the workers. An eight days' mission, conducted last month by the pastor, resulted in great blessing to the church and congregation.

Methodist.

In the Queen's Bench Division, the widow of Rev. G. W. Clutterbuck has been awarded £2,600 for the loss of her husband in the Stella. She also was awarded £250 for her eldest son, £400 for her second son, £250 for her daughter, and £40 for personal effects lost in the Stella.

An important scheme of church extension is to be proposed to the Primitive Methodist Connexion. It will aim chiefly at opening up new centres in London, meeting the growth of large provincial towns, and the erection of new churches in the growing watering-places. An income of at least £10,000 a year will be needed for this special work.

Presbyterian.

The Queen has sent a contribution of £200 towards the "Smaller Livings Fund," in connection with the Established Church of Scotland.

At the annual meeting of Somers Town Church, Rev. Z. B. Woffendale, who presided, gave an earnest and encouraging address, in which he stated that sixty-three new members had been added to the church roll during the year, and that the membership was now 500. He rejoiced that the various agencies connected with the church had been satisfactorily maintained, and that a good testimony had been borne in Somers Town for Christian truth and living.

The Presbytery of Manchester recently held a conference with the office-bearers of the congregations within its bounds on the home-mission and church extension work of the Presbytery. Rev. J. H. Scott said that the Presbytery, he thought, might well do more than it had done to develop the evangelistic spirit and to utilize the gifts of men and women fitted for and aspiring after evangelistic effort. He suggested that Ancoats should be made the centre of home-mission effort.

Society of Friends.

Francisco G. Cala, of Cuba, who was brought up in the Roman Catholic Church and became a licentiate, has been greatly impressed by reading Murray's Life of George Fox, and has, with some three hundred followers, constituted a Cuban Society of Friends.

Sussex, Surrey, and Hants quarterly meeting was attended by a deputation from the Home Mission Committee. The object of the deputation was to stimulate effort for building up the Society and for the extension of the Redeemer's Kingdom.

Friends in Canterbury have had a very acceptable visit from William Hobson and Sarah Bell, who have taken part in a series of special meetings. William Hobson closed the mission with a lecture on William Penn. Bible readings each afternoon and Gospel meetings each evening were held, and the ministry of these Friends proved a great help.

William Noble has held a series of meetings in the Meeting-house at Reading. Bible readings were held each afternoon, and Gospel meetings in the evening. The attendance has not been large, partly in consequence of the prevailing illness. Those who have been present can thankfully acknowledge that the meetings have been owned and blessed by the Lord.

Arthur Dann has been liberated by Lewes and Chichester Monthly Meeting to hold a series of meetings for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of believers in places where aggressive work is carried on in Friends' Meeting-houses in Great Britain and Ireland. His concern extends to paying family visits in some places, and uniting with other friends in religious conferences.

An effort has been made to obtain the release of those Dukhobors who were exiled to Siberia—about 110 in number—before the emigration was permitted. A memorial to the Tzar, praying for their liberation, was adopted by the Meeting for Sufferings, and was taken to Petersburg by two Friends. Though no intimation was given that the prayer of the memorial would be acceded to, the deputation entertains the hope that their efforts will not have been altogether in vain, and that the exiles may yet be permitted to join their friends in Canada.

Fallen Asleep.

Miss TAIT, daughter of the late Rev. H. Tait, headmaster of Rossall Preparatory School, expired on January 28 in Rossall Church while kneeling at prayer. Her father preached in the same church a fortnight previously, and a few hours later was found dead on the sea beach.—The Baptist Church at Harlesden mourns the loss of Mr. A. MEIKLEJOHN, the senior deacon and treasurer of the church from its formation.—Rev. C. SNELL, rector of Oulton, near Lowestoft, aged seventy-seven.—Rev. A. C. TRACY, rector of Gunton, near Lowestoft, aged seventy.—Rev. J. B. WILLIAMS, rector of Pulford, Cheshire. He was appointed rector of Hendsor, Buckinghamshire, in 1860, and had been rector of Pulford since 1870.—Rev. F. J. PARKINSON, incumbent of St. Athanasius, Liverpool. He was a true evangelical, and stout upholder of Protestant principles. His message was always the message of the Gospel, and his one desire was to preach "Jesus Christ and Him crucified."—Mr. JAMES HAMPTON, founder and superintendent of Hampton's Mission for the Blind, Webber Row, London, S.E. He devotedly laboured for thirty years among the poor blind.—Rev. ISAAC THOMAS, of Landore, Swansea, ex-president of the Baptist Union of Wales. Mr. Thomas occupied a very prominent position in the Welsh Baptist ministry.—In her ninetieth year, Mrs. ELIZABETH PARKER, mother of the late Miss Emma Parker, evangelist.—At Clevedon, Mr. JOHN CORDEUX, on January 28, aged 73. He was an earnest helper at Copse Road Chapel, and has for years supported a small mission room in connection therewith.

Notices.

A correspondent would like to know where to find a hymn beginning, "I shine in the light of my God." The concluding verse begins, "Do I forget? Oh, no!"

Appeal.

READING FOR THE BLIND.—Mrs. T. Macknight, writing from Latira, Las Palmas, Canary Island, says: "Several blind people are here in an entirely neglected condition. I should be glad of a blind-type Bible to teach some of them to read, if friends were kind enough to think of this."

Mr. George Holland.—We regret to hear that during recent days the condition of Mr. George Holland, the esteemed founder of George Yard Mission, has given serious cause for anxiety to his many friends. The latest news is of a grave character, Mr. Holland being in a very weak state.

Notes & Comments

THE popular Life of D. L. Moody is now ready. It is a compact little work, designed to satisfy for the moment the deep interest in the departed evangelist and his career. (Tinted covers, 1d.; Cloth, with eight illustrations, 1s. Morgan & Scott.) Having been prepared by members of the family, it is "authorized." Stories and incidents that have appeared from time to time in garbled form, and with an admixture of fable more or less attractive, are here given in their true light and setting. The monumental biography will, of course, take some time to write; of that we hope to give particulars in due course.

The movement for observing February 28 (Ash Wednesday) as "a day of humiliation before the Lord, remembering the national sins of drunkenness, gambling, covetousness, and disregard of God's law," continues to increase in force and extent. The list of those who have signified their adhesion includes many prominent and familiar names. Churchmen and Nonconformists unite in this important matter, in accordance with the suggestion that all servants of the Lord should combine to "seek a right way" for our nation. Those wishing to join are invited to communicate with "Humiliation," Conference Hall, Eccleston Street, S.W.

It is well to cry to God for our nation in this time of national need; but as the empire is made up of units, the time is especially one for the humble and heart-felt confession of individual sins and shortcomings. The national failures before God are due to the omissions of the individual to confess Christ day by day, to our own lapses into unrighteousness. Only as the citizen fully accepts his responsibilities in regard to the extension of Christ's kingdom upon earth, can the State become a righteous and God-fearing one, carrying his name to the ends of the earth.

One effect of the war has been to create activity among many women in the upper classes on behalf of kindly sympathy. A result which is curiously interesting is the great sale of knitting needles among many people who ordinarily do very little of this kind of useful labour. This may be cited as one of the redeeming effects of war, that it awakens benevolence in many directions.

It is unfortunately impossible to foretell when this distressing and tragic war will be over, but it is not too early to do something to educate the public on the question of the native races in South Africa, so that, when the final settlement takes place, their interests may be safeguarded. The Aborigines Protection Society is preparing the way for this, and an appeal is to be made to Lord Salisbury to fulfil his promise that, as one result of these hostilities, due precaution shall be taken for securing justice to the coloured people, "of whose destiny," as he has said, "I fear we have been too forgetful." The legal status of the native, his education and religious training, his social position, his chances of advancement in life—these are all matters that need careful study and statesmanlike and humane treatment. They constitute the problem of the future in South Africa, perhaps more than the relations of the Boer and Briton.

The Church Times is forward in announcing that "the Church" must bestir herself for future work in South Africa; and, in doing so, points out some things that require amendment. For example—

> The missionary in South Africa is everywhere confronted by the refusal and reluctance of the white to worship with the coloured people. It is, indeed, most happily true that here and there the problem finds a partial solution. In Capetown Cathedral, children of every hue attend the children's services; at a church of the Cowley Fathers' Mission racial difficulty is unknown. But elsewhere the white will indignantly leave the church which the coloured man presumes to enter.

Evidently the equal treatment of the races, of which we have heard much of late, is more a beautiful theory at home than an honoured practice abroad. The subject is a large one, involving as many coloured people as there were slaves in America at the time of the war; and we are sure that God will not let it slip into obscurity.

A correspondent writes saying that she has noticed a disposition, among those who were last year concerned about the Church crisis, to lessen their interest in ecclesiastical matters, owing to the absorbing attention they are devoting to the war. We think this attitude is decidedly wrong. While the political situation calls for our prayers, there is no reason to cool our ardour on behalf of the great movement which aims at restoring the Protestant character to the Church of England. It will be playing into the hands of the party which has already achieved so much success, owing to lukewarm opposition, if we relinquish the battle for truth and Evangelical faith. While Christian people are much divided in opinion as to the war, all Evangelical believers are, we believe, unanimous in desiring the abolition from our churches of those forms and ceremonies which are opposed to the simple faith once delivered to the saints. The Ritualistic party will be only aided in their dangerous work if our prayers and sympathies are diverted by the national calamity from the channel of earnest support of the Protestant position.

We are sorry to notice a growing tendency to use Scriptural phrases in political controversy. A member who addressed the House of Commons last week was a deliberate offender in this direction. He turned into ridicule certain Biblical incidents in so amusing a way that the House laughed loudly at what was, nevertheless, most reprehensible and blasphemous. Again and again the expression that a politician has "found salvation" is used in a debate—the idea being that he has become changed in his view of a policy. We think it would be well for all Christian members of Parliament—and we rejoice at their large preponderance—to set themselves strongly against this habit of importing phrases and incidents of a sacred nature into parliamentary and platform oratory. Much of the lessened honour paid to God's Word nowadays is due to the familiar way in which it has been used for supplying novels and plays with titles, and speeches and newspapers with catching phrases.

The death of Sir Wm. Wilson Hunter, at the age of sixty, has deprived us of a valuable public servant who had a real love of the natives of India, among whom he dwelt for several years. His story, "The Old Missionary," was read by many who would not ordinarily peruse missionary literature. One recalls how, like another distinguished servant of the Crown, Sir Stamford Raffles, Sir William Hunter lost by shipwreck very valuable data and literary material which were to have assisted him in the writing of a History of British India. The result of twenty years of industrious collection was swept away into the sea, and it was ten years before the first volume was ready, owing to the double labour involved in its preparation.

Mr. George Cadbury seems to have initiated an excellent scheme at Bourneville, near Birmingham, for drawing men away from large towns, giving them an interest in the land, and preventing congestion of population. To an interviewer he said:—

> I am practically handing over the estate to trustees, and the whole income is to be devoted to developing the estate. This will mean £5,000 a year, and I presume in twenty years it will be worth £200,000. Anybody who likes to come out of Birmingham will benefit. It is not intended specially for my work-people.

The project resembles the Peabody Estate scheme, save that land is given instead of money. The houses are not to exceed six to the acre, each must be two storeys high, and the buildings must not occupy more than one-fifth of the entire space. The estate will have to pay 4 per cent. Should it succeed, as we trust it will, there will be an excellent example set for other men of means to follow. If we are getting a plethora of millionaires, there never were such opportunities for the wise and useful employment of large sums of money.

The establishment of the Council for the Promotion of Public Morality in London, which has just been initiated, is a movement in the right direction. In recent times the efforts made to raise the general tone of morals, and to deal with flagrantly immoral forms of amusement, and haunts of vice, have been hampered both by divided aims and by an occasional lack of statesmanship in the leaders. If this Council succeeds in uniting the fragmentary forces of reform, and in bringing all enthusiasts into the line of practical progress, it is possible that great results will soon be manifest. The lamentable effects of scattering effective forces have been only too evident in the conduct of the South African campaign: it will be well if we can learn the lesson in fighting the organized resources of immorality and vice. Concentration, patience, unfaltering faith, combined with sound tactics, are sure to win at last.

Sunday closing, in the opinion of Mr. F. Maddison, M.P., should be more prominently pressed as a measure of justice to overworked employés in "the trade." It has always received some attention on that ground, but Mr. Maddison contends further that Sabbatarianism does not exhaust the case for Sunday closing. "The trade," alarmed at the thought of this first day being made a "dies non" for their business, urge that it would mean less wages for the worker. The hours average ninety a week now, the wages are poor, and the work dangerous. Seeing that publicans enjoy their monopoly by Act of Parliament, is it not time for trade unionism to tackle the scandal of over-work? Meanwhile, let those who also have at heart the sanctity of the Lord's Day relax no effort.

The Memorials of Hugh M. Matheson, edited by his wife (6s. Hodder & Stoughton), is a volume which young and old may read with interest and profit. The pages present to view one who combined great natural ability with much spiritual power, a commercial career with religious devotion. We hope in our next to give some particulars of the book; meanwhile, we commend it to the notice of those who knew and loved Mr. Matheson, also to the larger public, who would learn lessons from the achievements of one who was at once esteemed as a merchant and distinguished as a promoter of Christian work at home and abroad.

A correspondent of the Methodist Times draws attention to the fact that, whereas the various Christian Churches speak of advance in so many directions, there is so marked a dearth of conversions in all of them. It is clear that our success is not proportionate to the efforts put forth. Not a few earnest Christian workers and preachers are asking, with the old pained surprise and discouragement of the disciples, "Why could not we cast him out?" The remedy lies in two directions—(1) We must secure the Lord's presence in our work; and (2) we must fulfil his conditions of success, for "this kind can come forth by nothing but by prayer and fasting." Without Him we can do nothing; with Him all things are possible. Work without prayer is artillery without ammunition; to work and to pray is to command the enemy's position in front, flank, and rear.

From almost every quarter to which missionaries have been sent, come complaints of the evil which is being worked by English, French, German, and other nations in flooding heathen countries with intoxicants. Excellent work is being performed by the Native Races and the Liquor Traffic United Committee in letting light in upon this nefarious trade. In the death of their president, the late Duke of Westminster, who took a deep and active interest in the question, the Committee sustained a serious loss. With but small means, it has done much in the way of influencing Parliament and in educating the public upon the subject of this demoralization of our dependent and other races. Its success would remove a barrier to missionary effort among those who are now being sacrificed to commercial greed.

It is gratifying to hear that the French Government is determined to check the mania for bull-fights such as have recently been introduced into the arena at Boulogne. It was high time something were done, for the evil had been spreading, and preparations were being made for the carrying on of these brutal spectacles in connection with the forthcoming Exhibition. The present Government in France is favouring a demand for urgency to make all spectacles illegal at which bulls are put to death. We sincerely hope they will succeed. Our own good name has recently been imperilled by the presence of Englishmen in these sports, and every support should be given to this laudable endeavour to do away with them.

The feeling of unrest is spreading day by day among Roman Catholic priests in France, and the number of those who are leaving the ranks is visibly swelling week by week. Naturally the Roman organs do not give publicity to these numerous conversions to Protestantism, but there can be no doubt that what with this remarkable exodus, and the strong attitude taken by the French Administration in regard to the Orders, France is now giving great anxiety to the Jesuit rulers of the Vatican.

A singularly instructive work on the many subjects to which women have been giving thought and attention during recent years has been issued by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin—The Life and Work of Susan B. Anthony: Including Public Addresses, her own Letters, and many from her Contemporaries during fifty years. By Ida Husted Harper (two volumes, 32s.). Illustrated with many portraits and other plates, this great work is a story of enterprise and philanthropy on a large scale. It exhibits many interesting and useful points of contact between social and political life and work, and is rightly described on the title page as "a story of the evolution of the status of woman." In a future issue we hope to notice the work in detail.

"The tide of zeal in the mission-field is affected by the extent of fervour at home." So an experienced missionary testifies. This is what we should expect, but perhaps it is not so constantly realized as it should be. The influence of every professing Christian on all around him is greater for good or for evil than he imagines; the consistent man aiding all his brethren, even those who have no personal intercourse with him being quickened and strengthened by his example; and the idle, worldly man damping the zeal and repressing the life of everyone. In the mission field, both at home and abroad, our brethren are men of susceptible hearts, and if they see their brethren, whom they are supposed to represent, careless, they cannot but feel daunted. On the other hand, they take note of the faith and devotion of the churches, and are accordingly encouraged. If they heard that missionary prayer-meetings were crowded, with what renewed hope and confidence they would go forward!

Mr. J. H. Shorthouse, the author of "John Inglesant," one of the most impressive religious novels of the past generation, has recently been discussing the influence of the Roman Catholic Church on the world generally, and summarizes a scathing condemnation in these words:—

> Springing from the worst traditions of decadent Pagan Rome, the Papal System never was a Church. It never was anything but a propagandist machine for extracting forced obedience and alms from an ignorant, a deceived, and a terrified world. The Papal Curia is founded upon falsehood, and falsehood enters, consciously or unconsciously, willingly or unwillingly, into the soul of every human creature that comes under its influence. It has poisoned the wells of religious life. Its story is of horror, and of crime, and of cruelty. . . . It always has been and is the enemy of the human race.

This is a crushing indictment from a cultured and broad-minded as well as devout student of history.

The Need of Evangelism.

WHILE a large section of the Christian Church is occupied with thoughts and feelings aroused by the "Home-going" of that champion of Evangelism, D. L. Moody, there must be a cloud of earnest prayer uprising to the Throne of God, that in his own Divine time Revival may sweep through the land again, and that, as in days gone by, tens of thousands may be willing and eager to hear the Word of Life.

There is surely much to encourage such prayer, and even expectation, that it shall be so. For our God has not exhausted Himself nor his resources, but is ever ready to unfold fresh wonders of his Grace and Power.

The period covered by the life of this honoured servant of Christ has been marked by a great deal of earnest effort to reach the teeming masses, and there are many permanent centres of work where the simple, yet Almighty Gospel continues to flow out as an ever-living stream in a dry and thirsty land. But is there not a tendency among the Lord's people generally to settle down in some little groove, satisfied or perhaps discouraged, that they can do so little, and waiting until some specially qualified instrument shall in the hands of God do the work?

It is painful to find bodies of Christians who a few years ago were pre-eminently evangelistic and successful in soul-winning, now reduced in numbers, and doing but little to reach the Christless multitude. This, it is to be feared, is the normal condition of things in very many places. Oh, that there may be poured forth a spirit of holy enthusiasm, that while God is calling to Himself those whose lives have wrought such marvels for his Name and Kingdom, the rank and file may press to the front, if not to fill their places, yet to do all in their power to win the lost ones back to God, remembering that even the least service to his Name will not be forgotten in "that Day."

London Tent Campaign.

FROM all parts come the encouraging statements that the unreached masses, who, from some reason or other, never darken an ordinary church, are willing to gather in public buildings and tents to hear the Gospel lovingly and faithfully preached, so that there is a glorious field of service awaiting the Christian Church.

Encouraged by the marvellous blessing given to the Tent Campaign during the past summer in South-West London (when not only thousands gathered daily to hear, but very many were won for Christ), it is proposed practically to girdle London with tents during the coming summer. The work may be divided into about eleven centres, each to have a tent seating from 1,500 to 3,000 people. This will give about a month's mission to each place.

In many of the districts local committees and meetings for prayer are being arranged, preparatory to the work. Most of the well-known evangelists will take part, and the meetings will be conducted, as in the past, on thoroughly interdenominational lines, the churches and Christian workers all being invited to co-operate in this united effort to bring the Gospel to the ears and hearts of the many wrecks upon life's ocean.

The Central Committee are in need of £4,000 to complete purchase of tents, &c.; and it is earnestly hoped that this sum will be contributed at once, so that there may be no hindrance to the good work. Mr. Arthur Garstin, Queen Square, E.C., is hon. treasurer; or gifts may be sent to the office of The Christian. Above all are asked the prayers of God's people that in all He may be glorified.

The Sins of our Nation.

F national sins and iniquities are visited with judgment in this present world, it is time to look carefully and righteously the causes of our recent serious and most xpected defeats in South Africa. The ition is so remarkable that to many the d of God, in very solemn reproof and judg- nt, is clearly seen.

In a former paper I referred to the loosen- of conviction that has been so marked in gland during the past twenty years, not y in regard to slavery and care for the native es, but still more so in regard to certain minent national iniquities. These are not er forces, to be overcome by soldiers, Maxim ns, and lyddite. They are home-growths, ernal enemies, that have been fostered and tected, and within gunshot of St. Stephen's lf.

I.—THE LONDON SLAVE MARKET.

Talk of slavery in South Africa and the pression of the native races, in the West d—the very centre of the first city in the rld—is found the largest and most abomin- e slave market that exists on earth, the ts of which are well known to members of Imperial Parliament.

For splendour of circumstance and setting as no peer. All that wealth and gilding n do to make evil attractive, respectable, and cinating has been effected. This is no na of depravity produced and sustained by verty. Imposing buildings, magnificently ed theatres, gorgeous licensed drinking uses, and midnight supper rooms abound in s fashionable centre.

Thousands of the sisterhood of shame present the chief material and the central raction to this London slave market, which n rolling in wealth maintain the whole year und. So completely is a certain area given to the lawless depravity of nightly crowds, at no respectable woman dare walk alone thin its limits. I have seen 120 stylishly essed daughters of shame in one of the ighbouring music halls at one time.

The Imperial Legislature and the police are t only powerless to interfere with the market, t they literally recognise it, keep order, and otect the situation. Millions of money e expended upon this huge seed-bed of tional demoralization. For every life sacri- ed in South Africa by the shooting of the ers, twenty at least have been, and are being, st in this gilded slave market. Death and rial for many of our devoted and noble sons South Africa may mean eternal glory; but shonour, shame, disease, death, attach to e filling of the graves of lust.

Recently a meeting was held to protest ainst the existing condition, but I fear that thing effective will come of it. The moral nse of the nation has, without question, dis- ctly declined, and vice holds high carnival id all the accessories of gaiety, wealth, and lendid intemperance.

How England should recognise the reaping the harvest of her shame in allowing, under e very shadow of the Houses of the Legisla- re, this monstrous slave market, was the estion. As certain as "the nature of ings," judgment should come; and it s come, and heavy penalties await payment the hands of the nation.

II.—THE DRINK CURSE.

The intemperance identified with these eat centres is simply appalling. The fact is at the drinking houses connected with the eat London slave market are active partners this metropolitan pandemonium. Wine d strong drink inflame the base passions of the tens of thousands who frequent it. So frightful are the excesses that one splendidly furnished drinking house prohibits, for mere decency, the entrance of any woman after 9 p.m.

Though the appalling national vice of intemperance is so well known, here again national conviction as to the crime and sin of the traffic in intoxicants has seriously declined. It has actually become respectable, and is regarded as quite legitimate, to take stock in and buy distillery and brewery shares. During the past twenty-five years the traffic has been practically established and endowed.

Thousands of professing Christians in Scotland and England are now in partnership with the licensed drink traffic, which has been truthfully described as "a part of the war between heaven and hell." Retired matrons and ladies think nothing of investing their money in these fatal joint-stock companies, and are content to live upon dividends which represent money gained at the price of the degradation, poverty, and death of multitudes of their fellow-countrymen.

The fair and not seldom beautiful slaves in the London market are, almost without an exception, intemperate. Their dread experience entails fearful exhaustion, and drives to these fiery stimulants, as also to drown the voice of conscience in their career of sin and shame. Would to God that I could show some of the holders of stock in these brewing and distilling companies the scenes which belong to the terrible partnership which exists between intoxicants and vice.

III.—THE GAMBLING MANIA.

Next in order comes the national curse of gambling. The nation, in its great majorities, appears to have become destitute of any conscience about this frightful evil. Gambling, in all its forms, has been embraced, enlarged, and endorsed to such an extent, that any daily journal that should fearlessly attack this evil, or shut out from its columns racing, betting, and sporting news, could scarcely live.

This foul cancer has eaten into our national health, morally considered, to such an extent, that it has undermined honesty, industry, and legitimate commerce. Contentment with the gradual accretions which come of personal industry and application to honest labour is at a discount, and thousands of gamblers, bookmakers, and loafers handicap the social life of the country.

The slave markets which pertain to intemperance, licentiousness, and gambling are destroying tens of thousands of our countrymen, and it is high time that the nation was aroused to see that the harvests which pertain to these national iniquities must be reaped.

Had righteousness marked our way, nationally considered, we would not to-day be deploring the reverses we have met with in South Africa. Lower in our national life, the conviction of the supreme importance of righteousness and judgment will certainly follow. Oh that our rulers and people would honestly recognise the great loosening of conviction in regard to these national iniquities, and come to genuine repentance! Then there would be hope that England's serious and remarkable adversity will in due time give place to the righteousness, prosperity, and peace, which come from the blessing of the Living God.

HENRY VARLEY.

An Army 100 Miles Long.—In the course of an address given at Croydon, on Tuesday, by the secretary of the National Thrift Society, it was stated that the paupers in the United Kingdom numbered 800,000, and these, placed four abreast, would form an army 100 miles in length. The solution for gradually dissolving such an army was the exercise of thrift, temperance, and industry by the up-growing generation.

III.—Finding our Place and Work.

BY REV. J. P. GLEDSTONE.

IT will be admitted by all that it is of the greatest importance for everyone to be in his right place, and doing his right work in life. There is a place for everyone in the Divine order of things, and a work for him amid the Divine activities. It would be contrary to the whole constitution of things were it otherwise. He who has given a place and a work to each atom of matter cannot have left any man, with his wonderful mind, heart, and conscience, like so much material for which He has no room and no use. True, each one has his own will and power of choice, and may therefore choose wrongly, may get out of his proper sphere, and may waste his life over things he should never touch. They may not necessarily be wrong things, but they are wrong to him, if they are outside God's plan of his life. Everyone has the tremendous power of saying to God, "I will not fill my right place, I will not do my right work, I will go my own way, and do my own pleasure." And in so deciding he will be liable to the jars, and friction, and collisions of him who persists in driving on the wrong side of the road. Nothing will go well with him, so far as his eternal interests are concerned.

From the human point of view it seems to be easy for some to find their place and work; they just begin where they were born and brought up, and in their father's line of life. They inherit a family aptitude, a peculiar skill, a marked tendency, as if they were the concentration of the quality of their ancestors. There are farmers, merchants, artists, engineers, lawyers, statesmen—thousands who answer to this description. The talent, no doubt, the natural aptitude, if it be of a marked kind, decides, and ought to decide, what kind of work a man shall do; it is God's way of deciding for him. But to talent must be added character and principle—what he is in his soul and heart—as well as what he is in ability. Meanwhile, the place of service may be anywhere; and the indication thereof must be given by the Divine hand.

GOD DOES NOT MOVE IN GROOVES.

Let it not be thought that God moves in grooves, or is in bondage to antecedents. He seems, sometimes, to break the family type, even after He has moulded generations upon it. He sends someone with new faculties, with strange aptitudes: a painter where there never was one before; a scholar where they have all been of the money-making order; a linguist where they never mastered more than one language, and that one not over well. The strange new comer is probably resisted as an intruder; for who is he to depart from the family tradition, and to take a way of his own? Like a speckled bird among the birds is he. "A prophet is not without honour, save among his own people, and in his own house."

ABIDE IN YOUR CALLING.

Whatever be his gifts, every one will find uses enough for them in the kingdom of God; the Lord has need of all. We may be sure that the consecration of our gifts will be accepted and blessed. "Only, as the Lord hath distributed to each man, as God hath called each, so let him walk." If that precept be carried out, we shall have every gift of nature and every atom of influence belonging to varied positions in the world laid as a tribute at the feet of our Saviour.

Missionaries and ministers cannot win all men, and were not intended to do so. The Christian merchant in China and India can do things that are impossible to missionaries. The Christian sailor can carry the influence of the truth into every port. The Christian traveller can sow the seeds of evangelization among savage and heathen peoples. The Christian working man at home can preach the Gospel by life and lip in places where no one else would be heard. The place of each in life is just where the Saviour found and saved him.

This does not necessarily imply that a change may not at some time or other be necessary—a change both in place and occupation; but it means that work for Christ may be done in any place, and that we should not be anxious to shift from place to place, from work to work. When our Master wants us to change, his desire will be clearly indicated. As He called Simon and Andrew from their nets, so will He call us, if we are willing to follow Him. If change is more likely to be useful to his cause, He will seek the servant who has been faithful in a few things and in a lowly place.

PARENTS AND CHILDREN.

A very delicate and difficult point is raised when we ask, what are parents to do in settling their children in life? One thing ought to be clear to all, viz.: that the child's aptitudes, especially if he have them in any marked degree, should be honoured, and should have great weight in deciding his place and work. It is wrong to force a child with a longing for the freedom of the country and fitness for country life into the stony ways of the city; or to take one of studious habits, formed for a scholar, and compel him to be a merchant. So long as he does not wish to do anything wrong or doubtful, or to run into temptation, he will be best helped by encouraging him to be the best man of his trade or profession, and to serve God in it with an upright heart. Was it not a saying of a godly man of former times to his children, "If you please God, and please yourselves, you will please me"? God first, children next, and parents last; the order is right, in deciding this momentous question of a young person's place and work. If parents put themselves first, they are sure to throw confusion into a career which might otherwise have run on smoothly and successfully from stage to stage. The self-will of children is disastrous, but perhaps it is not worse than the self-will and arbitrariness of parents.

It may be that a child has no marked qualities, and hence has no distinct preferences; you may, within certain limits, make almost anything of him. The will of God will determine what it is to be, if God be put first.

It is as much an advantage to have men with general gifts serving in many things as to have specialists who can do but one thing perfectly.

TOSSING ABOUT.

It is no uncommon thing for good and useful men to serve a strange apprenticeship for their true work, tossing about from one thing to another until their hands find it. They try and fail; but the failure is an education and the prelude to success. By a process of exhaustion they learn what they cannot do, and then know and are sure of what they can do. If God weaves all their experiences in the web of life, not a step has been astray; if God "leads the blind by a way they know not, and in paths that they have not known;" and it will be a "right way." One man's life may be simple and unobstructed; another's may be crowded with difficulties. One may have an open eye for new enterprises, may scan the horizon and see large possibilities—may be like Abraham, a wanderer into unknown regions; while another may be quiet and restful as Isaac! One may never leave his cottage-home, another may be called from following the sheep to feed a nation. To answer our call is the important thing.

Notable Conversions.

A series of deeply interesting articles, under the title of "Notable Conversions," are appearing monthly in the United Presbyterian Magazine. The numbers so far have been devoted to John Bunyan and Rowland Hill. We make brief extracts:—

JOHN BUNYAN.

BUNYAN'S conversion—so to call it—the thorough surrender of himself to God—was not the result of any one overwhelming incident in his moral history. As he looked back over his life, he saw plainly that at no time had he been left to himself. He was one of those "royal" natures, as Plato calls them, who bear within them an unquiet soul, prone to misgivings and anxieties, liable to the extreme both of joy and despair. The events of his life seemed to Bunyan to be singling him out, and holding him face to face with God.

After listening to a sermon on Sabbath-breaking, which profoundly affected him, a voice darted from heaven into his soul, "Wilt thou leave thy sins and go to heaven, or have thy sins and go to hell?" For a moment the two voices struggled for his soul's assent. But he believed that he had sinned so long that repentance was now too late.

Again and again did Bunyan protest against the secret insistence of conscience. Again and again did he harden his heart against his own uneasiness, and set himself to blow out the light that was within him. But the forces which were contending on the side of God moved closer to his heart. "The good providence of God called me to Bedford, to work in my calling, and in one of the streets I came where there were some poor women sitting at a door talking about the things of God. Their talk was about a new birth, the work of God in their hearts—how God had visited their souls with his love in the Lord Jesus. There was such appearance of grace in all they said, they were to me as if they had found a new world. My own heart began to shake, and mistrust my condition as naught, for I saw that in all my thoughts about religion and salvation the new birth did never come into my mind, neither knew I the comfort of the word and promise."

A day came when a voice assaulted him, saying, "Sell Christ! Sell Christ!" He resisted for a time, but at last he seemed to consent. "Now was Satan's battle won, and down fell I as a bird that is shot from the top of a tree." For some hours he wandered among the fields; but a kindly voice pursued him, saying, "Return unto Me, for I have redeemed thee."

This is the incident which, on Bunyan's own word, put an end for ever to his worst misgivings. He was passing into the field with a heavy heart, feeling that he was far away from himself, when suddenly the sentence fell upon his soul, "Thy righteousness is in heaven." "I saw that it was not my good frame of heart that made my righteousness better, nor my bad frame that made my righteousness worse, for my righteousness was Jesus Christ Himself—the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. Now I saw Christ Jesus was looked upon by us as that common or public person in whom the whole body of his elect are always to be considered and reckoned; that we fulfilled the law by Him, rose from the dead by Him, got the victory over death, the devil, and hell by Him; when he died we died, and so of his resurrection!"

Thus Bunyan's soul came home. Thenceforth he may be pressed on every side, yet not straitened; perplexed, yet not unto despair; pursued, yet not left behind; smitten down, yet not destroyed. He learned to venture himself on God, as God had come to the world and to him in Christ.

ROWLAND HILL.

The conversion of Rowland Hill was not, like that of John Bunyan, a terrible, protracted, spiritual battle, attended by remarkable vicissitudes of inward experience. It was—or at least the only element in it of which he was clearly conscious seems to have been—a decisive act of the will to trust and follow Christ. The chief instrument used in his conversion was his elder brother Richard, who, through long, fruitless wandering in a wilderness of doubt and perplexity, was enabled to lead his younger brother to an assured certainty of salvation by a less circuitous and toilsome road. Rowland, while at Eton Public School, accepted the Evangelical truth as the guiding star of his life. He was never much troubled by speculative difficulties. His strong, practical intelligence brushed aside in a moment the cobwebs of subtle speculation. For a brief period he oscillated between two extremes—sometimes wholly given up to religion, like his brother Richard; and sometimes utterly irreligious, like most of his school companions. At last he was led to make the great decision, once for all, to be an out-and-out Christian. He thereupon manfully appealed to his companions to make the same choice; and his overtures, though by the majority repelled with coldness, met a warm response from a few who spent part of their holiday together, and formed themselves into a club or society.

When, at the age of eighteen, he entered the University of Cambridge, he had already formed the design to devote his life to the ministry. With all his popular qualities, so intense was the general aversion to godliness that he said, on account of his religion, he was so despised and hated that no one belonging to the college ever gave him a cordial smile, except the old shoeblack at the gate, who had the love of God in his heart.

Worship.

THE writer of an article in The Christian of a recent date, states:—"This seems to me the Bible idea of the Lord's Supper. We come together to talk of the absent One, to listen to his voice speaking through his word, and to remember all that he has done," etc. Then he adds, "this is true worship."

With reference to this affirmation, may I point out that "talking," "listening," and "remembering," although sometimes valuable accessories, yet they do not of themselves constitute worship. For this there must be adoration—the rendering reverentially of divine honours—the actual ascription of praise to God for his character, as revealed in the Person and work of the Son of his love. "Hallowed be thy name"—this is worship.

Let me go briefly through some passages of Scripture, the subject being very important:

Acts iv. They lifted up their voice to God with one accord and said, O Lord, Thou that didst make, &c.

Rom. xvi. Now to Him—the only wise God—through Jesus Christ—be the glory unto the age.

2 Cor. i. 3. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the father of mercies, and the God of all comfort, &c.

Eph. i. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with every spiritual blessing in heavenly affairs in Christ, &c.

Eph. iii. Now unto Him is the glory, &c.

1 Pet. i. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who begat us again, &c.

Jude. Now unto Him who is able to guard, and to present, to the only God, our Saviour, through Jesus Christ, be the glory, majesty, dominion, and power, before all time, and now, and unto all the ages.

Rev. i. Unto Him that loveth us, and freed us from our sins by his blood, &c.

Rev. iv. Worthy art thou to receive, &c.

Rev. v. Worthy art thou, for thou wast slain, &c. Worthy is the Lamb to receive, &c.

Rev. vii. Salvation unto God and the Lamb, &c. Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and might be unto our God unto the ages of the ages.

In all these passages there is the actual ascription of praise for the Divine character and works. "Talking," "listening," and "remembering" may prepare for this. But they are not the thing itself, which is "having liberty . . . by the blood . . . and a great High Priest." Let us draw near, and through Him offer up a sacrifice of praise to God continually; that is, the fruit of the lips which make confession to his name. SEVENTY-SEVEN.

Repentance carries with it a divine rhetoric, and persuades Christ to forgive multitudes of sins committed against Him.—Bunyan.

The Blacksmith's Hammer.

By Rev. EGERTON R. YOUNG.

"WHAT do you mean by the word consecration?"

Thus was I abruptly addressed by a big, sturdy blacksmith, one day as I as hurrying along to the post office in a little wn in Ontario.

Struck by the man's earnestness, as well as the importance of the question, I at once opped and entered into conversation with him. fter a few more words, I said:

"Your question is such a broad one that I ould like to know why you have asked it?"

Without any hesitancy, and in a most emphatic anner, he told me his story, which was as llows:—

"When the Salvation Army girls came to the wn, I, with scores of others, out of curiosity, id perhaps for a bit of fun, went to see and ear them. I had never been inside of a urch for many years. The tavern and the loon were the places I visited when not sleepg or at work; and often when I ought to ve been at my anvil I was boozing with my unken chums. As a natural result, my wife id children had a hard time of it, especially hen the money that ought to have been spent r their comfort had gone for the drink, and I as, by it, made worse than a brute beast. Hower, the first day I went to the Salvation Army eeting there was not much whisky inside of e, for the good reason that both ere gone, and that day I had had no jobs of ork that had brought me in any ready money. o there I was on the back seats, with some of y chums, waiting for the fun to begin. Soon came the procession from the street, where had been marching, and singing, and praying. was always fond of music, and so the lively rs to which they sang their hymns very much terested me. I was struck at once with the urage of these girls in their queer costumes, ho did not fear to tackle the biggest sinners in e crowd, no matter who they were, and tell em that they were sinners and needed salvaon. For a time I enjoyed the fun of seeing me of these fellows squirm under the rong pointed questions of these brave girls. o wedged in was I that I never dreamed that y would come and tackle me.

MY MONEY AND MY CREDIT

"For a time the meeting went on, and to my mazement a number of my old drunken mrades yielded to the pleadings of these rls and went forward to be prayed for. At rst I thought they were only doing so in a irit of mischief, but when I saw the big tears nning down some of their dirty faces, and ard them beginning to cry to God for salvaon, all the fun left me, and I began to be rangely alarmed, and cursed myself for having me to such a place.

"While looking for a way to get out of the jam which I was crowded, a number in the seats fore me rose up and went forward. This left opening for me, and I said:

"'Now's my time to get out of this.'"

"However, I seemed unable to make a start r the door, and there I was strangely held ck. One of the girls seemed to be watching d reading me, and before I could get away e had hold of me, and, with all her might, s urging me to surrender to Christ and get lvation.

"At first I wanted to answer her rudely and th oaths, as I had generally done to others o had dared to talk to me about

t here I found it to be impossible. I was on in a cold sweat. Then I began to tremble, d I felt as weak as a child. As she told me my wicked life, she seemed to know all of y past history and of my present wretched ndition. She told me there was yet hope, d that I and my wife and my children might t be happy. I was mad at her nearly all e time she was talking, for she seemed to ow so much about me, that I imagined some sybody had been putting her up to it.

"Well, the fact is, I went forward with r, and God was merciful to the old drunken blacksmith and forgave me my sins, and I have ever since had a comfortable assurance that all is now right between us.

"If you want to know how great has been the change" (he said this with a quiet chuckle), "just go and ask my wife and children.

"Well," he continued, "this has been now going on for some weeks. I go as often to the Army meetings as I can, and very much enjoy them, but do not always obtain the food or instruction I crave."

On my asking him in what way he felt there was something lacking in the spiritual food supplied, he quickly answered:

"Why, there they talk about sanctification, and full salvation, and consecration, and words that I know nothing about; which," he added, "is, I suppose, my own fault, as I have not been inside of a church since I was a lad. What do they mean anyway? Do tell me, for my head or heart is now hungry to know all of these things of which I have been so long ignorant." Then, abruptly, he almost sternly asked again the question, with which he stopped me on the way:

"WHAT IS CONSECRATION?"

Looking into the strong face of this earnest inquirer, and realizing his strong craving for information that would be helpful, I could only, at first, breathe a prayer for help that I might say something to this honest man that would be really helpful. Then I said:

"Mack, you have, I suppose, a splendid steel hammer with a hickory handle?"

"Yes, I have got it out of pawn again, and am once more using it," he answered.

"When you supply the power of your strong right arm, that hammer never fails you?"

"No, never," he answered.

"When you bring it down upon the anvil or the iron that is to be bent or formed in any way, it never chips, or breaks, or gives in any way?" I again asked.

"Never; it is always true," he replied.

"Well, Mack, the consecration that God wants of you—and this will be the best meaning of the word for you just now—is this: He, your great loving Father, who has been so good to you in so many ways, and now, last of all, in your salvation, wants you to be in his hands, like that hammer is in yours. When He would use you, you are never in his hands. You are to stand firm to the stroke every time. As your good hammer is often in use, so you will find that there is much for you to do in your Master's service. The drink is to be forsaken, the tavern to be for ever shunned, the oaths never more to be uttered; in short, there will be a lot of work required of you, and I am sure you have found this out already, that there will be some heavy knocks and blows given and received. Well, in all of them, you are to be like the steel hammer with the hickory handle, ever ready for service, and never once must you fail.

"I call that a perfect hammer of yours, a fully consecrated hammer, and if you, in your Master's hands, are always found obedient to his commands and responsive to his wishes, you will be a consecrated man, a consecrated Christian. This, Mack, is the best reply I can give you just now in answer to your question. And may God keep you strong and true."

I often met him after this first interview. He was true to his conversion and after instruction. In these subsequent meetings, he often referred to the first memorable one, and would repeat with pleasure as if relating a valuable find:

"A consecrated Christian in God's hands is like the consecrated hammer in the hand of the blacksmith."

The Girls' Letter Guild continues its mission of kindness and sympathy, with many encouraging results. The Leeds centre comprises a wide and extensive area, and includes a large number of young women. About 100 of these are at present without correspondents. Many ladies doubtless will gladly undertake service such as this. Communications of those interested in this work may be addressed to Miss Alice M. May, 5, Herbert Terrace, Penarth, South Wales.

Missionary Conference in Sunderland

ONE of the most hopeful signs of the times, from the Christian's standpoint, is the growing interest taken in missions, and in missions which are inter-denominational in character. This interest was strikingly illustrated in the Conference held in Sunderland on February 9-13, at which several inter-denominational missions were represented. Mr. M. Broomhall attended for the China Inland Mission, Mr. E. H. Glenny for the North Africa Mission, Messrs. P. Whytock and J. Z. Hodge for the Congo-Balolo Mission, Rev. Geo. Craven for the South American Mission, Mr. F. Wilson for the Mission to Deep-sea Fishermen, and Mr. M. Coates for the South Africa General Mission. The operations of other societies were not overlooked; they were mentioned with sympathy, and rehearsed to the praise of God.

The Conference was opened on Friday evening by a lime-light lecture, given by Mr. F. Wilson, son-in-law of the late Dr. Livingstone, illustrating the work among deep-sea fishermen. The lecture was described as "Brief, bright, and brave."

When nearly two feet of snow are lying on the ground, and the snow still falling, the fireside is likely to be more attractive than the missionary meeting. This was the case on Saturday evening, when Mr. P. Whytock described work for the Lord on the Congo. Those who braved the storm had their hearts stirred as they listened to the oft-repeated story of Africa's need, and the way the Gospel meets it.

On Sunday, Rev. Geo. Soltau gave two missionary addresses. The one in the afternoon was to men only, and the one in the evening to Christians in general, on the corn of wheat sown and dying (John xii. 24).

Bright sun overhead and beautiful snow beneath the feet, may describe the weather in Sunderland on Monday morning. By the time the afternoon meeting gathered the sun had begun to melt the snow, and the people, evidently expecting a thaw, did not turn out in large numbers. Rev. G. Craven narrated the ever-interesting origin of the South American Missionary Society. He spoke of the difficulties of the work among the Indians, and also of the encouragements.

Mr. Whytock gave some telling sentences in his address. Christ's kingdom is a going concern, and also a growing one. When we yield ourselves wholly to God's power, God's power yields itself wholly to us. The secret of missionary zeal is to have only one ambition—Christ. Every piece of rubber we use, and every piece of ivory also, is stained with the blood of the natives of the Congo, because of the cruelty of the white traders. One of the things which has impressed the natives is the death of the missionaries who have laid down their lives in the cause of the Gospel.

On Tuesday evening attention was directed to North Africa and China. Mr. E. H. Glenny spoke of the need of the former region. There are at the present time 100 missionaries labouring in connection with the North Africa Mission, and £10,000 per annum is required to carry on the work.

Mr. E. Vardon, of the Friends' Mission, labouring in West China, gave many striking facts about the Lord's work in the Celestial Empire.

Sydenham.—The thirty-third annual report of the Gospel Hall Mission, Wells Road, Sydenham, discloses facts which go to prove the usefulness of the various agencies of the work. The past year has not been one of unbroken prosperity so far as the finances are concerned; but the workers have cause for much rejoicing for the abundant blessing which has descended upon their endeavours to win souls for the service of the Master. The meetings are well attended, and vigorously sustained. The students of Harley College have from time to time given a helping hand in the services, and many instances have been forthcoming to prove that labour has been attended with true success.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, February 18. Psa. v.

THIS Psalm has been divided into two parts—vv. 1-7 and 8-12; the former referring to the inner side of the devout life, the latter to the outward side—our conduct, the way in which we desire to be led, but for which sinful men come to ruin because they will not walk therein. The first verse of the second part corresponds with the last verse of the first, and this inverted parallelism pervades the two halves.

In the morning the devout soul naturally turns to God; but words should always presuppose meditation: we should "order" our prayer, and keep watch, as well as lift up our voice. The habit of audible prayer, which was a common practice amongst the Jews, greatly quickens the spirit of prayer: our cry should have a voice. They that keep watch should cause God to hear their voice, as the old watchmen were accustomed to do throughout the night.

God is against the proud heart and the high look; they that approach Him must put away the wickedness which gives Him no pleasure.

In verse 7 the psalmist returns to the personal pronoun, and contrasts his own access to the Divine Presence with the separation of evil-doers. But note that he bases his acceptance on the multitude of God's tender mercies. It is only because of the multitude of God's loving-kindnesses that he dares to come into his house. Not even Paul himself, that great Apostle of the grace of God, had a greater apprehension of God's unmerited love than David. He never exhausted his recapitulation of the multitude of God's loving-kindnesses, and upon this he founded his plea for guidance (v. 8), and rested his faith that God would compass him about as with a shield (v. 12). He who trusts rejoices, he whom God defends shouts for joy, those that love his name are joyful. Trust, obedience, love are the threefold source of joy.

MONDAY, February 19. Psa. vi.

We do not know the occasion of this psalm, but evidently the psalmist was suffering keenly. The trouble of his spirit was reacting upon his physical health: perhaps he was suffering from the double calamity of sickness and the hostility of man. We are very liable to suffer at the hands of our fellows in one of three ways—from their ingratitude, their criticism, or their opposition; and by one or all of these gates, trouble was breaking in upon the psalmist's heart.

In the days of our trouble it is well to look beyond the immediate cause, and realize that God is behind it—it is his rebuke, his hot displeasure, his chastening; and if the soul shall be delivered, its prime need is to get right with God; hence the cry for mercy, for healing and deliverance.

The argument of the psalm is the consequence which must follow "if He do not deliver." The soul is face to face with death, and like all the men of his time, the writer thinks of Sheol as a dim region, where the departed spend a poor, thin, shadowy life, with very little consciousness of God. Happy are we that Christ has brought life and immortality to light, and we know and are sure that the moment after death is as keenly conscious and sentient as any that had preceded it. Many another psalm is fragrant with such thoughts, and the psalter evidently represents the transition time, when men were slowly being led to realize that to depart is to be with Christ, which is far better.

The description of the psalmist's sorrow is very pathetic. He expresses it in many, different forms: he had wept his eyes away, so that they had become dim like those of age; his nights had become sleepless with weeping. Suddenly a rift of light breaks in upon his sorrow: "the Lord hath heard, the Lord will answer." Remember that weeping has a voice which God can interpret.

TUESDAY, February 20. Psa. vii.

The title Shiggaion may indicate a disconnectedness in the composition of the psalm, a though its measure was broken. The thought, however, is strong and clear; the psalm peals with the trumpet-note of judgment; the psalmist fronts some enemy, whether Shimei or Saul, with unquivering courage.

In the first strophe (1-5) innocence appeals to God for deliverance; in the second (6-10), appeals for judgment; in the last (11-17), judgment looms in sight. It is not often that we can lay claim to such absolute freedom from wrong-doing as that which the psalmist protests. He says again and again that there is no iniquity in his hand; he has not rewarded evil treacherously to those who were at peace. Too often we set the avalanches rolling which come upon our own heads. Let us seek for this blameless life; let us exercise our conscience daily, that it may be void of offence towards God and man; let our lives be so absolutely blameless and harmless that we may be the sons of God without rebuke, except in so far as it concerns the law of our God; let us live so that if the minutest and most secret of our actions was investigated, we could face the eye of the fiercest day.

But this will not avert the hatred and malice of others. Nay, it will rather attract it, as the loftiest pinnacle does the lightning. An Athenian voted for the banishment of Aristides, because he was weary of hearing him always called, the just. At such times we may appeal to that other bar, where God judges righteously, and arises to vindicate the misunderstood and oppressed.

WEDNESDAY, February 21. Psa. viii.

Let us take the telescope and sweep the resplendent glories of the midnight sky, the work of the fingers of God. How wonderful that the Maker of such myriads of worlds should stoop to remember and visit man! Yet see what He has done. He can make a babe his stronghold so full of his divine power that it may curb and restrain the malice of his foes, as when in the temple of old the songs of the children overpowered the malicious criticism of the Pharisees and scribes. Though He makes man a little lower than the angels for the discipline of this mortal life, it is only as a stepping-stone to his coronation. What if for the present we see that man's crown is rolled from his head, and the sceptre wrenched from his hand, yet as we look up we see the Lord Jesus, our Representative and Head, to whom we are to be conformed, sitting at the right hand of God. In Him the psalmist's prophecy is more than realized. During his earthly life, the fish of the sea, asses and their colts, birds and flowers, ministered in various ways to Him, and now all nature waits his word.

O child of God, rejoice in the knowledge that the great God is pledged to thee. He is mindful of you amid the roll of worlds; He visits you, though He passes by angels to do so. If you are his, all things will serve you, all creation minister to you; and just as our life is enriched with commodities and produce from all the world, so will the gifts of the universe focus upon your little life.

THURSDAY, February 22. Psa. ix.

This psalm is the first of the acrostic psalms in the Hebrew. It is a good thing to give thanks to God at all times, but not unfrequently the rush of praise for some marvellous interposition sweeps away the dam of ordinary reserve. It was as though the psalmist had seen the enemies, which had gathered around his life, break and flee for no obvious reason but because they were confronted with the Divine Presence. So utter was their overthrow that their name was blotted out, and the enemy came to a perpetual end.

God has done this so often that out of our own experience we may bid all oppressed ones take comfort. To all those who flee to Him in times of trouble God will be a high tower; only let us learn his name, his character, then trust will rise easily and naturally, and from trust we shall pass on to praise, and the declaration of his great deeds.

The glory of the psalms is their perception of God's interposition on the part of the needy. In the days of those terrible old world despotisms it was hard to find a ruler who did not take bribes of the rich, and respect the person of the strong. For the poor and needy to be vindicated was of rare occurrence. Too often they were forgotten, and their expectations perished for ever. But the psalmist anticipated an age in the which these conditions would be reversed, when the nations of wicked men would suffer from an inevitable nemesis, and sink into the pit which they had made for others. Then would the righteous shine forth as the sun, and show forth the praises of their Deliverer. The strength of weakness, the prevailing cry of martyred innocence, such are the themes of anticipation and hope.

FRIDAY, February 23. Psa. x.

A terrible picture is presented in this psalm, which is evidently the transcript of bitter experience during one of those turbulent times when the wolves howled around the defenceless sheep. It may be that someone will read these words who is suffering from the malice of man. The portraiture of this psalm may be exactly realized in the person of some proud tyrant, who acts as though there were no God, and no reckoning hereafter, who laughs at his adversaries, and lies in wait for the poor.

Remember that before you ever felt it, others have realized the anguish of being apparently left to the mercy of such when God seems to stand afar off and hide Himself, and when there appears no hope of escape; but remember that God has seen it. All the mischief and spite, all the pride and godlessness, are beheld, and will be taken in hand. No helpless soul can commit itself to God without finding Him a very present help; no meek soul will breathe its desire, but that He will cause his ear to hear. The Lord is King for ever and ever. Man has his day and ceases to be, but God's throne is for the ages, and those who ally themselves to Him by simple faith have an eternity before them in which all tears will be wiped away. Into the praying, trusting heart, whilst it prays, the peace of God steals. It knows that its cry is heard, it realizes that God is only waiting for the best possible hour to appear to judge the fatherless and the oppressed.

SATURDAY, February 24. Psa. xi.

This Psalm is referred by some to the eve of Absalom's conspiracy. David was so surrounded with hatred that flight seemed the one condition of life. It may be that voices spoke in his heart, and that we hear his dialogue with himself; or it may be that his friends advised him to be gone. But, whichever way it was, how well the psalmist's words describe the temptation which often sweeps across us to abandon resistance to prevailing evil, as hopeless and useless, and to betake ourselves to some soft nest embosomed in the rocks, beyond the reach of bow-shot, or cannon-ball.

But this is an ill counsel. Preservation of our own skin must not be our first consideration. It is better to stand at our post than, coward-like, retreat to the rear. We must not abandon the post of duty, for upon the fidelity of the lonely sentry the whole position of the army may depend. Besides, God is in heaven, all must be right. God is righteous, He loveth righteousness, He will uphold and avenge the upright. Those who have seen that great sight will remain unabashed amid the tempest of hate and evil-doing which howls around us. He may be trying us. The present ordeal may be his cleansing fire, and if we come forth from it, shown to be pure metal, approved before heaven and earth and hell, He will love us with a tenderer love; whilst the wicked, who are shown to be but base metal, will be cast into infinite sorrow. Which will you have it, whether with A.V. "His countenance doth behold the upright;" or with the R.V. "The upright behold his countenance"? We need not spend words in preference of either; suffice it that there is a mutual gaze, the eye of loving confidence towards God, the Divine eye of loving regard towards the tried and trusting believer.

Other Lands.

awlessness in North China.

N the recent anti-missionary movement in South Chi-li, Mr. James H. McCann, labouring at Lin Ching, North China, writes as follows to his brother, Mr. obert McCann, of the Irish Y.M.C.A.'s:—

"There is a secret society here of sudden d rapid growth, calling themselves the 'I io Chuan,' the 'United Fists,' or 'The oxers.' Little was known of them except at they began in a small village called Lin, me few miles south of Lin Ching, three or ur years ago. During the past summer they ve been much in evidence through deeds of under, kidnapping men; and by destruction of operty, burning houses and crops; and all ese acts of violence have been directed gainst the native Christians.

"Pan Chang, a station of the American oard of Missions, was only saved by the in-rvention of soldiers, on the order of the overnor, and a conflict took place, resulting in e killing of ninety-eight men; but since then e governor of the province strongly con-emned all concerned with the affair, and reatened to behead the chief official—who has nce committed suicide. He ordered the lease of all taken prisoners, and forbade the ldiers firing on the rebels, only to make a ow.

"The natural consequence of this action has en to give a fresh impetus to the rebellion, d e now more active than ever. They have oved their centre of operations south, and are pidly increasing in number and boldness. or the past ten days they have been all around r field of labour, and the Christians have been ffering in the outlying stations. Just now eir base of operations seems to be Po Ping d Ching Ping. To-day a man came in from ing Ping, saying that the home of one of the lest Church members had been burned, and his grain taken. They have threatened to id the mission premises here, but the autho-ies have promised us protection, which, of urse, does not amount to much. As a pre-utionary measure, we have sent an inventory our belongings, and told the officials we uld hold them responsible, and a rendezvous r all the missionaries has been arranged in a mpound just opposite the city military head-arters.

"Revs. H. D. Porter, D.D., and A. H. nith, D.D., who have been nearly thirty years the field, say that there has never been affairs in North China since foreigners first me here, and the present condition of semi-mine makes it all the more complicated. An peal by telegram to the United States nister at Pekin, who made representation to e central authorities, has led to the Governor the province being peremptorily ordered to nd troops and repress the rebellion.

"Amid all this persecution the work of God es on, and, in spite of it all, twenty-five came rward at the Communion last Sunday to be ceived as full members, and some on proba-n. I believe these persecutions are going to a great blessing to the Church. They have orded an opportunity for the native Chris-ns to show how deep and true is their love d concern for the missionaries."

Prayer and the War.—In a small country town Germany (inhabited by descendants of French guenots), at the time of the Franco-German war, pastor opened his church every day for prayer for twenty young men who had gone to the front from ir midst. The war came to an end, and the twenty ng men returned home safe and sound. One of them y had been wounded slightly. Truly God answers ayer.—S. W.

Church Work in Canada.

THE Presbyterian and Methodist Churches of Canada are making progress towards the realization of a Twentieth Century Fund. The amount aimed at by each church is one million dollars, and before the year closes the goal will undoubtedly be reached. In the Presbyterian Church the ministers are taking the lead, and pledging themselves for one-tenth of the amount. The Methodists have already secured more than one-half of their fund, and are making an active campaign for the remainder. In both denominations the money will be used for missionary and educational purposes and the extinction of church debts, the Methodists giving the donors the privilege of naming the object to which their gifts will be applied.

The Congregational and Baptist denominations are also engaged in an effort to mark the new century by a special fund for the extension of their work. The Congregationalists will direct their attentions more particularly to the Canadian North West, while the Baptists will seek generally to strengthen their forces all along the line.

As to the general church work in the Dominion, there is reason for great encouragement. The annual meetings of the various churches, which are now being held, are reporting improved financial statements and gratifying accessions to membership. Attention is being given to sociological questions, and missionary work is receiving an impetus.

An Encouraging Work.

WRITING on January 21, Mr. G. R. Witte says:—"It was my privilege last month to speak at the Indian Training School at Carlisle, Pa., where Major Robert Pratt has under his care. Imagine the inspiring sight of speaking to nearly one thousand Indian youth, of whom three-quarters are members of either a Young Men's or a Young Women's Christian Association. From a small beginning, less than twenty years ago, this school has grown until now it graduates on an average thirty qualified Christian teachers per year, and in addition turns out a multitude of skilful mechanics, such as carpenters, harnessmakers, waggon-builders, and farmers, who mostly go back to their Indian tribes to carry the blessed Gospel with them, and to LIVE pure, earnest, consistent Christian lives.

"Major Pratt has offered me the best qualified Christian graduate, now at the school, for if I can find the money needed for his support.

"There is one other need which I want to bring before the readers of THE CHRISTIAN. I expect to locate the Indian Station on the Rio Branco, north of Manaos, and sufficiently remote from the white settlements to be out of the reach of the rum-traffickers and vicious rubber dealers. To go there and keep communication open, I urgently need a suitable steel canoe, which will cost about £250. The boat ought to be in Manaos by next June, and consequently it is necessary to place this appeal before our missionary friends at once for this 'Amazon Mission Boat.'"

Progress in Old Normandy.

HARFLEUR, formerly called Hareflot, lies four miles to the east of Havre. Three centuries ago it was a seaport of importance and a maritime fortress, but the sanding-up of its harbour and the rise of Havre led to its decay.

No Protestant Christian assembly has been held there for more than 200 years. For some time past the members of the Wesleyan Mission at Havre have had it on their mind to do something for the 2,300 inhabitants of this benighted spot.

The new electric railway connecting it to Havre is giving new life to the place. Land is being sold for building purposes, and we shall soon see several blocks of artizans' dwellings filled with people. On Friday, January 26, my colleague (Rev. T. H. Groves), a few members of our mission, and myself took possession of the "Salle des Fêtes," the largest hall in the town, and held a lantern-service illustrative of the "Life of Christ." The town crier had announced the service at the close of Mass the previous Sunday, and some opposition was feared.

During the afternoon the rain descended in torrents, yet 200 persons turned up at the appointed hour. Not a very orderly audience at first; but little by little the attention grew in intensity, until breathless silence filled the hall, as the love of Christ for little children was dwelt on, the Father's love, illustrated by the prodigal's return, and Calvary's cross shown to be this world's only hope.

At the close of the lecture several New Testaments were sold. We hope that they will be the means of leading their purchasers to the Saviour. We pray that a door will be opened for us to preach Christ again at Harfleur. We could buy a plot of land for £50, and build a mission chapel there if means were forthcoming.

The Gospel in Corsica.

FROM the earliest ages Corsica remained steeped in Pagan superstition, which was, in time, succeeded by Roman Catholic idolatry. No successful effort seems to have been made to evangelize its people until recent years. Bible colportage and evangelization were intermittently attempted, with but little success. The Consistory of Marseilles, of the Reformed Church of France, sent a pastor to Bastia some twenty-five years ago; but after a time he was compelled to leave the island on account of insufficient sympathy and support. A renewed effort is now being made by the same church.

In the year 1891, Major A. S. D. Colquhoun, the founder and director of the Corsican Evangelistic Mission, visited the island. From conversation with intelligent and educated Corsicans, he came to the conclusion that the general feeling of the people was unfavourable to Romanism, but they were so involved in the system, and family life was so dominated by the priests, that immediate acceptance of the truth was not to be expected.

The result of this visit is given in the report of the mission, covering a period of eight years. It is a collocation of varied and perplexing experiences of those who have proclaimed the Gospel with prayerful persistency both in public and to individual hearers in the island.

Simultaneously with circulation of the Scriptures a systematic distribution of tracts, &c., has been carried on; and, notwithstanding the many attacks by the priests for the purpose of leading astray public opinion with regard to Gospel teaching, the confidence of the people has been won. The Word of God is finding entrance to the hearts and homes of these once hostile people. Communications respecting the Mission may be addressed to Mr. R. Hunter Craig, hon. treas., 12, Waterloo Street, Glasgow; and to Major Colquhoun, who is at present in Scotland, with Mrs. Colquhoun, in the interests of the mission, and taking part in the Evangelistic Campaign. His address is—Christian Institute, Bothwell Street, Glasgow.

The Evangelization of India.

WITH the portrait of Rev. Isaac F. Row, we introduce to notice a very important Christian agency. The Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society takes the Gospel to tens of thousands of our scattered kith and kin living in depressing and degenerating conditions in our great Eastern Dependency.

Mr. Row is a man of years and experience. His life has been full of purpose, and by the grace of God the purposes have ripened into abundant spiritual fruit. Beginning his career as a Wesleyan minister in London, in 1869, he was called to America, where he laboured for six years. After that he offered himself for missionary work in India, and landed in Bombay in 1876, under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Mission. He was placed in charge of the work in Bombay city—work which had grown out of the visit, some time previously, of William Taylor, of California, so widely known in more recent years as Bishop Taylor of Africa. After labouring for several years in Bombay and Madras, Mr. Row's attention was directed to the work of the Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society, and he accepted a call to become one of the evangelists of that organization. In due course he was appointed Indian Secretary, and for many years discharged secretarial as well as evangelistic duties—in fact, until coming home on his present furlough.

The Society is not new to our readers, and its claims assuredly require no laboured advocacy. So long as the needs of the Europeans and Eurasians in India are neglected, the mission to the heathen of that great land must be carried on under a serious disadvantage. The English in India should be an object-lesson to which the missionary can confidently point the interested native; but it is a sad fact that in many cases residence in heathen surroundings has well nigh paganized men who were brought up in Christian homes in our highly favoured land. Missionaries of all denominations would rejoice if the churches at home could be brought to realize the importance of work for the spiritual welfare of the British communities living in commercial centres, along the railways, and on the coffee estates of India.

For nearly thirty years the Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society has been doing a truly noble work, but it has not been so liberally supported as it deserves to be. We heartily endorse the words of the Indian Witness, of Calcutta: "We should like to see at least fifty well-equipped agents of this Society on the wing in India. The progress of mission work among the natives is so largely affected by the character of the Europeans and Eurasians with whom they are in contact, that the great societies might properly and profitably make grants to the Society to help it in its work." The Free Church of Scotland is now doing this.

The Society is strictly interdenominational, and its work unsectarian. It is prepared to employ ministers of all evangelical denominations without interfering with their ecclesiastical connexions. So, whilst now occupied wholly in the operations of the Society, Mr. Row is still a recognised minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and intimately associated with Bishop J. M. Thoburn, whose missionary work and administration in India are so widely known.

Besides work amongst our own scattered countrymen, Mr. Row has had some remarkably interesting and indeed striking experiences in ministry among the native churches, and notably so in connection with the Church Missionary Society in Cochin and in Tinnevelly. In the latter district he was most kindly entertained by the late Bishop Sargent, and spent some three weeks with him holding services in his large and interesting mission district.

Mr. Row is now passing his first winter in the homeland in twenty-three years, and his furlough will continue until about the end of September. While at home he is anxious to find as many opportunities as possible to advocate the claims of India, and for evangelistic work. Having travelled nearly 500,000 miles in India, and seen much missionary work there, he has a deeply interesting tale to tell. He is a forcible speaker, and will be welcome in many a pulpit during his sojourn among us. We trust he will meet with the sympathy which his genial personality and his good cause deserve, and that one result of his furlough will be a great strengthening of the forces of the Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society. Communications for Mr. Row may be addressed to our care.

The Indian Famine.

WE continue to receive urgent appeals from workers in India regarding the famine which is at present raging in that country. Whether connected with British or American missions, their story is one of woe, and their cry is that God's people will enable them, at this critical time, to minister material help to the millions among whom they are teaching and preaching the Gospel of Christ. The situation is forcibly described by

Rev. Dennis Osborne, of Poona, a worker connected with the American Methodist Episcopal Mission, in the following letter to us:—

"From the year 1896 India has been torn by calamities more disastrous than war. From 1896 to 1897 gaunt famine raged, chiefly ravaging Northern and Central India. Millions perished from sheer starvation. Multitudes still more vast sickened and died, even after relief reached them, from disorganized and enfeebled health. The one cause of was drought or failure of the monsoons' rains. The one want of India for raising food supplies is water. When the moisture of the clouds fails, the people must perish unless a wise and beneficent government provide means of irrigation. There are parts of India where famine is unknown now, because systems of canal irrigation from the fertilizing rivers with which India abounds have fought back aridity and barrenness. Following this terrible visitation, and due in no small degree to it, came the deadly scourge of plague. Men fell suddenly stricken by thousands. Chiefly in Western India did the dire calamity rage. Business paralyzed, cities depopulated the wail of the suffering and dying filling the streets—such were the dire concomitants of this visitation. In Poona, upon a two-thirds depleted population of about 30,000, the daily death-rate rose to over 400. A pall as of death hung over the city for months. All who believed in God fell upon their faces and cried to Him. He sent relief, and saved the doomed city; yet the deadliness of disease still hangs upon the country. News just received from Bombay announces the appalling fact that the highest death-rate for a single day of over 400 has been reached.

"And now, this year, in consequence of another period of drought, we are brought face to face with

ANOTHER TERRIBLE FAMINE.

This time the parts most affected are Western India (notably the Province of Gujerát, famed for its fertility) and the States of Rajputana. The last hope of relief from winter rains is over. Lord Curzon, cabling from India, states that his worst fears are surpassed. All the resources of Government are taxed to afford relief to the suffering and starving. Already grim starvation is clutching the poor by the throat, while the destitute waifs of both sexes stagger hither and thither craving relief at any cost, It is difficult to conceive the appalling perils to which they are exposed, o which

DEATH IS NOT THE DEADLIEST!

"These suffering ones are our fellow-subjects, and not a few of them our fellow-Christians, for multitudes of the poorest of our Christians are literally lacking food. Missionaries are doing their best to preserve their lives, and to gather the waifs into homes and orphanages. In my own district more than 400 rescued children are already gathered, and as many more might be received if means permitted. Their recital of woe would send a shuddering horror through the most callous heart. It is on behalf of these starving ones, and of those exposed to evils worse than starvation, that I plead."

Mr. John Lampard, of the Balaghat Mission to aboriginal tribes, Central Provinces, writes from 114, Clapton Common: "All my letters tell of rapidly increasing distress. We are carrying on relief measures from two of our stations, employing some of the natives on relief works, in addition to those who are helped gratuitously and the kitchen children."

A communication has been received at the Salvation Army International Headquarters from Lieut.-Col. Nurani, of Gujerát, a devoted lady worker. She writes:—

We have in this Territory many thousands of soldiers and adherents enrolled upon our books, and a multitude of little school-children to care for, besides the thousands of others, who look to the Salvation Army as their helpers and religious teachers. To care properly for them, something on a large scale should be organized, and that immediately. We have already opened twenty grain shops with free distribution; but this is only like a drop in the bucket compared to the need. I have received the most distressing letters from each officer in charge of a grain shop, the crowds which are turned away are four or five times as large as those they can supply. Not only ought these grain shops to be increased, but we ought to open up at least ten more, as the distances between the grain shops are great.

Other workers in all parts of the affected regions write to a like effect; and their appeals will assuredly not be in vain.

Moab and Edom.—Sir Charles Wilson, K.C.B., F.R.S., gave an interesting address a few days ago, before a meeting of the members of the Victoria Institute, descriptive of the results of a recent visit to the ancient lands of Moab and Edom. He pointed out that from the remotest historic period down to our own day there had ever been something of mystery and strange wild interest connected with those regions; the ancient inhabitants appeared to have been men of great stature and renown. He showed, among other things, the marvellous harmony between the actual condition of things and the description set forth ages ago in the writings of the prophets of Israel.

THE LATE

Mr. John G. McVicker.

WE recently announced the departure of Mr. McVicker, whose ministry in North-east London has been fraught with so much blessing to many believers. It is a pleasure to be able now to give some particulars of his life and service.

Mr. John G. McVicker, who "fell asleep in Jesus" on January 5 last, was born in Belfast on March 15, 1826. He had God-fearing parents, and their careful religious training laid a good foundation for his future useful life. School life filled up the years between four and fifteen, when he entered college, with a view to the ministry of the Reformed Presbyterian Church.

"At the age of eighteen (to quote his own words some years later) my mind was first seriously turned to the question of personal religion, and a concern was begun within me which has never been since entirely dismissed, but which has not yet turned into establishment and peace."

He passed through the usual college course with distinction, but owing to his unsettled spiritual condition, gave up, for a time, the thought of the ministry, and at the age of twenty-two went to America with a view to taking up secular work there. During a voyage of over seven weeks, amid many dangers, he had time for thought and study, and this, combined with the persuasion of friends in America, turned his mind once more to the calling which he had almost abandoned, but which God had purposed as his life's work. He was licensed to preach, and continued to do so there for about two years.

Returning to Belfast, he was united in marriage on October 16, 1850, to Miss Montgomery of that city, who has been his companion and helpmeet for nearly fifty years.

Soon after this he was called to the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Newtownards, and after preaching there for two years received a call to a larger congregation at Cullybacky, near Ballymena, where he continued till 1859.

In 1859 he, like many others, was awakened by the Spirit of God to know with reality and power in his own soul truths which hitherto he had been anxiously seeking after. He often, in later years, referred to his experience at this time as his "conversion," and told with sorrow how, as a professed servant of Christ, he had sought to teach others what he had not himself experienced.

The account of his conversion is deeply interesting. At Loughmorne, near Carrickfergus, where he had gone to assist in the half-yearly communion service, the minister of the congregation addressed the communicants from the words—"It hath pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell." God there and then revealed to him in a remarkable way the fulness there is in Christ, and he found the needs of his soul fully satisfied. He realised a peace and joy to which hitherto he had been a stranger. He wrote in a letter:—

> I had such a time of earnest, tearful communion with Christ this morning. Last night I had what a little while ago I would have called a bad night. I slept none till 3 or 4 a.m. I cannot describe what a peaceful, joyful night I enjoyed.

The following day he wrote:—

> A line to tell you how much peace and joy I continue to feel. I am doubtful if I ever believed before. I certainly never had anything like the same feelings. I have salvation. I see my acceptance with God as clearly as I do this paper. The way of salvation is now as plain to me as the alphabet.

The fulness of Christ for saint and sinner characterized his ministry ever afterwards; and, as recently as last Christmas morning, this was the theme of an address he gave. He said of this meeting that "it was a long time since he had enjoyed so much in his own soul the Word which he ministered." From the beginning, up to the day he died, his desire that others should know the same joy and blessing was always evident to those with whom he came in contact.

His first words to his wife, when he met her on his return from Loughmorne, were—"Have you found Christ?" She, with his mother, three sisters, and a brother, were all brought to Christ at the same time through his testimony. One tells how they all at his mother's house sought to give expression to their new-found joy in singing the Scotch metrical version of Psalm cxvi.

A few months after his conversion the question of Believers' Baptism greatly exercised him. He found it impossible to be obedient in this and at the same time remain with his congregation, and so severed his connection with it. He also felt that, as the Lord's servant, he should look to Him alone for his temporal as well as his spiritual needs. To the last he loved to testify that during forty years, although his faith was sometimes severely tried, God had never failed him.

Toward the close of 1859 Mr. McVicker began Gospel work in Ballymena. It was difficult to find a suitable place for meetings, but at last a livery-stable keeper offered him the use of his yard for Sundays. This was only partly covered; but there during a month God gave seasons of great blessing, many being added to the Lord. In those days of hunger for the Word comfortable meeting rooms were little thought of. Afterwards a large room over a stable was secured, and the work continued with increased power and fruit.

As many know, during these revival days the blessing spread all through the North of Ireland, and Mr. McVicker's labours extended beyond Ballymena to the surrounding towns and villages. To-day there are many all over the world who thank God for blessing received through these visits. After coming to reside in London, he continued to have a very tender regard for those who were his spiritual children there; and it was always a joy to him, as to them, when he was able through a visit to Ireland to confirm their faith in Christ.

His first visit to Clapton was at the invitation of the late Mr. John Morley, in the Iron Room days, over twenty-five years ago. In fellowship with Mr. J. Denham Smith, Mr. T. Shuldham Henry, and others, he took occasional months of services there until 1879, when, at Mr. Morley's invitation, he came to reside permanently in the neighbourhood. As it had been in the North of Ireland, these proved to be days of much blessing in the Gospel, many being brought to know the salvation of God. Soon a goodly company of believers was gathered together in Church fellowship, needing the care of those who could guide and shepherd them. To this service Mr. McVicker gave himself during the greater part of the remaining twenty-one years of his life. God had graciously given him the heart of a true pastor, and in going in and out among the children of God he gave all to feel how truly he entered with them into their joys and sorrows. He had but one object—to minister Christ—and he had a very happy way of bringing the conversation round to spiritual things, thus convincing all that he was truly "a man of God."

One has said, "Mr. McVicker seemed to take to his heart every child of God he met." Those whom he could not visit received a reminder of his continued interest in them in the form of a letter, and he kept up to the last a large correspondence. Many who are labouring for Christ in distant lands will miss his help and cheering influence in this way.

One great burden of his heart was that God would raise up men mighty in the Scriptures, full of love for souls and care for saints. The removal of several standard-bearers recently seemed to touch him greatly. In a letter dated December last he thus expressed himself:

> And Moody is gone! The greatest living force in Gospel testimony in all the world taken from us! Spurgeon and Gordon and Müller and Moody—who are to fill their places? He who gave them and took them can give others. "My Spirit remaineth among you: fear ye not." Some one said, no one like Robert Hall would arise after him. Carlyle said (virtually) no one would advocate Christ like him if Chalmers were gone. Yet Spurgeon came. Who will follow Moody? God will not repeat Himself. One of a new pattern will be given us. May many.

A fortnight later, he himself was called home. Up to the last he showed marvellous activity for his years, finding time not only for what lay to his hand near home, but also to visit various places in London and throughout England, Scotland, and Ireland. As years began to tell upon him, he seemed to dread the thought of being laid aside from work. The Lord graciously gave him the joy of dying in harness. His last day on earth was full of service for Christ, and his death was almost a translation. Without pain he passed away, sitting in an arm chair—the Bible he had been reading falling on the floor at his feet.

Mr. McVicker was a unique man in many ways, always gracious, and giving those who met him to feel he lived and walked in communion with God—a man who gave himself to much prayer. The following is a quotation from a letter written by one of his most intimate friends on hearing of his death :—

God was a great reality, a mighty, living Person, to John McVicker. I have many a time felt very small when he has been offering the simplest prayer to God. He was too real for the rounded phrase or well-finished sentence. I have seen the man for the last time who most led my soul into God's presence.

The large and representative company which, on January 10, gathered in Clapton Hall, and afterwards accompanied his remains to Abney Park Cemetery, was a striking manifestation of the love and esteem in which he was held by all who knew him.

TOPIC FOR FEB. 13.

THE SIN OF LIQUOR-SELLING (Hab. ii. 1-15).

WE have every reason to fear that drinking and drunkenness are greatly on the increase. The consumption of liquor is increasing year by year. The great brewers are bedizened with titles, and sit in the House of Lords; whilst larger workhouses, asylums, and philanthropic institutions are being constantly called for to house the wretched victims of their trade. There is a great deal of sophistry talked about "the drink," as a good creature of God. It may be that the grain and the grapes, the hops and the fruit are, but not their corruption and decay. These are the results of man's manipulation and manufacture.

It is well to get into our watch-tower, and ask what the Lord may have to say about this great and growing evil, and our relation to it. It is not a question what others advise or do, but what the Lord desires you, as his servant, to do. Look out to see what He will say. In view of the present distress, because you have no right to put an impediment in your brother's way, because you are bound by every reason to make it easier for him to do right by your example and behaviour, surely the Lord will ask you not to take wine so long as the world standeth, or anything by which your brother is made weak. I heard only the other day of a woman in my own work, who had been saved from an awful life of drunkenness, having the old taste for drink aroused by a glass of ginger wine given her in a teetotaler's house. We cannot be too careful.

Wine deals treacherously with men (5. R.V.). Almost invariably the spirit of wine assures the moderate drinker that he at least will never become a drunkard. "You have too much self-respect," it whispers; "you would never go beyond a certain point." As well tell a child that he will be able to resist the current of a Niagara! And it is surely true that it enlarges its desire like hell (5). Glutted though the drink-demon is with the anguish and misery of mankind, it is always asking for more. And, however much a man may have to drink, it is always creating an appetite for itself. The drunkard will not thank you if you but give him the quantity that satisfied him ten or five years ago. His desire is always enlarging as hell, he cannot be satisfied. It gathereth all nations (5). There are no nations that may not become drunkards, and probably there are none known to the historian that have not had to fight the love of strong drink or fall beneath its decimating hand.

It would seem as though the liquor-seller were described in the next verses (6). We must not condemn all indiscriminately; but it is too true that, in too many cases, he takes that which is not rightfully his, at least not in the eye of God, since it is the money which should provide food and clothes and other necessaries for the hapless wife and children of the drunkard. The next verse, as translated in R.V., has a marvellous touch of realism about it, because the pawnshop, with its pledges, is sure to flourish in the neighbourhood of the public-house (7). Our whole population is bitten, vexed, and become as booty to the liquor trade. And unless very strenuous efforts are made by the new young generation, nothing can possibly save our country from falling out of the first rank of nations. It is impossible for us to go on bearing the overwhelming weight of the drink bill, and the waste of time, strength, happiness it stands for (8).

THREE WOES follow (9, 12, 15). The first against the extortionate and fraudulent speculator, who gets evil gains that he may set his nest on high. From his protected nook he thinks he may safely look out on all the misery that may surround him, as a swirling tide around a rock. But the very timbers of the house shall cry out against him: within the confines of his home there will be contention and discord. The second woe is against those who build up towns of blood. There are towns, which we might mention which stand on the ruins of happy native homes, desolated by fire and sword and rum, that the white man may take their place as the site of his own settlement. The third woe is against those who give neighbours drink—women who tempt other women; men who teach younger men and lads; the rich owners of tied public-houses, who force drink on the community for their own gain. God have mercy on such; they know not what they do! But God cannot pass over the awful wrongs which are being perpetrated in the public-houses and spirit-vaults of our country—wrongs to women and innocent children, to the weak in disposition and will-power, to the masses of the poor.

C. E. NOTES.

Mr. Meyer's meetings during February are as follows:—Oxford, February 20; Worcester, February 27; Northampton, February 28.

The Presidential meetings held in Exeter were felt to be so deeply helpful, that the Union has decided to follow them up by a further series of meetings for the deepening of spiritual life.

Christian Endeavourers in London celebrated Endeavour Day on Saturday, February 2, by holding seventeen simultaneous meetings with identical programmes. At each meeting messages were read from Dr. Clark and other prominent C.E. workers.

Dr. and Mrs. Clark are to spend a month in Japan; and will attend the Triennial C. E. Convention for all China, in Foochow, on April 4. They will attend other meetings in Shanghai, Tientsin, Peking, and various other points in Northern China. Corea will also be visited.

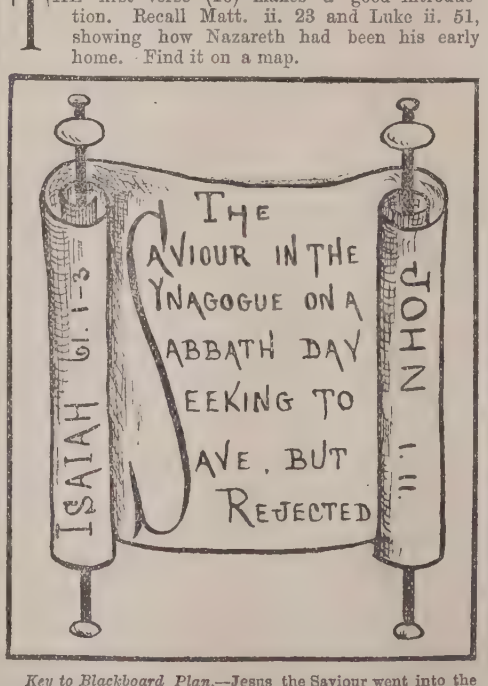
"JESUS REJECTED AT NAZARETH" (Luke iv. 16-30).

GOLDEN TEXT: "He came unto his own, and his own received Him not" (John i. 11.)

INTRODUCTION.

THE first verse (16) makes a good introduction. Recall Matt. ii. 23 and Luke ii. 51, showing how Nazareth had been his early home. Find it on a map.



Key to Blackboard Plan.—Jesus the Saviour went into the synagogue, and a book (like the picture, really a roll) was given Him to read. It was the roll of Isaiah, and He turned to the verses on the left hand. He tried to make them understand that many things prophesied about Him were now being fulfilled; but we read in the right-hand text with sadness they would not own Him.

1. HE came unto
2. HIS own, and
3. HIS own received
HIM not.

These three divisions will help our study.

1. HE CAME (16)—Place. To his native town (See introduction). Into the synagogue, the Jewish place of worship. "On the Sabbath day, as his custom was." What an example for us! Is it our custom to be found in our place on God's day in God's house? God has blessings for those who thus keep his day. (See Is. lvi. 7, lviii. 13, 14, and many more.)

Very often several took part, and read portions, so that no one need wonder when Jesus stood up to read (17); the minister (20), or care-taker of the rolls, handed the Lord Jesus the book of Isaiah, and He unrolled it, and read three verses of chap. lxi.

Rolls mentioned in the Bible—(Ezra vi. 1, 2; Jer. xxxvi. 23, 28).

He came—Object and purpose (18, 19). He came to preach good tidings, to heal, to release, to save. "The Spirit of the Lord upon Him" (Luke iv. 1, 14; Is. xi. 2, lxi. 1; Acts x. 38).

"Anointed," dedicated, set apart for a purpose. Kings and priests were anointed (1 Sam. x. 1; Ex. xxviii. 41).

"Heal broken-hearted." For example, Mary and Martha (John xi); also those broken-hearted because of sin (Matt. xi. 28-30).

"Preach deliverance to captives." Palsied man (Mark v. 2-10, &c.); also captives of Satan (John viii. 36).

"Give sight to blind." Man born blind (John ix. 1, 25); also spiritual blindness (2 Cor. iv. 4).

"Set at liberty the bruised." Zacchæus (Luke xix. 1-10, and Is. xlii. 3).

To all sorts of people with all sorts of diseases, both bodily and spiritual (Matt. iv. 23, 24; viii. 16).

"Gracious Words" (20, 32, 36). There was something very beautiful, tender and sweet about Christ's words. No wonder they listened; but their wonder did not last—they began to question who He was, &c. (Mark vi. 2; John vii. 46).

2. UNTO HIS OWN (Jews). First to his own nation and people, the Jews, descended from Abraham (Matt. i. 1; Rom. ii. 10; Acts xiii. 46).

It is sad to see how little they thought of Him. They could not see in Him their long-looked-for Messiah (Mark vi. 3; John i. 45, 46; vii. 5; Matt. xxi. 37, 39).

So they doubt and question (22-27); and Christ has to tell them that He quite understands. He knows they will reject Him, and He illustrates by reminding them that as Elijah and Elisha did wonderful things far away from their homes, so He will have to do the same if they will not believe on Him.

Unto his own (all Christians). Christians are two-thirds his. 1st, his by creation; 2nd, his by redemption; and He wants them to be fully his by (3rd) willing consecration. It must be our choice (Rom. xii. 1; 1 Cor. vi. 20; Gal. v. 6; John x. 14, 16).

3. THEY RECEIVED HIM NOT. Rejected Him (28, 29); would even have killed Him had they been able. They did that later on, but it was not yet God's time (John vii. 6; viii. 59; x. 39).

So He left Nazareth and afterwards made his home at Capernaum.

LESSONS WE LEARN.

To keep God's Day holy.
To attend regularly God's House.
To study God's Word.
To acknowledge God's Son.
To receive into our hearts God's Redeemer.

Mission to the Blind.—The mission to the blind poor, founded and carried on for so many years by the late Mr. James Hampton, is now under the direction of the committee. It is hoped that the loss of the leader will not entail any falling off in public support. The organizing secretary is Mrs. S. Ritchin, Hampton's Mission for the Blind, Webber Row, Waterloo Road, S.E.

The Welcome Home, Canning Town.—Since its formation some years since, in connection with the Welcome Home, the "Christian Lifeboat Crew" has proved a great blessing to the work, and the monthly muster is always a time of mutual help and strengthening. The February gathering was a worthy successor to those which had gone before. Miss Child presided; and, after a brief but practical address from Mr. William Luff, Mr. Adam Podin, from Russia, formerly a sailor and now a much-honoured missionary in his native country, expressed his gratitude to God for the Welcome Home, where he had been led to give his heart to Christ and to devote his life to mission work. His wife subsequently spoke in her native tongue, and cheering accounts were given of recent exertions in evangelistic work at the Welcome Home.

A Dove's Talk.

YOUNG people are very fond of birds. They love to see them in their flight; they admire their pretty and soft plumage; they love their song; most of all, perhaps, they are charmed by the harmlessness of birds, and their readiness to make friends.

Above all, my young friends, you love those birds that allow you to touch and fondle them, such as we doves or pigeons do. You cannot think how fond we are, too, of you, and also of men and women who are kind to us. That is how it is we live so happily where you live, and fly over or rest upon the tops of your dwellings. That explains how it is we come down into your streets and roads, your gardens and playgrounds. Yes, if you are only very quiet, we will perch upon your hand, and eat crumbs therefrom. But sudden and noisy movement, or harsh noises, soon frighten us.

The race to which I belong is not only harmless and friendly, but we are very pretty. Look at our liquid eyes, the curves of our neck and body, the softness and richness of our feathers. Observe also how daintily we walk, how far and how rapidly we fly. Then you must know that sometimes we can sing sweetly, though the cooing of some is thought to be mournful. Our name expresses our ability to dive, as we swiftly rise and fall when on the wing.

Very early in the world's history I was of some service to man, for Noah took me in his hand and let me fly outside the Ark to find rest on some tree. But all the trees on the lower slopes of the hills were buried in water, so I returned in the evening to the rest and shelter of the Ark. Noah was on the watch for me, his faithful flying friend, so he put forth his hand to take me in, weary and hungry as I was with my long flight that day. However, after seven days, he let me out once more. I was so glad to find an olive tree peeping above the water that I plucked off a leaf and took it in my mouth to my kind master, Noah. He knew thereby that the flood was passing away.

Again, after seven days, I was sent forth once more, and that time I did not return, for I found plenty of olive and other trees where I could live a free and happy life. Soon after that, Noah himself and all his family, human and animal, were able and glad to come forth once more on to dry land. Peace is represented by picturing me with an olive leaf in my mouth. When you see that, you little people must think of my early life with Noah in the wonderful Ark.

Like my big and amiable friend, the lamb, I had the privilege of being much used in the temple services. Many a time would a worshipper bring a lamb and a dove for sacrifice; and very often, when a worshipper was too poor to buy a lamb, the good Creator accepted a second dove instead. And you can read in your wonderful book, the Bible, how the Mother of Jesus brought into the Temple a pair of turtle-doves, as commanded. This shows that she was poor. We have always been regarded as emblems of gentleness, of purity, and peace. So it is said in sacred history that God's Spirit descended on his Son "as a dove." God's Son Himself taught his disciples to be "wise as serpents and harmless as doves."

When the great King David was once in great trouble from the wickedness and oppression of his fellow-men, he cried out, "Oh that I had wings like a dove, for then would I fly away and be at rest!" We doves are very fond of one another, also of our home the dovecote. Though we may fly many miles off, we find our way back, and though we do not use the same words as boys and girls, we do really say, "There's no place like home." In saying "Good-bye" to you, my young friends, let a kind, little happy dove whisper that he hopes you will be able to say the same of your home. C. H. P.

A "Little Man."

THIS was what I heard his mother call him one hot day in June. He was a little fellow, not quite four years old, and could not talk "straight" yet. He was playing on the front porch, having a good time with his building-blocks, and much interested in the store he was building. Presently a stray dog came along, stopped, and looked at the little boy longingly. The dog was hot and tired.

"I dess he's firsty," said the boy. "I'll det him somefin' to dwink."

A tiny saucepan was on the porch. The little fellow poured some water into it and set it before the dog, who lapped it eagerly.

"It's all don," said the boy. "I'll det some more."

Five times the little boy filled the saucepan; then the dog bobbed his head, wagged his tail, and went off. The little fellow laughed gleefully.

"He said, fank you, didn't he mamma? I dess he was glad to det some cold water, wasn't he?"

"Indeed he was," mamma answered.

That same day, a little later, two little children came along. Stopping outside the fence, they peered into the yard. They wore ragged clothes, and were barefooted. They looked at the small boy within the gate with an expression similar to that with which the dog had regarded him.

"Dey want somefin', mamma," he said. "Maybe dey is firsty, too. Shall I ask 'em?"

"You may, if you wish," mamma answered, smilingly.

"Is you firsty?" he began, getting nearer to the fence. "Can we have just one flower?" questioned one waif, longingly. "One for each of us," put in the other.

"You tan have you hands full," was the smiling answer. "I'se dot a whole bed full of flowers."

He hurried around, picking the flowers—violets and pinks, and June roses—which his fair hands held out to the "unwashed," who thanked him with grateful voices, and passed on with radiant faces.

"Bless my little man!" said his mother, in a low, fervent voice. He did not hear her; but I am sure God will bless him.—Christian Observer.

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

SEVENTEENTH WEEK OF MEETINGS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

STRIKING scenes have been witnessed at some recent meetings. A praying mother whom we met pointed the evangelist to the penitent form in front of the platform, and said: "Mr. ——, there are my four daughters kneeling all at one time." Beside them were the two daughters of a neighbouring publican, and on the other side a Roman Catholic. "I'm lost, Mr. ——, I'm lost," was the greeting of a big strong man in the prime of life, as he entered for the sixth evening in succession. "Thank God for that," was the reply, which astonished him not a little; but before he left he had learned that his great sense of need was the surest preparation for a blessed meeting with the Saviour.

SOME CHEERING REPORTS.

On Monday week (Feb. 5) the reports presented were very unequal, but some of them caused hearts to sing for joy. A special note of praise was rendered in connection with the work at Springburn. We had attended the closing meeting, when there was a large gathering of those who had received blessing. No meeting was held without tokens of the working of God's Spirit; one young man had waited till this final gathering of Christians, always too timid to betray his anxiety, but realizing that the opportunity was slipping away he summoned courage to speak out, when like the others he found the promises "Yea and amen in Christ Jesus." The evangelist (Mr. W. D. DUNN) bore public testimony to the way in which he had enjoyed the fellowship of the workers, and the ministers present gratefully acknowledged the time of refreshment experienced by their congregations. An outstanding feature had been the Bible-readings, held in the afternoons, when railway-men employed during the night, and others, attended in large numbers. One worker assured us that several addresses on "The Second Coming" were a source of real blessing to many Christians. By special request the Bible readings were continued for a week after the evangelistic services were removed to another centre.

AT THE TENT HALL.

Since the beginning of winter several special missions have been held in the Tent Hall, and in the intervals special importance has been attached to the Sabbath services. As his children's meetings rarely began till Monday, Mr. J. W. VAN DE VENTER has been doing a large share of this work, and has won for himself a high place in the esteem of workers. On Sabbath evening there was a large audience, and we found Mr. David M. Pratt presiding over the interesting service, which was brightened up by solos sung by the evangelist ("I was poor as the poorest") and Miss Mary Kerr. The subject was "The Water of Life" (John iv. 14; Rev. xxii. 17), and a telling address was well illustrated by graphic descriptions of a number of American experiences in Gospel work. Weary souls find their way to this centre from many quarters, as to "a city set on a hill." Three men asked prayer on their own behalf. Before we came away two of them had been brought to the point of decision, while the third (a bright young fellow) went home with the declared intention of settling the matter alone with God, and several workers united in remembering him before the Throne.

MR. JOHN CLIMIE IN OVERNEWTON.

After experiencing much blessing in connection with a mission at Millerston, Mr. JOHN CLIMIE has been working for the past fortnight in Overnewton United Presbyterian Church (Rev. Timothy W. Stirling). On going to visit the meeting on Monday evening, we found the Partick Gospel Brass Band lending valuable assistance at the street corner; and on other evenings help was given in this connection by Mr. R. G. Munsie and friends, from the Artisans' Mission Hall, Kelvinhaugh. The minister (Rev. E. D. Fingland) and other workers from Free St. Enoch's Church lent hearty support and co-operation in the mission.

Plain in demeanour, grave in manner, and earnest in spirit, Mr. Climie is a man of the people, who thoroughly understands the needs and ways of workmen. He has been busy with dinner-hour meetings in the open air, and has been showing that he knows the value of tract distribution, in all of which he has met with much encouragement. His preaching is direct and forcible. Dealing with "The Giving of Himself by the Lord Jesus Christ" (Gal. i. 3, 4). he showed from all sides the voluntary nature of the sacrifice, then the aim in view through it all, and wound up by emphasizing the fact that the whole scheme of redemption was "according to the will of God."

We met with a number who had passed from death to life, all of whom showed by the brightness of their testimony that there was joy behind. A man who staggered in under the influence of drink, and sat near us, was apparently laid hold of by the Holy Spirit, and is now being followed up by the workers. One interesting case was that of a young married woman who had just been led to the truth, at her own fireside, through reading the current number of Mr. Climie's little monthly Evangel, which had been handed in at the door by a tract distributor. On making some inquiry, she found the editor was evangelizing at her own door, and so she came to tell of the Lord's goodness to her. Now this woman is busy among her relatives and neighbours telling the story. The after-meeting was a gracious season of praise and prayer, much enjoyed by the Lord's people.

THE BROTHERS WEAVER.

The first thing that caught our eye in Emmanuel Baptist Church, Eglinton Street, was the C.E. banner, hung prominently beside the pulpit, and we found the spirit of the C.E. movement pervading the whole gathering. In a bitterly cold wind a hearty testimony was maintained in the open air, and at few centres have we found unconverted seeking souls form so large a proportion of the audience. After a week in the Tent Hall, during which their ministry was richly blessed, the BROTHERS WEAVER were conducting the services. The pastor of the congregation (Rev. James Anderson) spoke with great gratitude of the things God had wrought in their midst every evening from Sunday onward.

After the first service, seven persons, who had been under the conviction of sin, left with words of joy on their lips. The first case was that of a man who had been converted at one of Mr. Richard Weaver's meetings in the City Hall of Glasgow, forty years ago. During the last twenty years he had been a backslider, and his agony of soul when the Holy Spirit laid hold on him again was touching to witness. Now, however, he is again among those who have a testimony to give. On Monday five persons, and on Tuesday four, professed conversion. On Wednesday a strong-looking young man at the front was first to seek the inquiry room, then a young woman in the pew behind us burst into tears and followed, a well-dressed gentlemanly man in the prime of life then rose up in the centre, a man who had slightly disturbed both open-air and indoor services remained to pray, and a second woman completed the "slain of the Lord" on that occasion —so far as was then known. Among the workers in the inquiry room the lead was taken by the wives of the evangelists. Among others whom we found present were Mrs. William Clyde (of the Tent Hall), and Rev. James Ross, minister of the neighbouring Congregational Church.

On Wednesday evening Mr. Frank Weaver sang two solos, while Mr. Bewley Weaver's address was founded on Mark xvi. 15, 16. The preaching all through was a simple and earnest presentation of the way of salvation. Sin was faithfully dealt with, and the necessity of repentance, prior to belief, pressed home.

STARTLING VILLADOM.

Mr. HUGH PATON, while at work in Dowanhill United Presbyterian Church (Rev. William Dickie, minister), found himself surrounded by a praying people, with much practical experience of aggressive effort. Determined to make the meetings known in their own immediate neighbourhood, the local friends (with the help on several evenings of the Partick Gospel Brass Band) considerably surprised the dwellers in villas and terraces by their marches along the quiet roads. The attendances were excellent, and a deep interest was manifested in spiritual things.

The closing words were on "Lessons from Four Characters in the Book of Ruth." We felt as if the message were specially appropriate when backsliders were identified with Naomi, and also when those who are prevented by worldliness from yielding themselves entirely were shown to be represented by Orpah. These classes were dealt with in a loving and most tactful manner, and shown the fulness of the provision for their need. The after-meetings were helpful times, the evangelist being specially gifted for putting the way of salvation in simple words. A pastor in another part of the city assured us that during a mission conducted by Mr. Paton among his people last year, an unusual feature of the work was the number of persons who were enabled to accept the Saviour during the preaching, without waiting for the after-meeting.

STROLLERS AND STUDENTS.

During the third week of the "Strollers' Meetings" Mr. MCNEILL threw his whole energy into that work, and then brought the mission to a close, for the time being. Last week he resumed his regular district evening services, preaching in Langside Free Church (Rev. D. F. Mackenzie), and thus reaching a large suburban population hitherto scarcely touched by the Campaign. In the afternoons he had a meeting every day, from Monday till Friday, among the students of the University, held in the University Union; and, as we go to press, a second series of addresses is being given there to hearty gatherings. Meanwhile, his great effort each week continues to be the Sabbath evening meeting in St. Andrew's Hall.

AMONG YOUNGER PEOPLE.

A feature of the work among the children during the past week was the combined effort made in the Calton district. Mr. J. W. VAN DE VENTER was "chalk-talking" in Chalmers Parish Church; a little farther east Mr. Thomas M. Pratt was giving Scripture lessons illustrated by limelight pictures; while not many streets distant Mr. Alexander Mackeith was conducting a mission for boys and girls over fourteen years of age—giving "Five Nights with Bunyan's Pilgrim," and also using the lantern. The last-named mission was only the second of its kind, and has proved beyond all doubt that this great class, hitherto scarcely touched by the Campaign effort, can only be reached by meetings confined to themselves. Experience shows that these young people who have left the Board schools, and are now earning wages, will not mix freely in meetings with their younger brothers and sisters. On the other hand, they do not feel at home in the adult services. Wisely and gently taken in hand by those who are not deterred by a little brusqueness or stand-offishness, these lads and girls are proving that underneath such exteriors there are hearts yearning and aching for spiritual guidance. Better than that, they are yielding themselves to the Saviour at a critical time in their lives, and giving promise of great usefulness in days to come.

After doing the same at Clydebank, Mr. WILLIAM THOMSON, jun., has been conducting two meetings each evening in Rutherglen United Presbyterian Church (Rev. John McNeill)—one for children at half past five o'clock, and a second for adults at eight.

Scottish Notes.

A STRONG desire is being expressed that the penalty for Sabbath trading, which was fixed under an Act of Parliament about 200 years old, should be raised from sixteen merks Scots (equal to about eighteen shillings sterling) to £10. No new law is required in Scotland, but simply such a modification as would make the penalty an actual deterrent.

Attention is being called to the growth of working men's drinking clubs in Glasgow, which are on the increase in various parts of the city. By paying a small membership subscription (in one case within our own experience amounting to four shillings) any man becomes entitled to obtain drink for himself (and under certain conditions also for his friends) at any hour at which the rooms may be open, night or day, week-day or Sabbath.

A return of shops in Glasgow of all kinds, open on Sabbath for the transaction of business, shows the numbers to have been in 1898 2,880, and in 1899 3,077, an increase of 197.

During a visit to Scotland last week Rev. J. H. Shakespeare (secretary of the Baptist Union) congratulated the Scottish congregations on having promised to raise something like £20,000 for the Baptist Twentieth Century Fund.

The Paisley Home for Incurables at Gleniffer has been extended, and can now accommodate thirty-six patients instead of sixteen. In all, forty-four persons have been treated.

Rev. John McKay, the well-known and much respected Highland evangelist, has met with a serious accident. In alighting from a train at Inverness railway station he fell and sustained a fracture of the collar-bone. Our readers will be pleased to learn, however, that Mr. McKay is making satisfactory progress towards recovery.

A Highland Home.

FOR nineteen years the Highland Orphanage, Inverness, has carried on its beneficent operations, to the blessing of many children bereft of parental protection and love. The special claims of the Orphanage have been generously recognised by numerous friends and supporters in the past; and, although the removal by death of many contributors is recorded in the annual report, it is gratifying to learn that the work has not lacked the support it so worthily deserves. Year by year the number of inmates increases, and the operations of the institutions are being extended.

The education of the children has been capably conducted, and the inspector's report of last year shows that very satisfactory examination have been passed.

The Sabbath school, which is conducted by Mr. Donald Maclennan Drummond, continues to be well sustained, and has proved a source of spiritual benefit to many young lives. The secretary of the Orphanage — Mr. George Walker, 26, Ness Bank, Inverness — will be glad to communicate with friends interested in the welfare of these Scotch homeless and destitute.

"Coming to London."—Mr. W. T. Piper, Evangelistic Secretary, West London Mission, writes:—"I frequently receive letters from young men and others, who are coming to London from the provinces, asking me to secure apartments for them. This I have been able to do, and also to have them met on arrival. At the same time, in connection with our mission work, I have found many, who for want of timely help, and unaware that these matters can be properly arranged, have found themselves not only in unsuitable apartments, but in places of questionable character. I shall be happy therefore, to find apartments and meet persons, if they will communicate with me." Address 27, Store Street, Bedford Square, W.C.

Comforts for Soldiers.—Miss E. Shubrick, Hon. Lady Superintendent of the Soldiers' Home, Hill Street, Woolwich, desires to obtain gifts of chocolate, cocoa, &c., to soldiers engaged in the war. A sergeant has written from Modder River:—"The water is so bad that it has to be boiled, and then it does not cool in the great heat. Chocolate or tea tabloids would be most acceptable." Miss Shubrick may be addressed as above.

Motherless Children.

MANY a time and oft have poets sung and artists painted the woes of the lonely "Mitherless Bairn." One readily recalls the plaintive verse of Thom of Inverurie and the powerful canvas of Sir David Wilkie, each, in its order, brimful of pathos in its vivid presentation of the child-mourner's

PLEADING LITTLE FIGURE.

The practical needs of the community, however, have called for more than sentimental sympathy, and from time to time philanthropic workers have arisen to provide homes for the orphaned. Among more recent efforts of the kind, and possessing the special interest that it aims, professedly and directly, to receive motherless children, is the deserving work initiated by Mr. R. T. Smith, of Chiswick.

The need of such an institution was borne upon Mr. Smith in the course of his evangelistic labours. The wife of one of the many 'busmen who lived in the vicinity died suddenly, leaving twins a week old. What could the unhappy husband do? His hours of work were long and his wages scanty. His humble lodging afforded no room for a housekeeper even if his financial resources or the fear of scandal allowed him to employ one. Recourse was had to a number of charitable institutions; but they objected, not unnaturally, to receive the poor little infants on the ground that, if the mother was dead, the father was living. To this incident the genesis of the Chiswick Homes may be traced.

Mr. Smith's undertaking at once became very popular. It met so obvious a need in so kindly and sympathetic a way that it quickly ceased to be of merely local importance. Larger premises were secured in a remarkably bright and healthy position close to Turnham Green, and the work still continued to grow. A second Home was opened, and a small country cottage, secured in the first instance as a holiday home had perforce to be permanently utilized. Accommodation is now provided for ninety children in all. In each instance the father contributes towards the support of his child.

A visit to the chief institution, at Chiswick, is a confidence-inspiring experience. The absence of anything is delightfully realized in a brief tour through the Home, and it would be difficult to find a brighter family circle. As the bevy of youngsters troop merrily into the parlour to greet a visitor, one is struck by their neat appearance, too, as by their excellent spirits. One chubby little fellow, a Samson of four, holds out his arms that he may be lifted up and his weight properly gauged; and the baby of the establishment, yclept Tom Thumb, would evidently consider himself slighted if he, too, were not given a "jump." There are "nods and becks and wreathed smiles" from the happy troop, and then, with a loud "good-bye," they are off to the Board School.

FORBIDDING OR BARRACK-LIKE

Upstairs, as down, every room is spotlessly clean. The cots and beds, with their pretty white counterpanes, the Scripture wall texts gleaming in the sun, the photographs and pretty decorative gifts which thoughtful helpers have given—all contribute to a very charming effect. Certainly this is a delightful refuge for the motherless. No uniform is worn, so that gifts of clothing are welcome. The interest in the Homes of various denominations has doubtless done much to establish the effort upon its present firm basis. In recognition of aid afforded, one of the dormitories is named after Rev. F. B. Meyer. The Ragged School Union and other well-known Societies have also bidden Mr. Smith "God speed." The ever-increasing number of applications for admission, many of them of a most pitiful character, have forced Mr. Smith to take steps to secure "The Roystons," a convenient property which has been obtained on very desirable terms. A portion of the necessary funds has been subscribed; but some £750 remains to be raised. Mr. Smith's address is 90, Thornton Avenue, Chiswick.

BY CHRISTIAN WORKERS

Aged Hebrew Christians.

AS workers among Jews are only too well aware, the way of a Hebrew Christian convert is beset with difficulties. His enemies are those of his own household. Especially in such densely-populated centres of Jewish population as the London Ghetto, the opposition which he has to encounter is bitter and strenuous. Happily, many who have been led to Christ by the operations of the various Metropolitan societies which exist for the evangelization of the Jewish race, witness firmly and well to the truth, "enduring hardness as good soldiers," and preaching the true Messiah to their fellows.

It is only just, however, to recognize that when old age gradually comes upon them, lonely and feeble as they are, and separated from kith and kin by gulfs of hatred and prejudice, Christianity has duties towards them which must not be neglected. Humanly speaking, it would seem that they must face the pitiable alternative of choosing between

STARVATION AND PAUPERISM.

At such a time of distress many have found a safe haven in the British Jews' Society's Homes in North London. At those admirable institutions, a number of worthy Hebrew Christians are enabled to pass their declining years, supported modestly but sufficiently in quiet retirement. One home is for men, one for women, and suitable cases are received without election, the only stipulation being that applicants have been for years honourably associated with some Christian church and are duly recommended by their pastor. There is, therefore, no limitation to the converts of the British Jews' Society. Inmates are received from various denominations and societies, and, once admitted, they are cared for during the remainder of their days with diligence and Christian thought. So it comes to pass in the humble experience of many a needy one of God's ancient people that "at evening time there is light."

Some of these estimable and venerable Christians are able to tell of long experience in many departments of religious work; most have had to battle on "through sorrow, toil, and pain." There is an old gentleman, for instance, of seventy-seven years of age. He has brought up a large family, giving them a godly training, but a variety of difficulties has brought him into straitened circumstances. Another case is that of an of seventy-nine, baptized many years ago by the late Dr. Ewald, respected for her consistent Christian walk, and delighting to testify of her hope in the Lord. Perhaps the oldest of this notable family is one aged eighty-five, who was baptized—also by Dr. Ewald—so long ago as 1864. An industrious and respectable artisan, he had become quite friendless, the report on on his case reading—"the workhouse or us." Many other instances occur, but these may suffice to convey an idea of the work.

The administration of the Homes is wise and economical. Lodging and household requisites are provided, and a sufficient sum paid weekly wherewith to purchase food. Rev. M. Nachim, the esteemed missionary, conducts services daily for the assembled inmates, and in the course of visitation gives spiritual consolation and cheer to the old folk, while a party of devoted lady workers pay especial regard to those of their own sex.

The general work of the Society is manifesting many and cheering signs of progress, but the regular funds, being specifically contributed for missionary operations, cannot, of course, be diverted to the maintenance of the Homes for the Aged. A sum of £500 is required at once in order to clear the debt. It would be a matter for deep sorrow if so excellent an undertaking should be curtailed in any particular, especially as there are just now many deserving cases of lamentable distress which call loudly for help. Communications may be addressed to Rev. Isaac Levinson, 96, Great Russell Street, London, W.C.

Oxford Letter.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE Oxford Y.M.C.A. held its annual meeting on Thursday, when its newly-elected president, the Hon. and Rev. W. Talbot Rice, presided. Rev. Prebendary Webb-Peploe gave a stirring address. It was an appeal to men to accept Christ on the grounds of gratitude to God, who had given his Son to be the Saviour of the world. We are hoping that under its new president the Association will extend the spiritual side of its work, and that the coming year will be one of increasing usefulness.

Canon Christopher entertained on Saturday some 300 members of the University at breakfast, when the Right Rev. W. Ridley, Bishop of Caledonia, gave an address. The veteran missionary had an attentive audience, and he spoke with much power of his work in British Columbia. Speaking of the change created by the Gospel, he said that when he went first to the Indians in the West, life and property were not safe; now, in the stillness of the evening, you may hear the hymns sung by the Christian community as they wend their way across country.

"What you say makes clear what we dimly think," was the testimony of an Indian to the bishop's preaching, showing that God had been sowing already in the heart, and preparing the way for his Gospel. "Never shall I forget," said the bishop, "the moment when I heard a notorious character praying for the first time. He had previously fought against the government. Now he was a soldier of Christ. Having gathered round him some seventy natives, he was pouring out his heart in fervent prayer for them and for the Mission. It was one of those delectable moments in a man's life when he feels life is worth living. 'Behold, he prayeth!'"

It was a happy gathering; and, as Bishop Mitchinson said, in thanking Canon Christopher, who had been successful in gathering together men of different views, "The Foreign Missions of the Church constitute a point of reunion."

It is not often that Rev. Mark Guy Pearse finds time to visit Oxford, but he did so on Monday, preaching in the Wesley Memorial Church in the afternoon, and delivering a lecture in the evening on "Christian Socialism." There was a large audience on both occasions. The object of the lecturer was to arouse our interest in the needs, the claims, and the perils of London. He states that the population of London to-day about equalled the population of England and Wales in John Wesley's time, and of this population 1,000,000 were under conditions that made life not worth living. This he declared meant that London was built on a volcano, and only reformation could stop revolution.

Mr. Pearse urged that the remedy was socialism—not the socialism of hate, but of love—the socialism of Jesus Christ. There was a socialism that broke, battered, and burnt, and there was the socialism that blessed. He contended that no great movement had come through the churches. The churches opposed the abolition of the slave trade, and he was not sure that the great temperance movement owed much to the churches. They wanted the socialism of the Lord Jesus Christ, which held sacred the great humanitarian movement for better homes.

Welcome Home, Portsmouth.

THE Council of Reference, which have been supporting Mr. Thomas Hogben in his work for the past two years, have been so gratified with the progress made, that they have accepted the joint responsibility with him to form a board of trustees and a working committee to carry on the Mission.

Premises are now being taken for enlarged accommodation close to the new Naval barracks, which will include a Christian Home for Service men, together with Sunday schools and suitable rooms for work among youths and elder girls. Friends visiting Portsmouth, who are interested in a good aggressive and progressive work, will do well to pay Mr. Hogben a call,

Irish Notes.

DEAN O'HARA, Dean of Belfast, has been elected Bishop of Cashel, in succession to Dr. Day.

Sunday hunts are becoming quite common among the Roman Catholics in co. Cork, and frequently disturb Protestant congregations in the neighbourhoods where they are being held.

A Sunday School Teachers' Conference has been held in Londonderry, and at it several important points were discussed, such as the danger of giving too much attention to the details of Old Testament history, and the difficulty of getting the scholars to prepare for the lessons at home.

A ministers' meeting has been established in connection with the Methodist Church in the Portadown district, with the object of considering from time to time matters which will help them in their spiritual work. Rev. W. S. Morris has been appointed secretary, and the first meeting has recently been held in Lurgan.

The fifty-sixth annual meeting of the Belfast City Mission has just been held. Mr. S. McBride presided, and Rev. Henry Montgomery delivered an address. About twenty-five missionaries are constantly employed in visiting from house to house, organizing Sunday-schools and holding cottage meetings. The past year was one of the most successful the mission has ever had.

Littlehampton Home of Rest.

A CONFERENCE of Christian workers has been held, February 2-6, at the Home of Rest, Littlehampton. It was convened by Rev. and Mrs. W. Darlow Sarjeant, and proved to be a time of unmixed blessing. From the first meeting throughout, there was unity of spirit and testimony. The general subject was the deeper life in Christ in all its fulness.

The meetings began on Friday evening, when Rev. F. Uttley spoke with power and tenderness on "The Abiding Life," as presented in John xv. Saturday morning's service was addressed by Mr. Sarjeant, who spoke with great profit on "The Love of God." Miss Louise Shepard, of New York, followed, speaking of the practical life of love. The session closed with a quiet time of heart-searching. So that the meeting began at high tide, and simply overflowed.

During the afternoons of the days of the Conference there were meetings for prayer and testimony, presided over by Mrs. Sarjeant and Sister Emma—a helper in the Home. A prayer circle was more definitely established, under the guidance of Mrs. Sarjeant. On Saturday evening, Dr. L. Gauld, of Mildmay, gave an address on "The Body of Christ." Sunday morning was taken up by many striking and helpful testimonies. Among them was one given by Mr. Lampard, of the Balaghat Mission. Rev. G. Pryor also gave a very tender talk. The evening meeting was addressed by Rev. J. D. Tetley on the "Building," and was followed by Miss Shepard.

The meeting on Monday morning was addressed by Rev. R. Harding and Mrs. Perrott; in the evening by Mrs. Sarjeant and Mr. W. Woods Smyth. The closing day was one of great blessing, the morning being devoted to testimonies given by Miss Shepard, Miss Christian, and a very helpful address by Rev. E. R. Gibbens; and the evening togeneral meeting for helpful testimony, which showed the deep working of God through the past days. The meetings were well attended, the Service Hall of the Home being comfortably filled.

As is well known, the Home is under the able direction of Rev. and Mrs. Darlow Sarjeant. "The Hillyers" is delightfully situated on the seashore, and is admirably adapted to the work for which it is used—a quiet Christian home for disabled ministers, tired Christian workers, and those who need spiritual help, physical rest, and heartfelt sympathy.

The Home accommodates about eighty guests, and about 1,000 persons pass through it during the year, and return to their different spheres of labour, blessed and to be a blessing. The work is undenominational, and provides a Christian Home in every sense of the word. The testimonies that are written and given show that God is greatly blessing this work, and that the spiritual teaching given here is being multiplied.

Ragged School Union.

THE new offices secured by the Ragged School Union at 32, John Street, Bedford Row, were formally opened at a gathering of friends and workers on Thursday last. It was fitting that the occasion should be one of praise and thanksgiving, in acknowledgment of Divine favours and blessings which had been bestowed upon the efforts put forth by the workers of this institution. As announced in a recent issue, the expansion of the operation of the Union has called for larger and more commodious premises. At the meeting held during the evening, Mr. W. J. Orsman, J.P., spoke of the development of the Union, and said the object of that gathering was not to settle down, but to rise to new activity. Christ must always be put first, and all social matters made the means to an end.

Mr. John Kirk, the secretary, referred to the many happy memories associated with the old headquarters at Exeter Hall, where the offices of the Union had been for forty years. With better facilities the work would now be divided in a way which its growth and efficiency demanded.

Mr. W. C. Parkinson spoke of the work as being more than ever before adapted to meet the needs of the times; and Mrs. Bevan reiterated the words of the late Lord Shaftesbury to her:—"Stick fast to the Ragged School Union."

Literature for Soldiers.

THE many friends who have so willingly contributed to the distribution of Gospel literature amongst the soldiers proceeding from various ports to South Africa will learn with pleasure and satisfaction of the cordial manner in which these gifts are appreciated by the men.

Quartermaster-Sergeant William Dawson writes from the Soldiers' Home, Eastney, Portsmouth, that there are now 2,000 Marine Artillery in the barracks. By means of marked Testaments, tracts, &c., it is endeavoured to win these men to Christ, that on leaving their native land they may go forth as missionaries of the Cross. Mr. Albert Carr, at the Sailors' Institute, Port Luy, Grand Canary, states that many of the troops, on their way to the seat of war, have called for a few hours, when advantage has been taken of this opportunity of presenting them with Gospel books, which are gladly received. "'How much have we to pay for them?' was the question asked," says Mr. Carr. "We, of course, told them they were free gifts, and went on to speak of the gift of God to the world in Jesus Christ. It is a grand and glorious work, especially among the reservists. On many occasions the men swarmed around us, and our stock was exhausted in a very short time." Parcels addressed to the Institute will be despatched free by Messrs. Forwood Bros. and Co., if sent to them at St. Katherine's Dock, London.

The free grants made from the Stirling Tract Depôt have weighed seriously upon the resources available for the supply of this literature to the troops, and many appeals for assistance in this direction are still forthcoming. These, of course, will be met as funds permit.

Palestine Tours.—Rev. J. W. Miller, B.A., is arranging private educational tours to the Mediterranean, Egypt, and the Holy Land for Christian people, at the lowest possible rates, in order to allow many workers to visit scenes of Biblical interest. The first party, consisting of a number of ministers and evangelists, sails on February 24, and a second party is timed to leave a month later. Mr. Miller's address is De Montfort Square, Leicester.

Notes from New York.

THE Hanson Place Baptist Church, of which Rev. A. C. Dixon is pastor, proposes to erect a new church building. The chief novelty about the plans is that they provide for what we call a "roof garden," for use in hot weather. This open-air auditorium is an idea taken from several of the places of amusement here, and will certainly, if carried out, abolish "the heat" as an excuse for not attending religious services at Hanson Place. This roof-garden has a waterproof roof, and is so designed as to be sheltered in all weathers. It is planned to accommodate about 1,500 people.

Dr. Dixon, and Dr. L. G. Broughton, of Atlanta, have been carrying on a great evangelistic campaign in Brooklyn, supported by many of the ministers and of the Churches. They have, however, created quite a stir among religious people by outspoken declarations concerning Unitarianism, as also about the worldly "amusements"—dancing, card playing, &c.—indulged in by professing Christians. At Plymouth Church, on Sunday, the assistant pastor announced that he would not read the notice of the meetings because of the attitude taken up by the revivalist leaders with regard to Unitarians, and his congregation applauded him. When Mr. Dixon was seen at his home about this, he said that the most illiberal and uncharitable men he had ever met were those who were so broad that they would have nothing to do with Christians who were less broad.

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, the author of "In His Steps," who is to have an opportunity in March of running the Topeka Daily Capital on the lines of "What Would Jesus do?" says, in a letter to a New York paper, that although he has always denounced the Sunday newspaper as an evil not to be tolerated, he will print a Sunday issue of the Capital. He thoughtfully adds that he does not care to say how he will do this and yet be consistent with his attitude towards the Sunday paper as an institution. General J. K. Hudson, the editor of the newspaper, declares that he would not edit or control a daily paper conducted upon the lines indicated, and this view will doubtless be upheld by other newspaper men. Mr. Sheldon's experiment will be worth watching.

ROGER MARTIN.

Central School of Bible Study.

FEW will be found to question the wisdom displayed by the Committee of the Central Young Men's Christian Association in making Bible study the prominent feature in their programme of work. A syllabus just published shows a number of engagements each week in connection with the Association, all having for their purpose the imparting of instruction in Biblical knowledge.

One of the most important of these is the course of Bible Readings which is to be delivered by Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor, M.A., in Exeter Hall, on Thursdays, both afternoons and evenings. The first lecture, dealing with the Prophecy of Hosea, was given on Thursday afternoon last, when there was a large attendance, Mr. Macgregor's exposition of the sacred text being followed with the deepest interest.

The Committee have again arranged for synopsis of each lecture to be distributed as friends enter the Hall, it being felt that this plan enables the audience to follow more intelligently the course of the lecture, and also to take away with them a permanent record of the leading points.

"Temperance Ironsides."—In connection with this movement a united temperance campaign has been held in the Public Hall, Caledonian Road, N. The annual meeting of the organization was a leading feature of the programme. A scheme for carrying on the work was formulated by the national council, largely as a result of the initiative of the president, Mr. Richard Cory. In the course of the gathering, which was of an enthusiastic character, Mr. Cory spoke in high terms of the work, and a delegate from South Wales referred to the great revival of temperance sentiment which had resulted from the efforts of Mr. Smith in the Principality.

Obituary.

MRS. W. D. CRUDDAS.

A gracious-spirited and beneficent lady, Mrs. Cruddas, the esteemed wife of Mr. W. D. Cruddas, M.P., had endeared herself to many far and wide. She passed away after a short illness, and thus many a valuable public cause loses a warm and active supporter. Her decease will be acutely felt and sincerely mourned. As the helpmeet of her husband in his many responsible duties, public and domestic, Mrs. Cruddas afforded a rare example of devotedness.

MISS EMMA F. REYNOLDS.

The death of Miss Emma Frances Reynolds, which occurred on the 27th ulto., removes a busy but unostentatious Christian worker. In spite of physical weakness she was unremitting in her efforts to benefit others. She is perhaps best known for her labours in connection with the British Anti-Tobacco Journal, which paper she edited for twenty-eight years.

SIR WILLIAM HUNTER.

Well known as a distinguished civil servant and Orientalist, Sir William Hunter, who passed away on the 7th inst., at his residence near Oxford, was also a man of religious convictions, and of strong sympathy with all good work. His name is inseparably connected with many famous statistical and geographical compilations, such as the monumental "Imperial Gazetteer;" but his idyllic volume, "The Old Missionary," with its vividness and pathos, showed how well he understood, and how deeply he appreciated, the value of the missionary efforts maintained in our great Eastern dependency.

REV. J. EDWARD SHAWE.

The Moravian Church has sustained a great loss by the death of Rev. J. Edward Shawe, of Bristol, which took place on the 6th inst. at Buxton. Mr. Shawe was formerly assistant tutor in the College at Fairfield, where he exercised a powerful influence on the students. In order to become acquainted with the practical work of the ministry he took charge of the congregation at Brockweir, on the Wye; thence he removed to Kimbolton. About a year ago he was appointed to the charge of the church in Bristol. Only so recently as January 16 he was married to Miss Libbey, daughter of the late Rev. J. D. Libbey, formerly of Fairfield. The couple were spending their honeymoon at Buxton, when the deceased caught a cold, which developed into pneumonia. Mr. Shawe's sterling character had won general respect.

REV. DR. JOHN KENNEDY.

The death of the venerable and esteemed minister, Dr. John Kennedy, removes a distinguished worker in Nonconformist spheres of labour. He was born in 1813 at Aberfeldy, where his father was an Independent minister. He studied at Edinburgh under Dr. Chalmers, and after occupying a ministerial position at Aberdeen, was called to Stepney, where his labours were greatly blessed. In 1872, Dr. Kennedy was chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. In the same year he accepted the chair of Apologetic Theology in New College, but after four years he found the dual work of pastor and professor too much for him. Ten years later he left Stepney to live in retirement. Dr. Kennedy was the author of some admirable works of an expository and evidential character. His book on "The Resurrection of Jesus Christ" will be recalled by many readers as a specially profitable volume, while on "the Unity of Isaiah," and the authenticity of the Book of Daniel, he made valuable contributions to theological literature. The funeral service, which took place at Dr. Horton's church, Hampstead, was conducted by Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson, of the London Missionary Society, of which organization Dr. Kennedy had been a director since 1843.

PROFESSOR WAAGE.

By the death of Professor P. Waage, who passed away recently at Christiania, religious movements in Norway have lost an earnest and devoted advocate. In 1879 he organized a branch of the Young Men's Christian Association in Christiania, and had since occupied the position of president. His name is revered not only in his own country, but throughout the whole of Scandinavia. His favourite work was that of the Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A.; and to his whole-hearted service, attended by the Divine blessing and benediction, many owe their conversion. A short time before his death he opened a home for young men, and what proved to be his last testimony for the Master was a faithful and loving appeal for young life to be consecrated to God's service. He was followed to his grave by thousands of young people, sorrowing that so true a friend had been removed, yet grateful for his Spirit-filled life and fruitful labours.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE Athenæum Hall, in Tottenham Court Road, has been secured by the Committee of the London Central Association for an extended series of weekly meetings for men only. On the 8th inst. as many as 150 men attended, and an address was delivered by Mr. J. H. Putterill. It is hoped shortly to commence work at several other outstations of this kind.

The first annual meeting of the Bedford Y.M.C.A., in the handsome new Association building, was held on the 8th inst. Colonel Wroughton presided, and Dr. Carter, chairman of the company which has erected the premises, was able to announce payment to the shareholders of the first dividend of 5 per cent. The building occupies a commanding position in the centre of the town; substantial income is derived from a number of shops on the ground floor; and a fine suite of rooms overhead is let at a small rental to the Association, which has the opportunity of gradually acquiring the shares, and ultimately securing the entire property. The secretary, Mr. A. M. Edmonds, reported recent additions to the membership numbering over 140. An address was given by Mr. Frank Howe, of Exeter Hall.

Reports from the College Y.M.C.A.'s of China show that the number of associations has increased during the past year 33 per cent.; also that 40 per cent. of the students, where there are associations, are either active or associate members, practically every Christian being a Y.M.C.A. member.

In response to urgent appeals the committee of the Irish Union of Y.M.C.A.'s have assumed the financial responsibility of the Y.M.C.A. buildings in Donegal. The premises provide a temperance café and rooms for the local Y.M.C.A., and a hall seating about 300 persons. The premises were erected and partly paid for by public subscription, but it is thought would certainly have passed into Romanist hands but for the intervention of the committee. In connection with the scheme, and for repair and remodelling, a sum of £2,500 will be required. Communications may be sent to Mr. Robt. Anderson, Donegal Place, Belfast.

The thirteenth annual report of the Cork Y.M.C.A. shows that the work has been kept prominently before the young men of the city. An impetus to the efforts of the members has been the fact that during the year seventy young men joined the Association, which now comprises 467 members and associates. The evangelistic services for men, the Bible classes, and cottage meetings have been attended with much success, and followed by profitable and lasting results. Large numbers of the young men take an active interest in the Regions Beyond Helpers' Union, and other missionary organizations, and several have gone forth to take up work in foreign lands.

A great work is being done by the various Associations in South Africa in connection with the war. "Thousands of refugees," writes Rev. Dr. Haggar, of Durban, "will have occasion to be grateful for the Y.M.C.A.'s incessant toil. Capetown, Maritzburg, and Durban Associations are as full-handed as they well can be. At the last-mentioned Association useful instruction was given in nursing and ambulance work. Subsequently, as Ladysmith was being invested, some 400 soldiers' wives and children who had left the town, and who arrived at Durban hungry, and in some cases almost destitute, were hospitably attended to. Work of this character is largely needed in such a centre, Durban being the chief port of Natal, and, as such, a place where much distress, calling for the intervention of Christian workers, exists at the present time." Dr. Haggar may be addressed, Y.M.C.A., Durban, Natal.

"Who will Win?"

THE Protestant revival has been attended, happily, by a number of forcible and explicit exposures of Romish error. By voice and pen, many stalwart champions of evangelical truth have re-told for fresh hearers and readers the old story of the cunning and tyranny, of the blighting and corrupting influences of the Papal system. A recent and spirited contribution to the literature of the controversy is the learned and comprehensive volume "Who will Win?" (5s. Hodder & Stoughton.)

The author, who veils his identity under the nom de plume of "Zuinglius Junior," has put his case in the form of a story, possibly for the purpose of interesting in the important subject those who may not care to engage in the study of professedly controversial works. The plot, however, is a subordinate matter, the chief merit of the work being found in the dialogue. There are many arguments between the various characters, on an extensive variety of topics, and the author gives, in a style which is sometimes chatty, generally informing, and always readable, what is practically a review of the pretensions of the Papacy, and its attempts to "break or bend" the stubbornly Protestant British.

The characters are well drawn, and, as may be surmised, are divided into three groups—the sturdy Protestants, the designing Romanists, and the seekers after truth who are doubtful under which banner to enlist. On the political and social aspects of the question, too, there is a perpetual struggle, and the question is "Who will win?" One of the chief characters is an emotional young person with a way of confusing millinery effect and devotional feeling, who observes:—

Mauve is not the proper colour for this season. The ecclesiastical colour from Christmas eve till the octave of the Epiphany is white, and our dress ought to be similar to what our Church ordains for her altars. I put off my violet on Christmas Eve, but I shall soon be allowed to wear green.

The story of intrigue and chicanery by which this young lady is persuaded into becoming a probationer at a Continental nunnery is well told. Then comes her disillusionment:—

She sobbed aloud, and her shivering shook the bed on which she was stretched; the novice-mistress was just passing through the room, when she immediately extinguished the light and forbade any of the novices to speak to Helen. This more than ever convinced Helen that she had become the dupe of a system in which all earthly feelings were stifled and ignored.

The author has evidently gathered much useful information from Continental sources as to the methods and results of Romanist operations:

. . The very word "Bible" is absolutely unknown to the masses in France. A pastor was telling me lately that the peasants would not know whether a Bible was an animal or a piece of furniture. In fact, a gentleman not long since inquired for a Bible in the largest book store of a provincial city. "Bible," said the bookseller, "I never heard of such a book." Then he turned to his assistant and inquired if he knew anything about it. "It is not yet out," was the reply. So the bookseller turned to his customer, and said, "I hear that it is shortly coming out in Paris, and as soon as I can obtain a copy I shall let you have one."

So many subjects are dealt with in a conversational form that a somewhat disjointed effect is occasionally created, while statements regarding Methodist forms of procedure will hardly be endorsed by followers of John Wesley. All things considered, however, it may be said that, "Who will win?" is an honest and impressive piece of work which should prove specially valuable in Protestant families where the daughters of the household are in danger of succumbing to the insidious influences of sacerdotal propagandists. Certainly "Zuinglius Junior" deserves praise for loftiness of tone in his apt exposures of Jesuitical double-dealing. He does not adopt the controversial methods of Romish organs; it is with restraint and perspicuity that he shows the contention to be, not a mere disagreement as to trivialities of dress and decoration, but a holy warfare of light against darkness, truth against error, spiritual worship against the degrading blasphemies and idolatries of the Vatican.

The Churches.

Church of England.

The Bishop of Richmond, in the presence of a large congregation, recently consecrated a new parish church at Chapel Allerton, Leeds. The new church cost close upon £20,000, exclusive of the land.

Speaking at Chester on Saturday, Bishop Jayne referred to the prevalence of bad language in the streets. It was simply a monstrosity that our streets should become schools of obscenity and profanity, and efforts ought to be made to get at the root of the evil. The meaningless use of such language made it none the less offensive and disgusting to other people.

A movement has been started for the restoration of the south transept of Chester Cathedral, as a memorial to the late Duke of Westminster. The Duke opposed the erection of a statue of himself during his lifetime, and strongly desired the restoration of the transept. Sir Horatio Lloyd, who is moving in the matter, has already received many promises of support.

St. Saviour's Church, Falkner Square, Liverpool, was, on the 4th inst., destroyed by fire. The flames spread with extraordinary rapidity, and when the fire brigade arrived little could be done beyond trying to save the tower. The church books, parish registers, Communion-plate, and some valuable furniture were saved, but the windows and organ are destroyed. The church had accommodation for 1,050 worshippers. Rev. R. M. Ainslie, who succeeded the Bishop of Carlisle, is vicar.

Canon A. J. Robinson has issued his report of the work in the parish of St. Martin, Birmingham, during the past year. The ordinary work has gone on steadily, and progress is to be noted in many ways. A gratifying increase in the number of communicants is reported. The Sunday afternoon service for men is one of the most encouraging features of the past year's work, and the results have been most satisfactory. The parochial organizations have thrived, and all appear to be in a healthy condition. The mission work of the parish has been much blessed, and the open-air services have been particularly well attended.

Congregational.

The reopening of Holloway Chapel takes place on February 18, when Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, of New Court, Tollington Park, will preach in the morning; and Rev. E. M. Edmunds (who has accepted an invitation to take charge of Holloway Church and to be associate-pastor of Rev. G. Campbell Morgan) in the evening.

Rev. Urijah R. Thomas has completed his thirty-eighth year as pastor of Redland Park Church, Bristol. He is compelled to take rest in view of the throat trouble from which he has for some time been suffering. Ere departing for this well-earned leisure he was invited by his Church and congregation to a social gathering in Redland Park Hall, when warm testimony was paid to his fortitude in continuing his duties to the end of the Church's year.

Baptist.

Rev. Robert Glennie, who, in consequence of the health of Mrs. Glennie, was obliged to retire from the Congo Mission, has been appointed travelling secretary to the Baptist Total Abstinence Association.

Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon continues in much the same condition as previously reported. She is still quite confined to her bed, but her strength is fairly maintained. She has been very thankful to be able to see her late husband's Autobiography complete.

Methodist.

In Sheffield North Circuit of the Methodist New Connexion, a lay agent has been engaged; and the ministers, Revs. H. Hope and D. Patterson, remain a fifth and second year respectively. Very encouraging reports of the new mission at Hillsbrough were presented to the quarterly meeting. Malin Bridge Society has paid for a site for a new church and school, and has £300 also for building purposes.

Throughout British Wesleyan Methodism, boards of trustees are now busy is holding their annual meetings for the proper audit of accounts. Together these number no less than 8,328, having a total income from all sources which does not fall short of half a million. During the past forty-five years no less a sum than £2,568,502 has been raised to pay off debts on chapel and other trust property in this country.

The Wesleyan services in the Theatre at Swindon have more than met the expectations of the promoters. Each Sunday evening the theatre has been packed, and scores turned from the doors. On a recent Sunday evening, notwithstanding fearful weather, every seat was occupied, and 200 or 300 stood. It was estimated nearly 2,000 persons were present. The two local ministers are usually present, and give the address in turn. The people who go to no place of worship are the ones reached. The services will be continued for another three months.

The half-dozen ministers belonging to the Wesleyan Methodist British Conference still at their posts in the Transvaal are on the whole receiving generous treatment. Rev. J. Schofield Morris, formerly of the Tooting Circuit, but for the past seven years a Wesleyan minister at Pretoria and Johannesburg, in a recent letter to his sister, says:—"Not once in the whole of this trying time have I had a rough or discourteous word addressed to me by an official or by any burgher. My requests for special permits to be out at night and to go outside the town limits on my bicycle have been readily granted. My work has not been hindered in any way."

The Bishop of Liverpool, in the course of a reply to a farewell note from Rev. Charles Garrett, said:—"I must request you to convey to the leading members of your body the expression of my deep respect for all the faithful followers of John Wesley. I learned to respect him when I was only a boy, and I continue my feelings towards him at the age of eighty-three. I pray that his people may continue to maintain his principles, and may always have God's blessing. We shall probably not meet much more in this world, but I shall not forget you, and I live in the hope that we shall meet to part no more in the world to come, where there is no death, and where there will be no tears."

Presbyterian.

Dr. Thornton has nearly completed his arrangements for the tenth annual missionary meeting under the auspices of the North and South London Presbyteries. It will be held in the Queen's Hall on Tuesday, May 15, 1900.

It is stated that the college arrangements of the United Church (the result of the union between the Free and United Presbyterian Churches) will be that the Principalship of Glasgow College will be held by Principals Douglas and Hutton jointly, and that Professor Orr will simply succeed to the main work of Professor Bruce's chair. Professor Hislop's work at Glasgow will correspond to his present work in Edinburgh.

At the thirty-seventh annual congregational meeting of the members of Trinity Church, Claughton, Birkenhead, the pastor, Rev. William Watson, reviewed the year's work, mentioning how cheered he was to note the growing devotion of many of the members to personal Christian and philanthropic work, both inside and outside the congregation, and how deeply he had been affected by the recent remarkable accessions to the membership.

Society of Friends.

At the quarterly meeting of Warwick, Leicester, and Stafford, a minute was passed expressing sympathy with those in trouble and distress on account of the war in South Africa, and appealing to Christians "to remain firm to those truths which in calmer moments they have recognised, and not to allow themselves to be carried away by the present tide of popular excitement."

Henry S. Margrett and his wife much interested the Home Mission committee of late by giving particulars of the work in the neighbourhood of Diss, in Norfolk. The work of Friends in the town is in a hopeful state, and a spirit of unity pervades it, whilst the neighbourhood is well worked with the help of some seventeen willing helpers, in addition to assistance from Norwich, &c.

At the Warwick, Leicester, and Stafford Quarterly Meeting interesting accounts were given of the smaller monthly meetings, especially in connection with Shipston-on-Stour and Stoke-on-Trent. In the former the Adult School is cause for much encouragement. In the latter the attendance of children at the evening meeting seems to have compelled Friends there to start special work on their behalf. Dr. George Newman spoke on "The Claims of the Community on the Individual." His lively and stimulating address must have stirred many of those present to fresh determination to use even the least of their gifts for the good of the community.

Fallen Asleep.

Through the death of Mr. ISAAC DODGSHUN, at the age of eighty-two, Leeds has lost a valued citizen, and the Congregational body a staunch and ever-generous supporter.—Mission work in Somers-town, St. Pancras, has lost an earnest supporter by the death of Mrs P. A. BALL, the wife of the secretary of the Christian Men's Union Gospel Mission. Mrs Ball was a daughter of the late Rev. F. Cox, founder of the mission.—Mr. JOHN NICHOLS DICKINSON, of Leeds, in his eighty-sixth year. He had been connected with East-parade Chapel for more than sixty years.—Sergeant CANDY, of the 1st South Lancashire Regiment, who was wounded at Spion Kop and has since died, was a local preacher at Darwen and conducted a Sunday-school class. While in South Africa he did excellent religious work in the camp.—Rev. J. CORNFORD, M.A., well known in Evangelical circles as a former lecturer at St. John's Hall, Highbury, died suddenly on Friday, February 2. Since 1898 he had been chaplain of the Princess May Village Homes, Addlestone.—At the age of 101, Mrs. ANN GIBSON, of Walnut Tree House, Beathwaite Green. She was born June 3, 1798, had lived in the parish all her life and was a staunch Methodist. Her father-in-law, George Gibson, was the founder of Methodism in the district.—Aged seventy-two, Sir WILLIAM GEDDES, Principal of Aberdeen University.—At Kells, co. Antrim, Rev. THOMAS EATON, M.A., Presbyterian minister.—At Cork, Rev. M. KERR, Presbyterian minister.

"CHELTENHAM:" Yes, provided the source is acknowledged.

Several friends have written supplying the answer to the inquiry as to a poem beginning "I shine in the light of God." It is a message for bereaved Christians, and entitled "A Voice from Heaven." It has been issued in a neat leaflet by the Drummond Tract Depot, Stirling; the Dublin Tract Repository; Mr. John H. Bell, 31, Castle Street, Edinburgh; and Mr. Alfred Holness, 14, Paternoster Row, London. It has also been included in several collections of poems.

Appeal.

CAPTAIN KNOX, R.N., would be glad to receive cards and calendars for his Bible Albums, and for rewards to Sunday-school children in Canada and Newfoundland. They may be sent by parcel or book post to 27, Cliveden Place, Eaton Square, S.W.

Requests for Prayer.

For a mission to children at Walford Hall, Stoke Newington, Feb. 18-25, to be conducted by Mr. C. Dudley Smith.

For special services to be conducted at Central Hall, Sheffield, Sunday, February 18.

For a meeting of the Royal Courts of Justice Temperance Society at Middle Temple Hall, on February 21.

Fire at Hadleigh Colony.—Early on Monday morning last a fire occurred at the Salvation Army Colony at Hadleigh. The men's dining-room, together with the adjacent kitchen and jam factory, were destroyed. Happily, the buildings involved being isolated, no further damage was done. The loss is covered by insurance.

The Christian.

☞ To avoid delay it is requested that all letters relating to business matters should be addressed to the firm, Messrs. Morgan and Scott, and not to its individual members. Letters of a personal nature should in every case be so marked.

Communications for The Christian should be addressed to the Editor, 12, Paternoster Buildings, London, E.C. All Advertisements should be sent to Messrs. John Haddon and Co., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

☞ The Publishers request that all orders for The Christian by post, and remittances for same, be addressed to "The Christian" Postal Department, Bouverie House, Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

Cheques and Post Orders to be made payable to Messrs. John Haddon and Co. at that address. (For Subscription rates, see Page 1 of Cover.) Postcard or stamped envelope should be enclosed if receipt is desired.

Notes & Comments

WHAT with war, weather, and influenza, this winter, which is dying exceptionally hard, has been the dreariest within living memory. The depression from which all have more or less suffered is visible everywhere. Preachers say they never remember a time when congregations were so small, and so little interest was shown in sermons. All that people desire is to get home early from work and cultivate the quiet of the hearthstone. Meanwhile, as Mr. Chamberlain said in a recent speech, "The nation longs for guidance." This is true, not only politically, but it every sense.

One thing in connection with the South African War gives confidence to faith, viz: the increasing evidence that Christian people are giving themselves to prayer about it. Diversity of opinion as to the righteousness of the war, or the immediate causes which led to it, do not prejudice the fact that thousands of people are solemnly and fervently bringing the whole matter to the Throne of Grace. We could hardly have better evidence that God's chastisements have not been in vain. A nation in prayer means a nation cultivating a broken and contrite heart.

We are glad to observe the continued and wide-spread development of the organization for the setting apart of Ash Wednesday (February 28) as a day of humiliation and prayer. It is felt by many that the partial removal of recent national pressure by the relief of Kimberley, and the subsequent English advance into the Free State must not render the country less willing to hear, "in the midst of the trouble and anxiety around us, the call of the Lord to repentance for national sins." Leaders of religious thought in connection with various denominations continue to signify their adhesion to the movement, and we may prayerfully anticipate that the occasion may be one of deep and lasting blessing to all sections of the community. Persons wishing to join are invited to address their communications to "Humiliation," Conference Hall, Eccleston Street, S.W.

Whatever estimate may be held of Mr. Labouchere or his views, all sober-minded people will agree with him in thinking it is somewhat gruesome for fine ladies to get up balls to help the wounded, and that it would be better to contribute what they can without dancing over graves. The Church Times, speaking of "the fooling at Her Majesty's Theatre," says that our junketings cover their untimely levity with a sanctimonious veil of patriotism and charity. "But tear the veil away, and we see nothing but a social function, the costly revels of a decadent society." Our contemporary does not hesitate to express its belief that it is to the extravagant trifling of the wealthy ruling class that we owe the position in which we find ourselves at present. Be this as it may, every one should set his and her face against associating selfish pleasure with the agonies of the wounded on the battlefield and with the solemn stillness of the dead.

Sir Algernon West, who was a member of the Licensing Commission, has criticised Lord Peel, the Chairman, for—

> The pious Ichabod which Lord Peel proclaims when he states, "It has come to a struggle for mastery between the State and a trade who is to be master."

Yet this view has been held for years by thousands of observant Christian men. Certainly the State has multiplied the facilities for drink far beyond any real needs, and "takes toll" for them. The ordinary mind is clear on this—that as the licences were originally granted for one year only, and for nothing, there is no ground for the plea of vested interests, and the proposals to compensate the holders if the State were to reduce the number. The ratepayer must not be called upon to bear the burden of compensation in addition to the cost of drink-created poverty and crime.

At Accrington a brilliant search-light has been thrown upon the urgency of adopting more active measures to bring about the Sunday closing of public-houses. The editor of a newspaper in that town found on a particular Sunday that the men in the public-houses doubled those in the various places of worship. These drinking facilities on the Lord's Day present enormous temptations to the working classes to desecrate the Sabbath. Christian workers and temperance leaders should take up this burning question and see the thing through.

No doubt Accrington closely resembles all other English towns on a Sunday. Chief among many remedies for the state of things described is the fuller preaching of the greatest themes of the Bible. When George Whitefield first went to Moorfields, which at that time was infested with desperate characters, it was believed by some that he never would come out alive. He preached on our Lord coming in judgment, and was heard in profound stillness. Men could not mock or be careless before such a theme in the mouth of such a preacher. And now, as then, they can only be controlled; but they can be controlled by the grandest and most searching themes of all. Poets and dramatists appeal to "the great human heart." Preachers must increasingly do the same.

The measure of a man's responsibility is hard to fix, partly because, in some cases, work and trust have to be delegated to others. But the delegation is a responsibility. An owner of estates appoints agents for their management; is he responsible if they exact more than is just? An employer of labour appoints managers and foremen and others over a multitude of employes; is he responsible for acts of harshness and of positive oppression committed in his name? A thousand shareholders appoint three managing directors; are they responsible morally for the policy carried out and the way in which trade is carried on? Decidedly, yes. One of the needs of the day is that responsibility should be realised. Delegation does not abolish it; it only obscures it.

In The Humanitarian, Miss Rosa Barrett recently showed that there is a considerable and steady decrease in crime in Ireland; an exceedingly gratifying fact in view of the unhappy position of so many of the ignorant and but poorly educated section of the population of the sister island. Some of the writer's statements are, however, by no means so pleasant, as for instance when she remarks that drunkenness was the cause of half the total committals, and of 53 per cent. of the convictions, the average daily prison population being 56 per 100,000 of the population as compared with 47 in England.

Although there is a large decrease in juvenile criminals, Miss Barrett writes in strong condemnation of the existing system in Ireland under which young children are sent to prison, even if only for a very short period, before being sent to a reformatory. "To imprison a child at all is a ruinous process," the writer urges; and, whatever may be done in the way of separation from adults, we share the opinion. Such imprisonment before committal to a reformatory has been abolished in England, and we quite fail to see why a similar course should not be adopted in Ireland, especially as it appears that in Dublin alone in one year no fewer than 562 children under ten, and 1,678 under fifteen years of age, were brought up and charged at the Metropolitan Police Court.

Miss Barrett, in referring to the undoubted close connection between education and decrease in crime, urges that, despite all that has been done for the protection of child life in England, there are still serious gaps in our legislation. To some of the most evident omissions we called attention in a recent note dealing with the question of the connection between drunkenness and the crowds of starving children in the Board Schools, and she adds:—

> One-fifth of juvenile crime is directly traceable to the drunken habits of the parents, yet the arrests for drunkenness are increasing both in Great Britain and in Ireland at an appalling rate—they have doubled in England during the last thirty years, and Mr. Justice Kenny states that during August and September, 1899, offences arising from intoxication in the County of Dublin are nearly double what they were in the corresponding months of 1898, and, as we have already seen, half the prisoners in Ireland are committed for drunkenness.

Naturally the writer of this striking article asks how much longer are we going to permit this wholesale manufacture of crime to continue unchecked, the answer to which pertinent question doubtless is: Until the entire Christian community insists upon the problems being dealt with by the Government.

So many beautiful things anent the late Duchess of Teck are to be found in the recently published Memoir of the Princess, that the country is only just beginning to realize the heavy loss it has sustained by her decease. To so many benevolent and Christian objects she gave her thoughtful and sympathetic help that her abundant charities must be sorely missed. Her kindly considerateness for the aged is alluded to more than once in the memoir. Here is a pathetic instance:—Noticing an old lady waiting for her turn to fish at a bazaar in a fish-pond at which H.R.H. was presiding, she rose from her seat and said, "Now you must all make way for that old lady; she will be very tired of standing till her turn comes." Surely a striking lesson to the younger anglers upon veneration and respect for old age.

There is ample room for a very large element of pity in dealing with the question of the removal from the streets of that "sisterhood of shame" to which Mr. Henry Varley called attention in our last issue, and it is to be hoped that the Council for the Promotion of Public Morality in London will endeavour to deal primarily with the causes rather than the effect. The male offender certainly is responsible for most of the evil, and from places above the level of the streets streams of pollution are permitted to flow unchecked, demoralizing and corrupting the young. Suppression of the publication of the vile records of the Divorce Court, and more frequent prosecutions of publishers of immoral literature, are sorely needed. The advertisement stations, with their semi-indecent posters, and a number of shop-windows, even in leading thoroughfares, need to be looked after.

By the application of the Robson Act, under which the age of children employed in mills and other places has been raised from eleven to twelve years, "another year of childhood" has been conferred upon at least half a million children. But there yet is much in child-life, especially in our large cities, that calls for amelioration, though it is difficult to arrive at the means to be employed. In a recent case it was stated that a man and his wife and two children were at work match-box making from 7 a.m. to 11 p.m. daily for a wage of 1s. 8d.; and in another, as recorded in an official report, a woman and five children working at that business "from morning till night" incessantly could only earn 1s. 5½d. Truly, the greed for large dividends is responsible for much misery.

The Christian public is much indebted to the Special Commissioner of the Daily News for the revelations he has given of the terrible severity of the labour allotted to little lads in coal mines. Not that these "trapper" and "putting" boys complain. They accept their hard lot with a heroism that makes one wish it were expended in an employment more humane.

> The law says boys of twelve can come down; so they come down. . . . "I was going to work in the pit like father; it seemed natural I should come down." Who can read, also, how the derailed coal-trucks are replaced without feeling that a cruel wrong is being done? "The little lads get down on their haunches, place their backs against the derailed trucks, and then, placing their feet so as to get some 'purchase,' give a little jerk with their backs, and if they are experienced they replace the truck at the first effort. If they are weak they will require several efforts before they succeed."

How they escape permanent injury is a marvel! Can nothing be done for them?

The decline of family worship is rightly exercising our contemporary the Methodist Times. We recollect there was not very long ago a symposium in one of the magazines, which showed the rarity of family worship in the homes of modern Christians. The chief reason which is adduced for this change is the difficulty and awkwardness of assembling the family together. While this may apply to some cases, we have usually found that "where there's a will there's a way." It is not easy to do anything which is right; and if we once begin considering the ease with which we may do the will of God, we shall find how few are the duties which call for no sacrifice. Everyone who recognises the sacred duty and privilege of family worship will discover how to perform it. Some adaptation of home affairs will perhaps be necessary, but it is worth any inconvenience to maintain the family altar.

A most helpful series of lectures to Sunday-school teachers, on "The Firm Foundation of the Christian Faith," by Prof. Agar Beet, will be delivered at the offices of the Union in the Old Bailey during the next seven weeks. The purpose will be to clear away the fog of uncertainty that hangs over many of the great fundamental truths of religion in the minds of a large number of those who are at work training the young. The many controversies and divergent views of the time, when viewed from without, tend to unsettle the confidence of not a few earnest Christian men and women, and any help to realize the immovable stability, as well as the grand simplicity, of the saving truths of our faith will be gratefully received. The failure of much Sunday school work is due more to its vagueness than to any other cause. Whatever be the possibilities of religious teaching in our Government day-schools, definiteness should be one of the salient features of all Sunday school work.

In the current Fortnightly an interesting account is given of the institution called Ruskin Hall, at Oxford, which bids fair to fill an important function. One of the frequent causes of trouble in the industrial world is the fact that so many labour leaders have never had the opportunity of studying the conditions of social progress and prosperity, except from their own point of view. Ruskin Hall provides such an opportunity. A year's course of resident study is arranged for at a rate, for tuition and board, which is within the reach of many working men, the total cost amounting to £31 a year, a part of which may be defrayed by scholarships. The main principles of social science, of true citizenship, of economic well-being, are carefully taught, and encouragement given to the formation of broad, accurate, well-informed judgments. Few forms of education are more needed. Such institutions—and they are multiplying—ought to have a widespread and beneficent influence.

Dr. Wace has done the Protestant cause a great service by his masterly lecture on the "Reformation Settlement," in which he controverted the position taken up by Canon MacColl in his book under that title, that no such great or drastic changes were introduced into England at that time as we have been in the habit of claiming. Dr. Wace conclusively proved the contrary, and drew a vivid contrast between religious life and usages at the beginning of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries respectively. During that period the following reforms were accomplished by constitutional means—the prohibition of the once general custom of bequeathing money for masses for the dead; the substitution of Holy Communion for Mass, of English for Latin in the services, and the universal reading of the Bible throughout the land. It is the attempted re-institution of some of these discarded and forbidden usages that is creating the present crisis in the Church. Their abolition cost the nation a deadly struggle. Their successful revival would gradually undo the work of four centuries of spiritual travail. Therefore the call comes to all true Protestants to watch and to fight.

We have been accustomed to believe that the so-called "Concert of Europe" was little better than a charter of impunity for the Turk in his habits of oppression and cruelty towards subject races. There is one happy result, however, which must be put down to its credit. The interference of the Powers in the case of Crete has proved an immense blessing to that unhappy island. Prince George of Greece, who was appointed governor some two years ago, has shown great tact and firmness in his manner of ruling the complex population. For the first time Mohammedans and Christians are living together in peace and increasing amity. For many centuries there was a state of intermittent warfare between these two classes, and it seemed as though the sword would never be sheathed. A regimen of combined firmness and tact has proved the contrary; and once more evidence has been shown that, while Mohammedans are incapable of ruling Christians equitably, Christians can and do rule Mohammedans justly and well.

According to the Berlin correspondent of The Standard, slavery still flourishes in the German African Colonies. Special reference has been made to Togoland in a report recently laid before the Reichstag by the well-known traveller, Herr Krause. We believe this traffic in human beings is repugnant to the sentiment of all Christian people in the Fatherland. The Government has decided that the matter shall be brought before the Reichstag for discussion.

The late Miss S. E. Cooper, of Blackburn, a member of the Congregational Church in that town, has bequeathed the interest of £1,000 to Rev. J. P. Wilson, pastor of the church, during his lifetime. Should Mrs. Wilson survive her husband, she is to benefit in the same way from this practical benevolence. What care would be lifted from many ministerial homes were such acts of practical sympathy more frequent, even if on a lesser scale! To many a struggling, godly minister substantial help in this form would not only relieve immediate anxiety, but indirectly give a new verve to his preaching.

We trust that the dearth of candidates for service in foreign mission fields, which the London Missionary Society laments, is not a general experience. The outlook in heathen lands would be dark indeed if it were so. No recruits, no volunteers to maintain or extend the work which consecrated souls have pursued in many a far-off station with evident signs of Divine approval! The Chronicle of the L.M.S. reports five resignations from highly-valued workers during the past few months—chiefly in consequence of ill-health; and then goes on to say:

> Several appointments, urgently needing to be filled, have been postponed from month to month, both by the Ladies' Examination Committee and the Men's, because no suitable candidates were forthcoming. Is the financial straitening which has been pressing on the Society for the last few years to be followed by a dearth of workers?

We sincerely hope not. The record of the L.M.S. is so honourable, its missionaries have been so enthusiastic, and its labours so abundant—that we fearlessly believe God has workers in his own mind who, in due season, will offer themselves, and hand on the torch of Divine Truth in the world's dark places, and win jewels for the King's Crown. "Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest to send forth labourers into his harvest."

The Culture of Family Life.

THERE have been satisfactory indications lately of a renaissance of interest in the home as the centre of influence. We were glad to see in one of the leading newspapers a report of a sermon delivered by Dr. McClure, headmaster of Mill Hill School, in which the preacher said: "You cannot love your dear ones too much; you cannot dwell on your family relationships too much. Make much of family life, strive to understand the fulness of human affection. For God is love, and every time that human love throbs up within us it should give us a foretaste of the Divine love." Three prominent public men on the same day alluded to the home as being the neglected key to national righteousness.

All this attention to the home will, we believe, result in good. God has set the world's inhabitants in families. Not one of them but belongs to a family, and the Bible lays extraordinary stress on this fact. We have lost much of the Jewish reverence for family life, and our social system of to-day minimises relationships. This change in thought has, we are certain, resulted in a revolution of society—taking the word in the widest sense—which has been far from good. Nowadays children are often permitted to treat their parents in a spirit of chaffing contempt, which has the most injurious effect on themselves as well as on their fathers and mothers. They are allowed to criticise and sneer at relatives, and hold all blood relationships at a discount. It is quite true that we choose our friends, but cannot choose our relatives. Nevertheless, the family ought to be a sacred idea, and the ties of relationship ought to be held more seriously than they are. The most beautiful passages in classic biographies are those which tell of the self-sacrificing love like that of Charles Lamb for his sister, the regard of Dr. Arnold for his family, the warm-hearted love of David Livingstone for his home folks, and similar cases of the cultivation of home affection.

There is a deep religious idea embodied in the family quite apart from the social and economic standpoint. Set as we are by God's good hand in families, He means the family to be united in heaven as on earth. If we mar from carelessness or selfishness the unity of the family on earth, we hinder the realization of the unity above. The home circle contains the keenest critics of our religious life, and that is one reason why sometimes members of a Christian family may stand aloof from professing religion. Sincere and stalwart must be the faith that stands the scrutiny of unsympathetic members of the family. Yet if it pass the test, the effect will be certain to be seen sooner or later in the conversion of those we love, but who at present love not God. We have repeatedly spoken of the decadence of family worship. We would plead with those who have allowed this custom to fall into abeyance to build afresh the family altar. What a happy thing it would be if, in this closing year of the century, a prayerful attempt were made to link again the family bonds which have been broken by gusts of passion or misdeeds, and by loving self-sacrifice begin to realize the unity and blessedness which will win this exquisite relationship with Christ. "Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother."

The School of the Cross is the school of light; it discovers the world's vanity, baseness, and wickedness, and lets us see more of God's mind. Out of dark affliction comes a spiritual light.—Bunyan.

"Wilt Thou Not Revive Us Again?"

DR. GRIFFITH JOHN, of China, once wrote, "Brethren, we all need power; we need spiritual power; and we need the maximum of this power. Let the Church be full of the Holy Ghost, and she will be full of Divine light and power. Her messengers to the world will be lights burning and shining, kindling by their touch the spirits of their fellow-men." To those who are in a position to take a broad survey of the present state of religion, there is presented this solemn fact: That there have without doubt been periods in the history of the churches of Jesus Christ when the ideal condition of spiritual life indicated by Dr. Griffith John seemed to have come nearer its realization than appears in the actual experience of the great majority of the churches of to-day. Perhaps there is no problem that is more deeply engaging the prayerful thought of many of our ministers at the present time.

This is, in itself, a sign full of hope; for when the ambassadors of peace begin to weep for the sins of God's children, and to take up the prayer, "Wilt thou not revive us again: that thy people may rejoice in Thee?" then we may know that the set time to favour Zion

CANNOT BE FAR DISTANT.

The age in which we live is one peculiarly marked by religious activity, elaborate organization, and noble generosity in connection with the work of God on every hand.

Never were such energetic measures called into operation for the evangelization of the heathen world as we are privileged to behold at the close of the nineteenth century. Never was so much zeal displayed by the churches in combating the forces of evil in the form of intemperance, gambling, impurity, and Sabbath desecration as is witnessed to-day. Never did the churches possess, and use so vigorously, such vast and magnificently adapted machinery with which to execute their divinely appointed tasks as we see on every side. And our hearts rejoice in that we are privileged to live in such an age. Truly, the lines have fallen unto us in pleasant places, and we have a goodly heritage. We live in the day of golden opportunities. Moreover, it is pleasing beyond all expression to observe in not a few instances unmistakable signs of a healthy spiritual vigour in church life. Prayer is prevalent. The ministry of the Word is effective. Faith triumphs. Through the mighty working of the Spirit of God in the hearts and lives of believers, the subjugation of the strongholds of sin becomes more and more manifest. Transgressors learn the ways of the Lord, and sinners are converted. And, to see the beauty of the Lord thus adorning His churches, and to behold the work of the Lord thus established in their midst, fills the heart with joy. Such churches have discovered something of the truth underlying the words of Dr. Griffith John to which allusion has been made.

But is not this happy condition of things found to be in the history of the churches? What of the churches generally? Even in those instances where there are certain external marks of prosperity, such as crowded congregations, well equipped and vigorously prosecuted agencies of a religious and philanthropic character, and many other expressions of zealous activity, the question that has to be faced is as to how far the hidden springs of spiritual life beneath the surface are deep and full; how far the kingdom of God is, in reality, being advanced. For if, as churches, we fail here, we come short of the glory of God. Whatever else may be achieved, the supreme object of the Master remains unaccomplished. Is there not a widespread feeling extending through many of the churches at the present time that a manifest decline of spiritual life is with us? Is not the fact pressing itself more and more forcibly on the minds of God's children that the churches have lost to a large extent the conscious presence and power of the Holy Ghost? Where is the spirit of which brings church members together for the express purpose of pleading with God for the opening of the windows of heaven? Where is the hunger of the heart for a fuller knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, which induces a keen delight in the exposition of the Word, and leads to a diligent and intelligent study of the Scriptures? Where is the burning zeal for souls which forces Christian men and women out into the highways and hedges to rescue the perishing, and bring sinners to Christ? "As soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children."

AN EXCEPTIONAL EXPERIENCE

Is there no answer here to the question which is being asked on every hand as to the reason why there is such a dearth of conversions in the churches? A spirit of Laodicean indifference and worldly conformity has been allowed to creep into our midst. Many professing Christians are lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God. Not a few church members seem to be far more engrossed with the pursuit of material wealth and worldly honour than with the promotion of Zion's interests.

THE SAVIOUR'S INJUNCTION,

"Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness," has become, in many instances, a dead letter, with no power to move the soul to holy ambition and heavenly aspiration. The baneful influence of this spirit of unbelief and worldly conformity is painfully manifest. It is paralyzing the Church's energies, weakening its stability, and frustrating the Master's purpose.

Many of our ministers and leaders in the churches have come to feel that what is needed pre-eminently at the present time is a baptism of Divine Power for the deepening of the spiritual life of believers. There are those of God's children connected with the various sections of the Christian Church who, realizing their need of this deeper work of grace in their own souls, are to be found gathering themselves together from time to time to wait upon God in prayer and meditation, to the end that they may be brought into closer fellowship with Christ, and receive a fuller baptism of the Holy Spirit. Has not the time arrived when the churches of Jesus Christ might, either and with untold and unimagined gain to their spiritual influence, meet to seek definitely, through the prayer of faith, a deeper experience of the life of God?

Never will God use any church as his chosen instrument for effecting the salvation of the unregenerate until the truth contained in Acts i. 8 has become the actual experience of those who form that church. God's own people stand to-day in urgent need of a Divine quickening. Might not the churches, in their Associations and Synods, prayerfully consider whether concerted action could not be taken towards encouraging their members, as such, to come together with more or less frequency for purposes of mutual edification in the deepest spiritual sense of the term?

Are there not in our midst men of God, whose ministry has been marked by more than ordinary spiritual power, who would be gratefully welcomed if they could be set free as the messengers of God to go in and out among the churches, as did the Apostles of old, to confirm the faith of believers, and to stimulate them to covet earnestly the highest spiritual gifts?

When a Pentecostal manifestation of the Divine power is found to have entered into the experience of the ministers, office-bearers, members, Sunday-school teachers, and all those who are actively engaged in the service of God in connection with the churches of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, then shall the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth—then shall the earth yield her increase, and God, even our own God, shall bless us. God shall bless us, and all the ends of the earth shall fear Him. Not till then. F. J. F.

Mr. Moody's Friends.

A DRAWING-ROOM meeting of friends of Mr. Moody was held on the 5th inst., at the house of Mr. Stokes (68, Park Avenue, New York), a munificent donor to the Y.M.C.A. in Rome (where he has "built them a synagogue," or at least an institution) as well as in other places. The meeting was held in the interest of the Northfield and Mount Hermon Schools, and the Bible Institute at Chicago.

Mr. W. R. Moody remarked that the real and best endowment existed in the hearts of those who loved his father and his work. He gave a lucid and touching account of the inception, progress, and present position of the schools, and said that their three chief characteristics were:—The Bible the basis of all education; The dignity of manual labour; and, The provision of an inexpensive training for promising students who were unable to pay large school fees. The institutions provided one half, and the students or their friends the other.

Mr. Speer said that it remained to be proved whether Mr. Moody's work in founding the schools was a great success or a great failure. That depended on those who survived him. If the institutions are maintained as they began, then they will be a great and permanent blessing; if otherwise, a mournful failure.

Mr. Dodge spoke in similar terms, and thanked God that He had given Moody two such sons and son-in-law to carry on the work which he had left. He was reminded by that meeting of an occasion when he sat with his dear friend on Mount Hermon, of which the latter had just come into possession. After a heart-to-heart conversation Mr. Moody knelt down and consecrated the ground to God in a prayer such as he had never heard before or since. The site, with all that might be placed upon it, was thus rendered back into the hands of Him who had given it, and God will care for his own.

Forthcoming Paris Exhibition

IT has been the earnest wish of the M'All Mission, in common with others interested in the evangelization of France, to make use of the coming Exhibition for special efforts to reach, not only the crowds of French, but the people from all parts of the world who will be visiting the Exhibition.

A site that was at one time under consideration having had to be given up, it seemed as if the project must be altogether abandoned, when an existing hall, nearly opposite the Porte Rapp, one of the principal exits, was unexpectedly offered; and this offer is still open. The M'All Mission, owing to its already unsatisfactory financial position, is unable to undertake any pecuniary responsibility in the matter, but will gladly help in arranging meetings if the funds can be obtained. A special committee has therefore been formed to have charge of the work, composed of M. Sautter and Rev. C. E. Greig, representing the McAll Mission; M. Theodore Monod, representing French Protestantism; and M. Vasseur and Mr. J. G. Alexander representing the Society of Friends, some of whose members are taking a warm interest in the effort.

A sum of not less than £1,200, of which only a small proportion has yet been promised, must be raised in order to secure the premises and fit them up for Gospel preaching and Scripture and tract distribution. The prayers of those interested in the extension of the Saviour's kingdom are asked that this opportunity for making known the love of Christ may not be lost. Communications may be addressed to Mr. J. B. Braithwaite, 312, Camden Road, London, N.; or Mr. J. G. Alexander, 8, Grove Hill, Tunbridge Wells.

The Student Movement at Bristol. — A course of twelve lectures is now being delivered weekly at Bristol in connection with the Student Volunteer Missionary Union. The attendance so far has been particularly encouraging, and increasing interest is being manifested in missionary enterprise.

The Bible in Japan.—I.

THE circulation of Scriptures in Japan has been attended with special difficulties that have constantly interfered with its progress. The chief hindrance has been the universal contempt to which any person is subjected who engages in any sort of traffic. According to the old and traditional ideas, tradesmen were classed next to the tanners and butchers, who were too vile to mingle with other people, and had to live in a quarter by themselves. No matter in what the trade consisted, the very fact that a man sold articles of any kind made him an object of contempt.

These hereditary notions deterred men of education and social standing from engaging in the work of Bible selling, because they would at once lose caste, and their influence as evangelists or teachers would thus be diminished. To some extent the same prejudice existed towards any foreigner who attempted the sale of books. A common idea was that he was doing so for gain; and such persons were looked upon as belonging to an inferior rank and unsuited to be teachers. For these reasons only men in distress, or of the lower class, could be obtained to act as colporteurs, and these would inevitably give up selling Bibles just as soon as they could receive employment as evangelists.

Until recently the booksellers were usually reluctant to sell Bibles, or any Christian books, because it would create feeling against them on the part of their customers, and thus injure their general trade. Of late, however, the hostility towards Christianity among the Buddhists and others has ceased to hinder the booksellers from selling Scriptures; and now they are on sale at in Japan. In fact, the demand for Bibles seems to have become so universal that they are fast becoming one of the essential portions of a complete stock-in-trade. The change in public sentiment is most evident and remarkable in the success that has been met with by Rev. Mr. Snyder, who has recently given his attention to this branch of Christian work.

About six months ago Mr. Snyder began in a small way to see what he could do in the circulating of Scriptures as a means of spreading abroad a knowledge of Christ. By degrees he gave more time and thought to it, as he discovered that here was a new and most promising field for Christian effort. One method was to go from house to house, and to his surprise he found that on an average he was able to sell one of the Gospels or a New Testament in seven out of every ten houses that he visited. The same results were met with in Sendai and Yokohama.

Barcelona Protestant Hospital.

THE year just closed is one of the most prosperous we have known in connection with this institution. Never have we had so many patients; never have so many serious cases been successfully treated; never have the relations between the patients and the working staff been more harmonious and profitable, and seldom have we had to record so few deaths. In all, sixty-six patients, of whom eighteen were foreigners, have been treated, making 2,383 days of residence, or from six to seven patients per diem. Only three deaths have taken place, and these were hopeless cases from the beginning. Particulars are given in the report.

Trials and anxiety have not been wanting, but when it seemed as if the last shilling would have to be spent, the Lord has sent the needed funds. Our income has been £473; our expenditure £485. A work of this kind cannot be self-supporting; but how much it is valued at Barcelona is shown by the fact that £242 were raised by local subscriptions, donations, and collections. The German Emperor has again sent a donation of £15. I trust our English friends will not forget the needs of the suffering Protestants in Barcelona, nor the home which we are very anxious to have for our aged poor. I will gladly receive and forward subscriptions, and send reports to any interested in the work.

Notes from New York.

DR. MADISON C. PETERS, of the Bloomingdale Reformed Church, has resigned his pastorate because he cannot any longer continue to baptize infants. As the Bloomingdale Church was considered one of the most liberal in the city, this action of its pastor is the more significant, as showing a reaction in favour of the more conservative religious views. It has made the deeper impression because it follows, within a year, the entering of the Episcopal Church by Dr. Briggs, formerly a Presbyterian, and the "going over to Rome" of Dr. De Costa, of the Episcopal Church. In a city like New York, where all the ministers live closer to the public than in London, and where they are better and more widely "known," therefore, than is the case in the British capital, these occurrences attract wider attention, and produce larger results than many people would at first think. Dr. Peters has had no call to any other church, and has no definite plans for the future. He has been at the Bloomingdale Church for eleven years, and has brought the membership up from a very small number to between five and six hundred. The original church was formed by persons representing twelve different religious bodies.

"General" Henry H. Hadley, lay director of the Church Army, has tendered his resignation to the Church Army Commission, under whom he immediately worked. He points out that no harm will come to the posts already established in the different dioceses, because the Army is operating on a diocesan or local basis, which would seem to show that the maintenance of a central authority in New York administering for the whole country did not find favour with the bishops and ministers as a whole.

More than a hundred persons have engaged passage with the New York State Christian Endeavour excursion to the international convention to be held in London next July.

Zambesi Industrial Mission.

A MEETING to bid farewell to six missionaries was held on Thursday last, at 1, Gresham Street. Sir Brampton Gurdon, M.P., presided, and briefly described the nature of the work in Africa, giving some helpful advice to the party going out, which consisted of Messrs. Valentine, Schwarzel, Holmes, Chorley, Rowlands, and Price. The last-named had already served four years in British Central Africa; the others were new men.

After each had given a brief testimony, Mr. Caldwell sought to emphasize one thought that seemed to possess the mind of the Lord Jesus during his ministry on earth—the thought of his being a Sent One—a Missionary. In almost every recorded utterance of our Lord in St. John's Gospel, He refers to his Father as the One who had sent Him—sent, not to do his own will, not to speak his own words, not to do his own works, not to seek his own glory, but to do the will and the works of the One that sent Him. Mr. Caldwell urged a careful study of the more than forty passages in which Christ thus speaks of Himself as the One sent. The missionary holds the same relation to Christ as He held to the Father. "As the Father hath sent Me, so have I sent you." "Go; lo, I am with you."

Addresses were also delivered by Mr. Grant Jackson, of Edinburgh, and Rev. John Johnston, Raleigh Memorial Church, who dwelt chiefly on the civilizing and spiritual value of industrial missions and the power of prayer.

Naples Sailors' Rest.—Mr. Stephen Burrowes writes that a good work is being done in connection with the rising Mission at Torre, while the Naples Rest and the various movements connected therewith are also making satisfactory progress. The branch at Catania is developing under Mr. Cassia, the Waldensian colporteur. A debt still remains on the mission ship St. Paul. Mr. Burrowes' address is the Sailors' Rest, 7 Vico 2, del Piliero, Naples.

The War in South Africa.

From a Prisoner of War.

Many friends of the troops will read with interest the following extract from a letter by a man in the Royal Irish Fusiliers. The references to the 18th Hussars will touch hearts in the East as well as at home, for along with the Glosters they proceeded to South Africa from India:—

"The Boer Commandant here (at Waterspaal) has been very good to us in supplying us with a large tent for the purpose of conducting religious worship, and I am very pleased to let you know that God has blessed us wonderfully in the various meetings which have been conducted from time to time under the leadership of Sergeant Dudley of the 18th Hussars, assisted by Sergeant Hewitt of my regiment. Quite a large crowd gathers outside our tent to hear the Divine truths which are preached.

"Many of the men seem to pay great attention to what is being said. We had a watch-night service in our tent, and it was a very solemn and a most impressive gathering. At the close of one meeting we formed a ring outside the tent and sang 'God Save our Gracious Queen' in good old English style, and gave three cheers for Her Majesty. I am glad to say that many men have come out on the Lord's side during the past two months whilst we have been here as prisoners of war."

Literature for the Front.

Friends of the troops in South Africa continue to show a lively interest in their moral and spiritual comfort and well-being. The various agencies which aim at these objects are busy, and books and papers are being sent for different parts of the colony.

The Marked Testaments are much appreciated by the missionaries. There is a proposal to send out another supply, for which the workers of the South Africa General Mission have cabled. Help towards the object may be sent to the hon. sec. of the Association for the Free Distribution of the Scriptures, Chesils, Christchurch Road, Hampstead, N.W.

The striking booklet, At Modder River, giving incidents of mission work amongst soldiers whilst under fire in South Africa, has been issued in an enlarged form, and with illustrations, by Mr. Arthur Mercer, secretary of the South Africa General Mission, 17, Homefield Road, Wimbledon, S.W. (One penny.) A booklet which many will like to read is: A Message from South Africa to the Christian People of Great Britain, by Mrs. Lewis, sister of the Prime Minister of Cape Colony. (One penny. Marshall Bros.)

Dr. C. F. Harford-Battersby has introduced a timely inset into his little book, Daily: A Help to Private Prayer. (1s. Marshall Bros.) In the form of a leaflet he sets out the various objects calling for intercession in the present time of national anxiety; and those who follow the plan will have the consciousness of being in the company of many who, with one accord from day to day, are approaching the Throne of Grace in definite and urgent petition concerning soldiers and others who are "in danger, necessity, and tribulation" in South Africa.

The Indian Famine.

In a stirring utterance to the Viceroy's council, Lord Curzon recognised that the authorities had to deal with a visitation unprecedented in character and intensity. The news which continues to arrive from many quarters more than bears out his lordship's words, and is indeed of a terrible nature.

The kindness of our readers has enabled us to despatch help to reliable workers in several of the most deeply afflicted districts, our conviction being that the missionaries of the various evangelical denominations constitute the most reliable medium through which to alleviate the sufferings of the people. We shall continue to remit at short intervals as funds come in.

Saddening intelligence has been received from the missionaries of the Irish Presbyterian Church. Rev. R. Gillespie, writing from Borsad to Rev. D. G. Barkley, under date January 26, says:

"As to the heathen here, their state is terrible. Deaths from cold and hunger are of nightly occurrence. On the way to inspect a village school I noticed a man asleep, as I thought. I went up and found him dead, and on my way back I heard that two other dead bodies had been found not far from the place where he was lying. There is a poorhouse here, which I visited. I found 150 children and 180 adults, all fearfully emaciated, and not one blanket among them all. There had been frost the night before. Government gives each person fifteen ounces of food daily, and leaves the matter of clothing, except in case of the sick, to private charity. So everybody's business becomes nobody's business, and those who would otherwise live are permitted to die of cold." There is a large orphanage at Mr. Gillespie's headquarters, in which many more children have been received since the famine began, and, as to those now being offered, he says: "There are so many orphans to be had that we cannot take in—children of whom one parent is living; and as I give them a few pice for food and send them away, I almost feel as if their death would be on my head." Mr. Barkley may be addressed at the Assembly's offices, 12, May Street, Belfast.

Mr. John Jackson, of the Mission to Lepers, writes in the interests of those unhappy creatures who are smitten by the double sorrows of leprosy and famine: "The famine needs are urgent. In many of our asylums the numbers are largely increased by the leper victims of famine, who are naturally among the first to feel its severity. Diseased, emaciated figures come stealing to the doors of the asylums; and the kind-hearted missionaries plead most earnestly for funds to relieve the frightful distress existing among this helpless class."

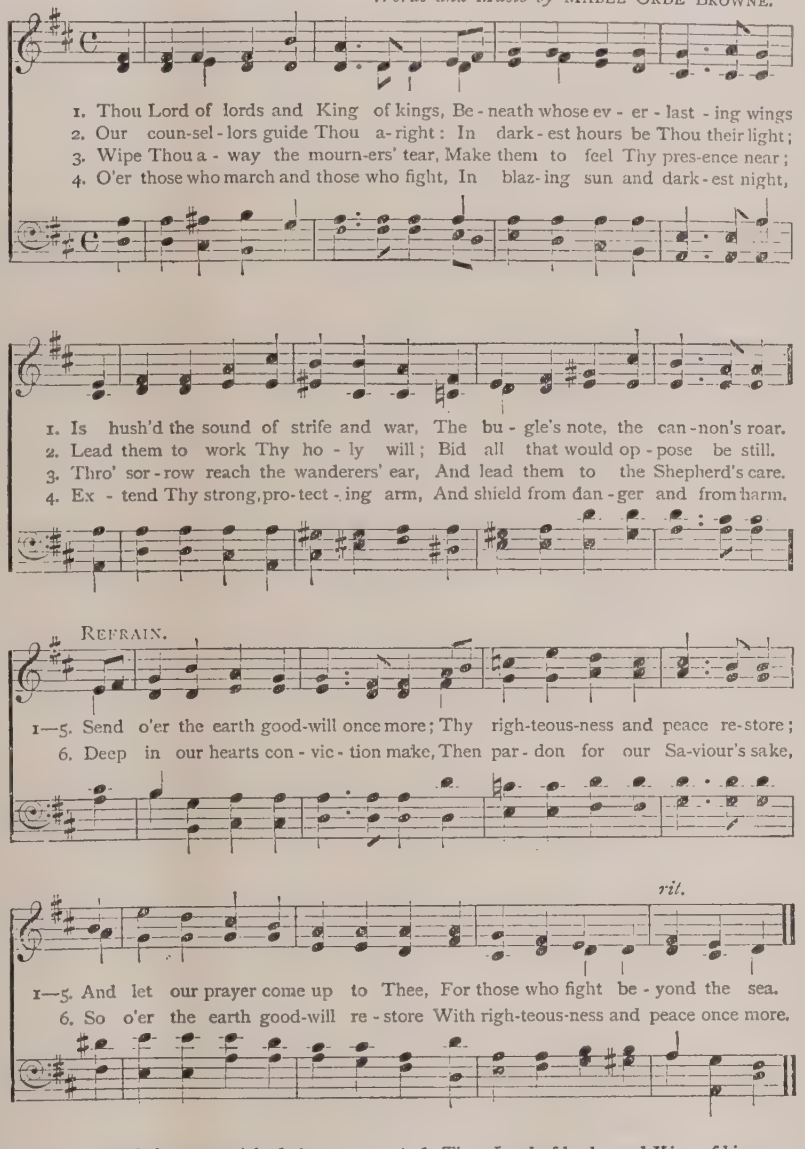
Mr. Isu Churran, of the Indian Christian Realm Mission (Raj-i-Masih), writes from Almora:—"The famine in this district is working sad havoc. Gaunt figures totter about the bazaars, or lie in the roads and fields, and some seem so dazed and stupefied with suffering, that when a coin is thrown to them they are unable to look up to see where the money is thrown from. Cattle are offered for sale for a few coppers by those who will not eat meat, in order that their lives may be saved for a few days."

From a communication received from Mr. Alfred S. Dyer, it appears that Pundita Ramabai is feeling the strain very keenly. Two of the four wells at her village of Mukti have dried up. Yet she cannot refrain from receiving more starving young women and girls. Three weeks ago she had added seventy to her already large family of over 300.

The Queen has sent the Lord Mayor a cheque for £1,000 as a donation to the Mansion House Fund, and contributions have also been received from the Prince and Princess of Wales and the Duke and Duchess of York.

Thou Lord of Lords.

Words and Music by Mabel Orde Browne.



1. Thou Lord of lords and King of kings, Be - neath whose ev - er - last - ing wings
2. Our coun-sel - lors guide Thou a-right: In dark - est hours be Thou their light;
3. Wipe Thou a - way the mourn-ers' tear, Make them to feel Thy pres-ence near;
4. O'er those who march and those who fight, In blaz - ing sun and dark - est night,
1. Is hush'd the sound of strife and war, The bu - gle's note, the can - non's roar.
2. Lead them to work Thy ho - ly will; Bid all that would op - pose be still.
3. Thro' sor - row reach the wanderers' ear, And lead them to the Shepherd's care.
4. Ex - tend Thy strong, pro-tect - ing arm, And shield from dan - ger and from harm.
Refrain.
1—5. Send o'er the earth good-will once more; Thy righ-teous-ness and peace re-store;
6. Deep in our hearts con - vic - tion make, Then par - don for our Sa-viour's sake, rit.
1—5. And let our prayer come up to Thee, For those who fight be - yond the sea.
6. So o'er the earth good-will re - store With righ-teous-ness and peace once more.

5. To wounded, weary, sick, forlorn,
To those by burning fever worn,
Speak, and rebuke with mighty power
Their various ills this very hour.

6. Thou Lord of lords, and King of kings,
Whose presence judgment with it brings;
Come Thou our nation purify
From all the sin that meets Thine eye.

In Charente-Inferieure.

Before the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, Charente-Inférieure was an important centre of Protestant activity; it appears now to be returning to its old faith and affection. M. Robert, pasteur at Pons, directs a deeply interesting work on aggressive lines, and enjoys the co-operation of M. Fr. Bonhomme, an ex-priest, whose "escape" from the Church of Rome stands greatly to his credit throughout the Saintonge.

Other devoted helpers are also engaged, so that M. Robert directs a work which comprises ten places of worship, and with public efforts for worship or instruction in thirty-two localities. Friends in England have rendered substantial help in this enterprise, and their continued sympathy is confidently relied upon.

Day by Day.

SUNDAY, February 25. Psa. xii.

WITH what a delightful cry this psalm begins! So short, so comprehensive, so appropriate. Between a question and our answer, between a temptation and our yielding, between a proposal and our acceptance, we may launch this arrow from our bow, directing our prayer, and looking up. How often in the midst of a sermon, or an argument, or a rain of hailstones of critical sarcastic taunts, may we send up the cry, Help Lord!

When godly men cease and faithful men fail, there is the more need to turn to God, from whom such men are sent. "There was a man sent from God. . . ." At any moment, God may send a man who can take the place of those who have ceased. He can replace a Spurgeon or a Moody. Do not bewail the paucity of great or good men; your regrets are vain and useless. Pray the Lord of the harvest that He may send forth labourers.

The contrast in the psalm is between the words of sinners and those of the Lord (6). The words of which the psalmist bitterly complains are described as vain and empty, as flattering and double, as proud and vainglorious. They are hateful to the Lord, by whomsoever spoken, and He will cause them to cease. Whenever they are spoken contemptuously against one of his children, He notes them. Oh, for another Pentecost to fill with love and praise lips that are now filled with pride and hatred! What a contrast it is to turn from these words to those of God, which have come down through the ages, tried and tested by myriads of saints, by the fires of criticism and rejection! Let us feed on them till we partake of their nature and are impervious to the fires.

MONDAY, February 26. Psa. xiii.

A wonderful and precious psalm, wrung from a breaking heart, agonized with God's delays and apparent forgetfulness.

Five times the psalmist cries, How long? He reminds us of men who hold a fort. Around are the besiegers, with their terraces of cannon; attacks are frequent, disease and shortness of food are doing their deadly work within the lines. Message after message has been sent by runners to hasten the tardy progress of the relieving column. But still it tarries! The disciples may have said it, when toiling across the lake; and the sisters, when Jesus came not to the house where Lazarus lay slowly dying. We have said it often, How long? How long?

The primary cause in the psalmist's case seems to have been the hostility of his foes. Read 1 Sam. i., and see how well it befits such a case as Hannah's, vexed by her adversary. But perhaps we need not look so far back; we can furnish a parallel from our own experience.

How pathetic the appeal, "Lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death"! How cogent the appeal, "But I have trusted in thy mercy!" Trust on, O sorrowful and harassed heart! thy help has been laid on One who is mighty, and He is at hand. Thou canst bear the ordeal, or it would never be permitted. The Physician's hand is on thy pulse, whilst the surgeon is using the knife. Be of good cheer; as this psalm sung itself clear, so shall thy life clear itself also. You shall yet rejoice in his salvation, and let the certain hope of this be for thy comfort. He is dealing bountifully with thee. Thou shalt see it ere long; be of good cheer. Wait, I say, on the Lord.

TUESDAY, February 27. Psa. xiv.

The fool says it, but he does not believe it; he says it because he is a fool. No wise man can affirm that there is no God. The most he can say is that he does not know of any. "I have lived a long time," said an aged Esquimaux to Sir John Franklin, "but I have never seen God." Even if you could prove that God was nowhere in our world, or in our sphere, yet you could not prove that He was not somewhere else, in the height above or in the depth beneath. You cannot prove a negative. You would have to be yourself God, and possessed of an infinite knowledge, before you could say that God was nowhere existent.

But how often the men who profess themselves satisfied that there is no God are men of profligate and careless life. Their photograph is set forth in the following verses, which are only too true and accurate in their delineation of men whom we have known, and of whom it seemed true to say that their lives were so evil that it was convenient to believe that there was no God to bring them to account. They had so blackened the window of their souls that the light of God's glorious personality and power could not shine in unto them. Their deeds affected their judgment, silenced the voice of reason and conscience, and suggested desires which became parents to their atheistic philosophy.

From such men the believer looks with longing desire, when the saints shall no longer be a little harried community in the midst of their mighty foes, but when their captivity shall be brought back, and they shall reign with Christ over a saved and righteous world. May the Lord bring back our captivity, whether as churches or individuals!

WEDNESDAY, February 28. Psa. xv.

God's tabernacle for us is the covert of his wing, his environment, the sense of his perpetual presence. Not in the next world only, but in this, He spreads his tabernacle over his own (Rev. vii. 15, R.V.) His holy hill is the place of separation, which is also the place of vision. From the hill-top we look across the valley to the unseen and eternal. From such a place we have an immense purchase and advantage in dealing with men. What an advantage the holding of a kopje gives a combatant. Mr. Moody said once in the Cooper Institute, "Since I left the world, forty years ago." Yet few men have done more for the world. If you would move the world, you must find a pivot outside of it.

But notice the characteristics of those who find God to be all this to them. They must walk uprightly, lifting up their faces to God and man without shame, as those whose conscience is void of offence. They must work righteousness, and speak truth. These three positive qualities are followed by three negative ones, which do not appear to have impressed the imagination and gripped the conscience of modern Christians to the extent they should. Not to slander another, not to take advantage of another, not to pass on a reproach against a neighbour—these are not always discoverable in professing Christians—to despise a reprobate, even if he is a millionaire; to honour the God-fearing, even if they are paupers; to stand to our word as our bond, even though we lose by it; to lend our money freely to those who need our help (see Ex. xxii. 25; Lev. xxv. 36) are rare virtues, and secure an unmovableness and steadfastness of character and influence.

THURSDAY, March 1. Psa. xvi.

We have the authority of the Spirit at Pentecost for ascribing this Psalm to the sweet psalmist of Israel. Michtam, its heading, which means to hide or treasure, may imply that it is replete with golden wealth, or that it is full of hidden meaning. To its deep treasures there is no key like that given in the Person and work of the Lord Jesus (Acts ii. 25-31).

It is very blessed when the soul can truthfully tell God that it has no good outside the circle of his will, or the environment of his presence. Have you also come to feel that all your delight is in the people of God? If so, say these two things: speak them out, and take God from henceforth to be the portion of your inheritance and of your cup. What a word is this! To have a claim on the whole nature of the ever-blessed God! Have you ever taken an inventory of your property? Do you know what you possess? If so, why do you not thrust the fences of your conscious possession and enjoyment further and further out, so as to take in more of the acreage of that boundless territory which is yours in Christ? "Heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ."

How the thoughts crowd! That all God is ours; that the cup of our life is filled with his love; that He will maintain for us that which He has given us; that the measuring lines enclose pleasant things, and that the heritage is good—what blessings are these! But, in addition, whenever we are called to descend, as Jesus did, into the crypt of death, and to be able to sing, even as He did, the song of hope—to be sure that He will not leave us in the darkness: to know that He will show us the path of life, which shall lead us back into the daylight, into his presence, into fulness of joy, near his right hand, and amid pleasures for evermore—ah, what rapture is here!

FRIDAY, March 2. Psa. xvii.

The persecuted, misunderstood, and slandered soul has always the right of appeal to the Court of King's Bench. If you are conscious of your integrity, appeal from man to God. He will hear and vindicate you, and give a righteous judgment in your cause. How good it is when, like the Apostle, we have a conscience void of offence. Tried, but nothing found consciously in the bosom with which God could be displeased; the paths of the destroyer avoided; the steep cliffs held fast by the patient feet of the mountain climber. It is good when we feel that so much is true of us.

But still the sons of men oppress and rise up against us. Insensible to God's claims and to human suffering, they persecute the saints! With the stealth of a beast of prey they lie in wait for our fall! Satisfied with what this world can give, even to superfluity, they despise those whose only wealth is not that which the world accounts worth having! Ah, how much they vaunt themselves, and how keen the suffering they inflict by that sharp tongue! But there is a refuge for the saints in the marvellous loving-kindness of God. As the pupil of the eye is defended by strong frontal bones and eyelashes, eyelids, tear-water, and the spontaneous uplifting of the arm to ward off an injury, so will God protect us. As the mother bird spreads her wings to shelter her brood, so will God. He will deliver by his sword and by his hand (13, 14, R.V.). And there is a blessed moment coming when we shall awake to find ourselves in the very presence of God, changed into his likeness, and enjoying his favour—we shall be recompensed and satisfied then. The treasures of this world cannot satisfy and will not last, but "when I awake, I shall be satisfied."

SATURDAY, March 3. Psa. xviii.

This is one of the most sublime and beautiful of David's Psalms. It was probably written after his great wars were over, and tells the story of his great distress, and the manner in which Jehovah interposed for his relief, from which, in verse 20, he proceeds to lay down the general principles of the Divine government.

We may not dwell on the whole, but notice that every man brings the measure of his own nature to God, and receives according to what he brings, whether of mercy, uprightness, purity, or frowardness. What you are you will find God to be. With what measure you mete, it shall be measured to you again. And when the soul dares to make the uttermost use of God, what can it not do? It runs through a troop of opposition, it leaps over walls of division and separation, it wraps around its loins the girdle of strength, it climbs high places which had seemed destitute of foothold, it pursues its enemies on the battlefield, its head is lifted in conscious triumph.

"As for God, his way is perfect" (30). Dare to believe this, even though it may greatly exercise your faith to accept it. Say it again and again—"O my God, thy way is perfect." And then take a further step, if not by sight, yet by faith, and say, "He maketh my way perfect." It is a great thing to say such things, till at last the pained and weary heart dares to believe, and to utter a deep Amen, even if it cannot always add, Hallelujah.

Home Missions.

Mr. Quarrier's Work.

A SUNDAY AT THE HOMES.

A SUNDAY with the orphans gives inspiration to the visitor. No matter whether the sun shines or keeps hiding behind the clouds, there seems to be sunshine in every heart. With the chiming of the bells little groups move towards the church, a real House Beautiful, with its profusion of light and flowers, both akin to the little buds of humanity. Two large banks of choice blossoms on either side of the platform give one the impression of summer within winter.

The church is filled with young people—boys in the rear, girls in the front. It is an intelligent congregation, well-behaved, quiet, attentive. From the interest they take in the service, one can easily conclude how great the punishment would be to be kept away from church for any reason. Mr. Jack, who in many ways helps Mr. Quarrier, conducted the first part of the service, my husband the second. The Scripture portions are read by the children with emphasis and accuracy, with due regard to commas and full stops. The singing is hearty and joyful, and the listening such as to put many an adult to shame.

"A West End congregation," somebody remarked. Yes, indeed, and better than some. Look at that pretty, dark-eyed lassie, in her red bonnet, as she looks up wistfully to the preacher's face. Would she not delight any mother's heart? And who would recognize in the fair curls and refined features of another bonny face the offspring of degraded parents? In one sense those little ones belong to the highest aristocracy, for God is the Father of the fatherless, and Jesus is the King of kings.

The service finished, we walk down Love Avenue to Faith Avenue. Others go to Hope Avenue, &c. Praise Avenue encircles the city.

Destitution being the only plea for admission, ill-health is not reckoned a barrier to entrance.

Some only come to be nursed and cared for until the Master sees fit to remove them to the home above. For such and other cases of sickness two homes are provided, the "Elim Home" for boys, and "Bethesda" for girls. We entered the latter. It is light, cheerful, airy, and combines all the conveniences of the modern hospital. In the afternoon we attended a service at the

the first of a series of buildings proposed for the benefit of the poor, not far from the Orphan Homes. The situation is ideal, facing the south, and unfolding a charming panorama of hilly woodland.

In face of the great responsibilities which the management of the orphan colony involves, one is rather surprised that Mr. Quarrier should have felt led to engage in a new work of such importance and magnitude. To a wondering "Why?" he replied: "All felt the need of it; nobody seemed to want to do it. I started, and God has blessed my labours."

The first building, with an accommodation for thirty patients, each having a separate, good-sized bedroom, was opened nearly two years ago. For the first nine months the system of artificial temperature was followed with little good result. Since then the double windows had been removed, doors and windows thrown open, and patients instructed to sit in all kinds of weather and temperature bareheaded in open air. Shelters are provided against rain; but no mackintoshes allowed.

This so-called Nordrach treatment has proved a great success. According to the medical report, 21 per cent. were completely cured, and others much improved, taught how to fight the battle for life. It is interesting to note that almost every individual who has been under treatment continues to practise in their own dwelling the efficient ventilation in which they have been trained, thus disseminating the knowledge of the ordinary hygienic laws and of the means by which the infection of healthy individuals can be prevented.

Here, as at the orphanages, the one condition for admission is poverty. If you can pay you can't get in.

THREE MONTHS' RESIDENCE

is considered the least time necessary for effecting a cure, which is most probable in the first stage of consumption. Patients, therefore, in an advanced stage of the disease or with complications are not admitted. During the treatment the best quality of food is given. The diet is mixed, meat (one pound and a half daily, weighed after cooking) and sweet milk forming the chief part of it. After a stay from three to five months, patients have gained in weight from one to three stone. A treatment thus described necessarily involves a large outlay, but money cannot be put into question where the lives of thousands of mothers, fathers, and young people are at stake. Who will have a share in saving their lives?

An executive building, containing laundry, wash-house, suite of baths, and a secretary's home have been erected previous to admitting patients.

There is no sanatorium yet for men. The second building in construction, which is to hold forty patients, is also for women. The generous donor in the East of Scotland desires to remain unknown. £30,000 more is needed to complete the scheme of six sanatoria. The sum required for the daily maintenance of the present number of patients is £3,000 per annum. It will be £7,000 after the other building is completed and filled. W. M.

Police Court Missions.

PRACTICAL pity finds scope for full play in and out of the London police courts. Here, indeed, is an extensive field of opportunity—full of misery, merited or undeserved. There are those to be met with who have experienced temptation, not only to commit crime, but to despair of reaching a higher and nobler life. Magistrates, officials, and solicitors combine in their testimony as to the useful labours of the eighteen missionaries of the London Diocesan Police Court Mission.

The annual report of this agency, which is a branch of the Church of England Temperance Society, gives a concise summary of last year's work. Instances—numerous and pathetic—are recorded bearing upon the cases which have been dealt with. The destitute and fallen have been reclaimed, the despairing have heard words of encouragement and inspiration, and a helping hand is extended to those who are the victims of the sins and follies of others. An idea of the scope of the operations of the mission may be gathered from the report, which states that 12,383 visits have been paid to police courts and sessions, over £1,603 have been expended in helping cases at courts, and 657 persons have been placed in situations. The five mission women have had handed over to their care some 1,918 cases; 1,207 of these women and girls were actually dealt with, and no fewer than 11,595 visits were paid respecting these cases. The Women's Shelter Home has admitted forty-two patients, while the Boys' Shelter Home has received 150 lads.

It is earnestly hoped that the needs of this worthy agency will not be overlooked at the present time, and that its activity will not be hampered through lack of support. The secretary of the mission is Rev. J. H. A. Law, 4, Sanctuary, Westminster.

Cambridge Letter.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

SPECIAL services for undergraduates were held on Sunday, February 4, and three following days, in Holy Trinity Church, by Hon. and Rev. W. Talbot Rice, of Oxford. They were well attended throughout Mr. Rice's quiet but earnest appeals cannot have failed to have been a means of much blessing.

Last Sunday Rev. T. W. Drury, Principal of Ridley Hall, addressed a very well attended meeting of the Christian Union.

Rev. W. Gidney has given the University Missionary Union a brief account of the London Jews' Society, and Mr. L. H. Nott spoke on Haussaland—that vast country to which a small C.M.S. party has recently set out. Mr. Nott, who is himself kept from returning by ill-health, pleaded earnestly for the Haussas.

The University sermon was preached on Sunday, the 4th, by Rev. W. A. Whitworth, Vicar of All Saints, Margaret Street. Basing his sermon on Romans iv. 5, he dealt with the two conditions upon which the value of prayer depends, defining them as intention and attention. He suggested that these two words correspond with St. Paul's use of the terms faith and works.

On the following Sunday, in the unavoidable absence of the Dean of Lichfield, Professor Handley Moule preached the sermon. He took as his text, Rev. iii. 19. After deploring the long delay in the public summons to prayer, he expressed his regret that, in the Order of Intercession being used that day throughout England, there should be introduced into one of the Litanies intercession for the repose of the faithful departed. With that exception, however, he heartily approved of the Service of Intercession. He then dealt with God's great love for England, showing how He had first trained England and then entrusted her with that great empire which we see and feel to-day. Then passing on to the second part of his text, he showed how God had rebuked and chastened England during the past four months. Dr. Moule then alluded in most touching and sympathetic language to those lists of "casualties" which are not mere office lists, but which have doubtless been wet many a time with the tears of the leaders who have sent them.

"Henceforth."

"HENCEFORTH" my walk and life below
The power of Christ must clearly show;
No more in vanity of mind,
But to God's will my will resigned.
(Eph. iv. 17-19.)

"Henceforth" from sin's hard bondage free,
The Saviour's bond-slave I would be;
Rejoice at his command to move,
His grace sufficient daily prove.
(Rom. vi. 6, 7.)

"Henceforth" no other lord I own,
My aim to live for Christ alone;
Instead of self, God's blessed will
My only purpose to fulfil.
(2 Cor. v. 15.)

"Henceforth" in Christ I learn to grow,
A settled rest begin to know;
From craft and sleight of men secure,
My confidence is tried and sure.
(Eph. iv. 14, 15.)

"Henceforth" to me He will impart
The secret counsels of his heart.
He calls me friend. O wondrous bliss!
Can earthly joy compare with this?
(St. John xv. 15.)

"Henceforth" his work on earth I share,
And help his kingdom to prepare,
By catching men from sin's dread strife
To share the blessing of his life.
(St. Luke v. 10.)

"Henceforth," when earth's short life is run,
When victory by his grace is won,
A crown of righteousness for me,
The Lord Himself mine eyes shall see.
(2 Tim. iv. 7, 8.)

The P.S.A. Movement.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE IN BIRMINGHAM.

CARR'S LANE CHAPEL, Birmingham, was last week the rallying place of the leaders of the P.S.A. movement throughout the country, who foregathered in large numbers on the occasion of the fifth National Conference, and also to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation.

The Conference was convened by Mr. John Blackham, of West Bromwich, who was prominently associated with the formation of the first P.S.A. in the country, and has spent a quarter of a century of active service in the cause. Delegates attended from all parts, it being officially stated that over five hundred had accepted the invitation. For about a hundred of these hospitality was provided by Rev. F. W. Collyer and Mr. John Lawson, who acted as secretaries of this department.

At the opening gathering on Tuesday evening, a sermon was preached by Rev. R. J. Campbell, of Brighton, upon having regard to the character of the movement. All work conscientiously done had an immediate spiritual significance and a value for good, which, though it might not be evident to us now, was known to the great Artificer of our destinies. No work should be adventured upon without prayer. The preacher enlarged upon the power of prayer. It was truly said that "prayer would either make a man leave off sinning, or sinning would make him leave off praying." To pray for a man was to love him, for prayer was love at work.

Rev. J. H. Jowett presided at the Wednesday morning gathering and prayer-meeting. The Gospel of Jesus Christ, he said, was a Gospel to unite men. They must lay hold with the strongest possible grip of the primary truth, that Christ's Gospel was the only evangel that would touch the needs of men. There was a great temptation not to stand staunch to the faith, and an inclination to assume that they could discharge their duty by other means. But if they relied on anything else the result would prove a most melancholy fiasco. Commerce, amusement, literature would not bring men into unity. "Made in Germany"—the very words showed jealousy, and the phrase had been coined as a kind of national defence; and yet a distinguished English thinker had told them that commerce was to unify while we were making phrases which suggested jealousy! Neither amusement, commerce, nor literature could meet men's needs, and hence he emphasized the assertion he made at the outset, that only the Gospel could accomplish all that was desired.

Mr. and Mrs. T. Howard Lloyd, of Leicester, also spoke, the former urging the necessity of prayer. They wanted not merely to provide a pleasant hour for those who attended their meetings, but to bring them into close touch with the Almighty, and help them to realize that life was worth the living.

Rev. F. B. Meyer pointed out that earnest workers might help God in the culture of souls by quiet, earnest work among individuals. He spoke of the example of the late Mr. Moody, saying it was in his ability that his great power lay. Mr. Meyer expressed his personal conviction that as many people had been converted by personal solicitation as by the public preaching of the Gospel. The politics and the social life of the world were not much in the eyes of God except for the souls concerned, and as they worked for those individual souls their hands would get more delicate and tender, their eyes swifter and keener, and their whole souls more alert in the service of their fellows.

TO REACH INDIVIDUALS

In the afternoon the first subject discussed was

P.S.A. Development.

This was introduced by the chairman, Rev. J. K. Nuttall, of Liverpool, who suggested for the consideration of workers three points which, if understood and rightly acted upon, would help them on the right lines with the development of P.S.A. work. These were—(1) adjustment to the Divine will; (2) appropriation of Divine power; and (3) adaptation of methods to God's end. Mr. John Blackham, who spoke with vigour and earnestness, said the attainments of the past were remarkable, but the future possibilities of the movement were enormous. At present, however, they remained practically stationary; if there was a difference in the balance, it was on the side of progress. The movement was growing in London and Lancashire; it was strong in the Midlands, but not so strong in Yorkshire as ought to be the case. They must not rest until they had five millions of the people of England gathering every Sunday afternoon round the Old Book. In his judgment there was never a time when working men were more ready to listen to and profit by its teachings. Alderman Price Lewis did not consider great progress, speaking generally, had been made during the year. Subsequent speakers discussed matters of detail connected with the management, the principal question raised being as to the age limit, which some advocated should be below eighteen, but it was generally agreed that nothing should be done which would interfere with the work of Sunday schools.

Rev. F. W. Collyer, of Sutton Coldfield, initiated a discussion on

The Relation of the Movement to the Churches.

His remarks were mainly of a critical character. He did not consider the spirit of self-sacrifice was manifested or even taught. They had gone in for cheap religion—the cheaper the better, for the most part. There was jealousy, too, between the church and the P.S.A., and he quoted instances in which meetings of the latter were held in public halls instead of being held in the churches. The organization had no systematic teaching of God's Word, and there was, in his judgment, a tendency to forget the spirit in which the movement was conceived, so that the gatherings often drifted into mere entertainments; and when such a movement drifted in that direction it would be better it should drift itself away to nothing. Like all other democratic institutions, its danger lay in its running away with itself. The movement tended to give the impression that the work of the churches was dull and old-fashioned. On the other hand, he acknowledged that many ministers and churches were out of sympathy with the ideals and the opinions of the artisan classes. He should like to see the P.S.A. a permanent and popular evangelical auxiliary to the church work.

Rev. J. Tolefree Parr, who followed, took the view that the church did not keep pace with the population. The masses seemed to be alienated, and some means must be devised to lay hold of those who might be described as the lapsed masses. His contention was that the P.S.A. movement had proved that if the church would take one step out of its rigid ecclesiasticism, and

than for "ism," routine, and tradition, the people would attend the churches. The P.S.A. was, in his opinion, the ally, and not the rival, of the church, and as such it needed the fellowship and instruction of the church. The evening gathering took the form of a

Moody Memorial Meeting.

The Chairman described the great evangelist who has passed away as a mighty hunter amongst the unchurched multitude. The lessons the P.S.A. movement had learned from Moody were punctuality, brevity, homeliness, freedom, and joyous tone, and he attributed the success achieved in a great measure to the adoption of these rules. Mr. Blackham went on to advocate the formation of a Moody Memorial League, which should be a million strong, and should put into practice Moody's rule of speaking every day to some one about his soul's salvation. Mr. Meyer estimated that, if the suggestion of Mr. Blackham could be carried out, in seven years every person in the world would have been spoken to on the subject of his eternal welfare. Mr. Meyer gave an eloquent appreciation of the late evangelist and his life and work. The meeting was a most impressive one throughout.

Mr. Edward Smith, of Bewdley, the Conference treasurer, presided on Thursday morning. All who were connected with the movement, he said, recognised in it the hand of God. The P.S.A. had solved the problem of how to reach the masses, and having done that they must see to it that they had a very clear conception of why they wanted to reach them. It was not merely to amuse them, to spend a pleasant hour with them, or to enjoy imparting intellectual facts and discussing social problems, it was for the

and to effect any good results they must be moved with loving sympathy and brotherhood. Their work must be to teach the simplicity of religion, to train men who had been strangers to religion to recognise the natural cravings of the soul, and to show them that nothing but Jesus Christ could satisfy their yearnings. Alderman White, of Birmingham, so well known in connection with the Adult School movement, while expressing his interest in the work, said there were some things one would like to see a little different. Sometimes a little more reverence would be desirable, and the singing might be made to a much greater extent a means of praise and thanksgiving. Speaking from personal experience, it was delightful to him to know how amenable to good influences working men were when they were

DEALT WITH IN THE PROPER WAY,

and when sanctified common sense was brought to bear. Other speakers were Rev. J. Moffatt Logan, of Bristol, and Rev. R. G. Cairns, the American evangelist, who is now engaged in conducting a six months' mission amongst the P.S.A. societies in Lancashire. He gave an excellent testimony to the sturdy whole-souled enthusiasm of the men of Lancashire, and said that in connection with the mission over 1,900 names had been taken of those who had publicly stood up and declared their acceptance of Jesus Christ as their Saviour.

In the afternoon, Mr. Edward Smith again presided. The subject for consideration was the

but a discussion upon the war occupied the allotted time. Councillor Goldsworthy deprecated the introduction of controversial subjects, and the rest of the session was devoted to testimonies and experiences.

Rev. Dr. Whyte, of Edinburgh, preached in the evening to a large congregation on speaking also at the closing meeting on Friday morning. To these addresses we must, owing to pressure on our space, reserve allusion to a later issue.

The Committee of the Conference are deeply sensible of the fact that great blessing has attended the deliberations.

Scottish Notes.

At the annual meeting of the Monthly Visitor Tract Society, held in Edinburgh last week, Mr. R. Henderson Smith (secretary) reported a circulation last year of 5,092,474 copies of the tract, through distributors all over the country, being an average monthly of 424,373, or an increase of 4,338 over the average of 1898. Eighty-seven new centres of distribution have been opened during the last twelve months. Ten thousand of the tracts are being sent to South Africa for the soldiers there, in addition to a quantity in Gaelic specially for Highlanders.

During the past year 215 persons have been admitted to the Springwell Rescue Home, Edinburgh. In the same period eleven inmates were returned to relatives, 159 transferred to other institutions, and seventeen placed in service or other employment, while twenty-eight left of their own accord. The total number of women and girls dealt with in twenty-two years is 3,811.

The Army Scripture Readers' and Soldiers' Friend Society for Scotland reports having sent two agents to South Africa, to labour chiefly among Scottish soldiers, while a third is ready to embark as soon as his passage has been secured.

The mission conducted by Mr. Samuel and Miss Mackenzie in Cowcaddens Free Church, Glasgow, was brought to a close by a conference last Saturday, subject, "Elijah and Elisha;" and is being succeeded this week by a Gospel Temperance Campaign, at which Mr. John Mackay (of the Scottish Temperance League) is assisting.

The Grove Street Mission Hall, Edinburgh, was crowded on a recent occasion when a lecture was delivered by Baba Sodhi, on "The Sikhs of the Punjaub." The lecturer, a medical student from the Punjaub, is (as our readers know) a zealous missionary, full of love for the welfare of the fatherland and the land of the Five Rivers. The lecture dealt with the manners and customs of the people of the Punjaub, and the rise and development of their religious beliefs.

At a meeting held in Glasgow last week of the British Women's Temperance Association, it was shown that 25,000 women are now banded together in 207 branches throughout Scotland for aggressive temperance effort, 5,000 of these members belonging to the thirty branches in Glasgow and neighbourhood.

East London Tabernacle.—The annual thankoffering day has been fixed for Monday, Feb. 26. A meeting for prayer will be held in the morning from 7.30 to 8.30; in the afternoon at 3.30 Dr. Harry Guinness will preside over a public meeting. In the evening, at 7.30, the chair will be taken by Mr. G. W. Ovenden. Former members of the church (who are now scattered throughout the country) will, in mind and spirit, participate in these services of thanksgiving by forwarding freewill offerings to the secretary or deacons of the church—East London Tabernacle, Burdett Road, E.

The late Mrs. Wittenmyer.

THE death is announced, at the age of seventy-two, of Mrs. Annie Wittenmyer, the remarkable and devoted American lady who, first coming into notice through her self-denying labours for the wounded during the great civil war, has since done so much to alleviate human sorrow and distress. She went to the front in April, 1861, and continued her services from Vicksburg to Petersburg. On her heroic rounds on the battlefields she found some alive who had been left for dead, and rescued them. Some of these are living yet.

Her efforts, however, were not only those of a nurse; she was a great organizer. The "special diet kitchen" system, which she founded, saved thousands of lives in the army hospitals. The change she brought about was so marked that General Grant said her methods were the best he had ever known. Besides contributing a large sum of her own, she raised and expended for the benefit of soldiers at the front some 360,000 dollars. President Lincoln put his written endorsement on her plans, and commended her to the surgeons and officers of the army.

In 1863 Mrs. Wittenmyer started a Soldiers' Orphan Home. It proved a very great success, and became one of the public charities of the State of Iowa. Thousands of children have been educated and trained within its walls. After the war her activities continued. She became secretary of a Methodist missionary society, presenting its claims with great force and industry. She was conspicuous, too, in temperance work, presiding for five years over the operations of the temperance crusade. During that time she laid broad and deep foundations for the W.C.T.U., and the society had a wonderful growth. Army nurses also gained by her devoted advocacy of their cause. By personal effort she not only secured the passing of the Army Nurse Pension Law, but helped over 500 nurses to secure their pensions under its provisions. The Pennsylvania Memorial Home owed its existence to her. She rallied a large band of workers to the support of the scheme, and during the last nine years many homeless soldiers' wives, or widows and children, have been supported there in comfort. Later, she secured as a gift a fine old college property, wherein the work was developed as a National Home.

Mrs. Wittenmyer was at the first regular convention of that great philanthropic organization, the Woman's Relief Corps. She helped to form it, was the author of its handbook, and had been its national president. The Society is one of the largest societies of women in the world, and its charities amount to nearly 200,000 dollars a year. Many other noble undertakings owe much to her self-sacrificing toil.

In the years since the war she had also been engaged in literary work, editing various magazines and papers, and writing a number of historical and other books. Some of her hymns have been translated into many languages, notably the familiar one, "I have entered the valley of blessing so sweet." As a Christian she was consistent and exemplary, never obtrusive, but ever ready to testify for her Master. She frequently assisted in revival missions and camp meetings, and often spoke from pew, platform, or pulpit; while her public and private prayers were models of strength, beauty, and simplicity. Her loss is widely mourned throughout America, and her noble example will surely live in the records of the world's great and devoted women.

Sunday School Teaching.—The college at Handsworth, Birmingham, organized under the auspices of the Birmingham Sunday School Union, for the training of Sunday School teachers, was opened on the 19th inst. by Dr. R. F. Horton. There was a large attendance of ladies and gentlemen identified with the Evangelical Free Churches. Twenty resident students can be accommodated in the college, and non-residents will also be allowed to join in the studies, the classes meeting in the evening in order that the regular occupations of students may not be interfered with. Several lecturers have been appointed.

Pleasant Memories.

REFLECTING upon pleasant days gone by, Mr. G. T. Snook, of Bath, writes:—"I had been spending my summer vacation, as I have for many years before and since at Havre and Honfleur, France, helping in my humble way the late Hon. Lady Beauchamp in her noble work (still continued) amongst sailors at these two ports. The meetings were most interesting; the well-known and much-loved Sankey hymns were sung in half-a-dozen languages, interspersed with earnest and loving words of counsel and Gospel invitation.

"The life, words, and example of that truly honourable lady were an inspiration to all who were brought under her influence. My short fortnight soon passed away, and the time came for my departure. The steamer starts at midnight. On entering the cabin I found that every berth (except the one I had engaged) was occupied, and had been for several hours. The atmosphere there was too much for me, so I made up my mind to pass the night on deck rather than in the close cabin. As I sat shivering upon a seat, a man whom I found afterwards was the ship's carpenter, stopped in passing, and, looking into my face, asked if I remembered conducting a service at Honfleur Sailors' Home five years before, and added, 'Don't you remember saying that your arm was a picture of your past life?'

"I remembered the meeting quite well. I was speaking upon the necessity of the new birth. I asked the men to look at my arm, and to notice the two colours black and white, as my hand is the opposite in colour to the sleeve of my coat. So conversion has changed my heart and life. I concluded by asking the men whether there had been a time in their lives when 'old things had passed away.' My friend said that that meeting decided him to be a Christian. He did not come into the light all at once; but gradually the light dawned unto him. Soon after his conversion he was sorely tried; his only son, a little boy he loved more dear than life, sickened and passed away.

"Referring to this time, he said: 'I know that if I had not Jesus as my stay and support, I should have ended all by jumping into the dock, but praise God I knew I should meet my dear one again in the better land.' After expressing our mutual pleasure at meeting once more, and thanking Him whose grace had saved us, my friend asked the reason of my being on deck instead of in my berth; on my telling him, he obtained leave from the captain for me to have a deck cabin all to myself.

"Early next morning my new friend waited upon me with breakfast. Soon afterwards we parted, praising God for his goodness. The steamer was not the usual one, but one doing duty whilst the other was under repair, so that I have never seen my friend since, but I hear that he is still diligent in well-doing, earnestly endeavouring to lead others to the Saviour he has found so precious."

Antwerp Sailors' Rest.—This institution was founded some two years ago by Miss Smith Cone (who, it will be remembered, was a voluntary worker at the Sailors' Rest, Ratcliff Highway, for nearly twenty years). The advantages of a reading-room, well supplied with Christian periodicals and facilities for writing, are, needless to say, widely appreciated. The movement has received the hearty support of Sir George Williams, Mr. McCall, and many others, who have recognised the need and utility of such a "Rest" at Antwerp. Communications respecting the work should be addressed to the treasurer, Mr. W. C. Parkinson, 18, Carleton Road, London, N.

East Leeds Mission.—The first annual report of this mission shows that its many agencies, which have been initiated in the interests of the masses, have given evidence of everlasting good. Some 126 open-air services and sixty-five cottage meetings have been conducted, and the holiness gatherings have proved the means of deepening the spiritual life of the members. In the large factories of the city the mid-day meetings have been attended with much blessing. Personal visits to the number of 2,756 have brought the workers face to face with the darkest side of city life. Further particulars of the mission may be obtained from the pastor-evangelist, Mr. W. R. Clank-Lewis, 4, Bexley Terrace, Harehills Road, Leeds.

Jesus Healing in Capernaum.—Mark i. 21-34.

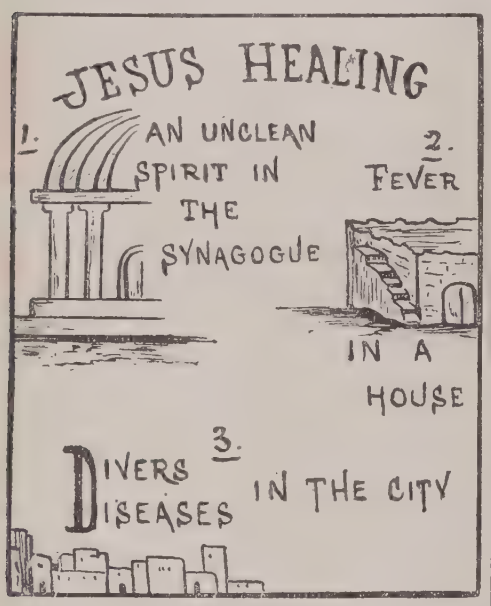
Golden Text.—"And He healed many that were sick" (34).

Introduction.

AFTER Jesus had been rejected at Nazareth (21), He seems to have made Capernaum his home (Matt. iv. 13; Luke iv. 31).

Again it is a Sabbath day. What an example the Lord Christ sets before us as to the keeping of our Sabbaths! This was a day of doing good to others.

Jesus again "teaching" (22, see Luke iv. 22). The way his teaching told upon the people is expressed in such words as "astonished," "wondered," "amazed" (Matt. vii. 28, 29). Were they not indeed "Wonderful words of life"?



Key to Plan for Blackboard.

1. an unclean spirit
2. a fever
3. Divers diseases

Healing in the Synagogue. a house. the city.

Even in a synagogue, the place for the worship of God, Satan is to be found, and a Saviour's power is needed.

In the home Jesus is wanted, and no home is truly happy till He has visited it and used his mighty power there.

Out in the city streets the Redeemer of the world must use his authority for casting away all that offends his Heavenly Father's eye.

It was Christ's work to get rid of all sorts of diseases, in all sorts of places, among all sorts of people.

1.—In the Synagogue.

There was another great power present in that synagogue (23)—Satan's evil power shown in the poor man with the unclean spirit (Luke iv. 33—"devil"). There seem to have been many such about. Christ always turned them out, and made the people whole. The unclean spirits knew the Lord Jesus, and knew that He was holy (24)—exactly the opposite to themselves. (See Jas. ii. 19; Acts iii. 14; Matt. viii. 29; Luke i. 35; Psa. xvi. 10.)

Christ's power was the strongest, and overcame the other (25, 26). Holiness will always overcome evil.

"Authority" (27), as in 22 (see Luke v. 17). Christ can conquer all the evil and wickedness in our hearts: He can turn out the bad spirits. Where we only fail, He is more than conqueror (Eph. vi. 12).

"Let us alone" (24) (see Job xxi. 14), the cry of all afar off from God, who do not wish to love Him. Jesus wants us to be united to Him. "Abide in Me, I in you." "Without Me ye can do nothing."

The unclean spirit cried: "What have we to do with Thee?" There is no salvation without Christ: "Believe on the Lord Jesus, and thou shalt be saved."

2.—In the House.

Jesus goes into an ordinary Jewish home, the house of Peter and Andrew (29). Here lies a woman ill with fever. Again Jesus uses his Divine power.

He "rebuked" the unclean spirit (see Luke iv. 39). He "rebuked" the fever. He spoke to the evil spirit. He touched the poor woman's hand (Mark v. 41).

"Ministered"—brought them supper, served them. Quite well, fever all gone. How wonderful!

3.—In the City.

The setting sun (32); Sabbath ended. The Jews were very particular about doing anything on the Sabbath (Mark iii. 1-5). Out in the city street, all sorts of illnesses, diseases cured by Jesus, more devils cast out (Luke iv. 41; Matt. xiv. 36); "all made perfectly whole."

Lessons to Learn.

The lessons are many, but they can be all gathered up into one point—viz., "Christ has power to heal all who come to Him."

The three pictures we have looked at show us that Christ not only heals bodily disease, but spiritual diseases too. Sinful souls are under Satan's power; the terrible vices of our land show us this only too clearly. Fever-stricken souls, who will do anything for greed of gain, &c., need Christ to release them, and make them calm and quiet. No one but the Saviour can cure the divers soul diseases we meet on every hand.

1. Christ is wanted in our churches and chapels to cast out evil spirits.

2. He is wanted in our homes to rule there.

3. He is wanted in our towns and cities to cast out all the awful wickedness from them.

One condition will bring Him: We must be willing for Him to come, we must ask Him to come, we must welcome Him when He does come.

The Y.M.C.A.

THE members and friends of the Hammersmith Y.M.C.A. held a special gathering on the 8th inst. to inaugurate a "Missionary Parliament" in connection with foreign missions. Mr. E. S. James, of the C.M.S., presided, and an interesting address on India was given by Rev. A. R. Cavalier.

The report of Bournemouth Y.M.C.A. tells of all-round advance. While the material and physical advantages of the members are not uncared for, the committee ever place in the van the primary object of the Society's existence, that of the spiritual and moral welfare of our young men. Bible classes, prayer meetings, evangelistic services, and a variety of special meetings have proved fruitful.

Omagh Association continues to make progress. Among recent special gatherings a visit from Rev. Frank Paton may be noted. He gave a graphic account of his experiences, and of the methods adopted for the evangelization and civilization of the inhabitants of the New Hebrides. Mr. J. G. R. Porter presided, and notwithstanding the inclemency of the evening there was a good attendance.

By kind invitation of Mr. W. H. Seagram, the annual international social reception in connection with Hackney Y.M.C.A. took place on the 15th inst., and was attended by many representatives of various nationalities. The gathering was unique and enthusiastic. Amongst those taking part were Rev. John Gritton, D.D., Dr. Harry Guinness, Col. Bentinck, Mr. F. L. Porter, and others. Friends were also present from Denmark, Holland, Russia, Roumania, Austria, France, New Zealand, and other countries. Solos were sung in their native tongues by several of the delegates, and the hall was decorated with flags of all nations.

The War Relief Committee in Pietermaritzburg have been accommodated in the hall and offices of the Y.M.C.A. by the special invitation of the association, the leaders of which are heartily co-operating in the work, as it affects both soldiers and refugees. At Capetown and Durban also the associations are still very active in the same cause.

The annual meeting of the Birkenhead Y.M.C.A. was held on the 13th inst., when there was a large and representative attendance. Mr. C. J. Procter, who presided, stated that he believed so firmly in the work that he intended to give £500 towards the further reduction of the mortgage on the building. Rev. Canon Fleming gave a stirring address upon the Y.M.C.A. generally, specially alluding to the missionary aspect of the work as exemplified by the number of Christian workers sent out to the front in South Africa. He believed there was a great future before the Y.M.C.A., but it would all depend upon its keeping closely to its Christian character.

Personalia.

The latest news regarding the condition of Mr. George Holland, of George Yard Mission, received on Tuesday, was "slowly losing strength; very calm and bright spiritually."

Mr. Musa Bhai, well known both in India and at home in connection with the Salvation Army, is about to return to India with a view to undertaking work of an undenominational character as an evangelist. His address is 1, Gladsmuir Road, Highgate, N.

Mr. R. C. Chapman, of Barnstaple, is a personality of peculiar interest in a wide Christian circle. His friends will be glad to hear that cabinet photographs of this veteran witness for Christ may be had (price 1s. 6d.) from Mr. E. S. Pearce, 9, New Buildings, Barnstaple. The proceeds of sales are given to Gospel work. Pictures for framing may also be had.

Christian Endeavour.

TOPIC FOR FEB. 25.

The Strength of Humility (Luke xviii. 9-14).

AMONGST these who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and set all others at nought, might have been the young Saul, who, in all probability, was a student in Jerusalem at this time, and was busily engaged in weaving a righteousness of which he thought that he had every reason to be proud (Phil. iii. 4, &c.; compare also Rom. x. 3). Very many of God's saints, notably Luther and Bunyan, who describes his experiences in the Grace Abounding, have passed through this phase of experience.

The Jews and Orientals mostly stand when they pray (Matt. vi. 5; Mark xi. 25), and the Pharisee would stand apart, where he could be seen. There is an exclusiveness in the religious life of the self-righteous man which makes him stand to pray with himself. Perhaps those words also mean that his prayer did not go beyond the ceiling of the temple-porch, but came back on himself. Self-complacent prayers, full of self-congratulation and pride, do not rise as sweet incense to God, but hang heavily in the atmosphere of our world, as the smoke of our great cities does, when the air is heavy.

Let us be warned. When we are truly righteous, we shall be truly humble. When we have the robe of God's righteousness on, we never forget how dark and black we were by nature. The saint's dress is lined with the softest humility and tenderest love for others. Whatever we may be, we ascribe all the honour and glory to Him, whose grace has been so conspicuous in arraying us in the righteousness, pure and white, which is his gift to his saints.

Would you not have the penitent's heart, which, as the Saviour says, is dear to God, which confesses itself the sinner, which has no plea but the mercy of God? Ah, it is the most precious gift of the Holy Spirit, made to meek faith, and broken hearted contrition of soul. I think (1) It comes from considering our sins in the light of God's Holy Word. The lambs seem white till the snow falls, and we may be self-complacent, so long as we judge ourselves by human standards. Let us compare ourselves with God's, and we shall see sin where we had not suspected it. (2) It comes from considering our lives in the light of our opportunities. It was this that made Paul describe himself as the least of saints and the chief of sinners. He recalled his vision of the living Saviour, and the long-suffering grace which had been shown him, his visions and revelations—and it was in view of these that he felt himself to be so specially unworthy. Think of what you might have been rather than what you are. (3) It comes from comparing ourselves with the best qualities in others. The reverse is too often our practice. We look at the notorious crimes of notorious sinners—the extortioners, adulterers, and unjust—and comparing our excellencies with their glaring deficiencies, we are well satisfied. Let us, on the contrary, be always on the outlook for the best things in the best people, that we may be humbled. It is good to read the biographies of God's saints, for as the recital of their faith and prayers, their tears and sacrifices, their exploits for God is made, we feel that we are as tiny pigmies comparing themselves with giants.

The word translated, Have mercy, is really, "Be propitiated." As we become conscious of sin, we realize our need of the propitiation of our Saviour, who bore our sins in his own body on the Cross and shed his blood on our behalf. In Jesus God meets us, and we meet his perfect purity and justice. Peace is made by the blood of the Lamb of Calvary. We are not only forgiven, but justified; i.e., we are treated as though we had never sinned, but had always been God's elect children. Humility is the other side of the faith which accepts God's atonement: so Jesus said this man went to his house justified, but not the other.

C. E. NOTES.

Rev. F. B. Meyer visited Halifax on February 13, the meetings being well attended in spite of severe snow.

"Endeavour Day" was celebrated in one Society by a special prayer meeting, followed by an evangelistic service, when twenty-five of the Sunday school scholars came out definitely for the Lord.

The Free Parliament on "Home and Evangelistic Endeavour" proved most interesting. One story was told of a young Endeavourer who, in celebrating his twenty-first birthday, added a personal invitation to come to Christ to the notes sent to his friends.

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

A FRUITFUL WEEK.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

INCIDENTS are continually cropping up which go to show that evangelists rarely know of more than a part of the actual fruit which has been reaped at their missions. A coachman, who was leaving one church, remarked to a friend of ours, "I wish there was more of that kind of preaching. My wife was here last night, and came home a changed woman. Then she sent me to-night." In this case, as in many others, no remark had been made at the time. An evangelist, who had seen no fruit for several evenings, had this message sent to him from a distance by a man who had been present, and had been aroused by some words to Christians on receiving the Holy Spirit: "Tell Mr. —— that, although he heard no thanksgivings from those present, after I went home my wife, who has till now been a Roman Catholic, gave herself to the Saviour." After leaving a West-End church an evangelist was met by a minister, who had gone in one evening and sat in a back seat. Three young people whom he found beside him all assured him they had realized the truth, and trusted unto salvation during the preaching, but nothing had been said to the local workers by any of them.

Mr. Robert Logan and other friends from Bethany Hall have been going from centre to centre as they were able, enlivening the gatherings out of doors by the use of their limelight lantern, and drawing many within the sound of the Gospel who would otherwise have passed by on the other side.

The mission among seamen, to which we have already referred, went on "from strength to strength." Long marches with the Gospel lanterns along Broomielaw, Argyle Street, and other thoroughfares, aroused the neighbourhood in some degree to a recognition of the fact that something unusual was going on. This open-air work earned for itself a separate blessing. One case was that of a woman who had just come out of a hospital, and was visiting her son in an adjacent street. Seeing the crowd at a stopping place, and being a stranger, she crossed over to see what it meant. Within a few minutes God laid hold of her. A "bow drawn at a venture," sent the arrow of conviction to her heart. "Well," she said, "I am fifty-four, and it is time I was saved." Following the procession when it moved on again, she came to the service, remained to the after-meeting, and is believed to have been savingly changed before she left.

CHILDREN'S SERVICES.

Large meetings of children were going on last week in Nelson Street Evangelical Union Church (Rev. William Dunlop), the following Sabbath schools uniting with the local one to provide the audiences: Camphill Mission, Kingston Parish Church, with Tradeston and Union Free Churches. The neighbourhood is densely populated and drink-sodden, so that the presence of a rowdy element was not matter for surprise. On Tuesday evening when we looked in, we found over 600 boys and girls present, with Mr. JOHN STEWART ("The Children's Evangelist") conducting the service. Mr. Stewart is a man of much resource and tact, as well as experience in such circumstances. All unruliness was quelled, and the meeting kept under control without even a raising of the voice.

The lessons on the two opening evenings were on "The Good Shepherd"—excellent illustrations being shown by lime-light. An unusual number of slides, containing texts for repetition, and verses to be sung, kept the attention closely concentrated on the spiritual truth. The incidents of the Parable of the Lost Sheep, and the thoughts of the twenty-third Psalm, were interestingly interwoven with the Parable of the Good Shepherd.

About a hundred of the young people waited to the after-meeting, and while a number of these did so for different reasons, all trace of flippancy soon disappeared. We noticed a tender, far-away look in some of the young faces as we spoke to them of Jesus and his love. Hopeful professions of conversion had been made on Monday evening, and it was pleasant to find the same children back with Bibles in their hands. A group of big lads who came in after rather a rollicking fashion—one even whistling all the way up the aisle—and sat near us, remained to the second gathering, and were among the last to leave the church. They all took prayer cards, and manifested a spirit that led one worker of long experience to remark, "I like to see that."

At the opening service it was intimated that a special meeting for young Christians would be held each evening, and on Tuesday over a dozen appeared, Bible in hand, an hour before the others. These are valuable times for the giving of instruction, as well as for prayer. In this connection, as well as in others, experience is proving the desirability of one speaker remaining for a full fortnight in the same locality, and in a measure consolidating the work. In addition to the local workers, led by Mr. W. P. Crawford, we found that Mr. John Orr, Mr. Harrison Gibson, and other friends from a distance were rendering much valued assistance.

Another evangelist found a great lack of help for personal work among the children, the Sabbath School teachers leaving whenever the second meeting began, and the older children going with them. But after much prayer and tactful dealing a break was made. A board school teacher was herself led into the light one evening, and at the same time more than half a dozen of the senior girls asked to be spoken with.

FRUIT FROM THE EAST END.

Following up Mr. MacKeith's work among the senior lads and girls, and in close touch with the junior services conducted by Mr. Thomas M. Pratt and Mr. J. W. Van de Venter, Mr. HUGH PATON began last week a fortnight's mission for adults in St. Thomas' Wesleyan Methodist Church (Rev. T. Harrison Gower, minister), Gallowgate. This Church is a centre from which aggressive effort is continually going forth, the congregation retaining much of old breezy vim and vigour, so characteristic of Methodism. The open-air work consists of spirited marches through the surrounding streets, any portable musical instruments available among the workers being brought into service.

The solo-singing proved a great attraction to the meetings, as well as a valuable means of grace. Among those who helped in this department were Mr. J. R. D. McAusland, Mr. Matthew Morton, and Mr. Colville; while many bright young Christians were doing all in their power in the open air and elsewhere to "lift up" Jesus.

Mr. Gower's most stirring appeal to the people was for always more prayer, and for "the grace of persistence," that nothing might be left undone to bring the Gospel to the ears of the people in their district. "Some need a great deal of moving," he said, and much waiting for the Holy Spirit was sought, in order that He might move effectually.

The preaching on the earlier evenings was much about love, a strong point with Mr. Paton being his presentation of "the King in his Beauty." On Wednesday evening, before preaching on the well-known John iii. 16, he dealt with an answer frequently presented to him in after-meetings, that persons spoken to "had believed in Jesus all their lives, and yet they were not saved." It was shown that such belief was "about" Him, rather than "in" Him—such persons still standing one step away from the Kingdom of God. The evangelist's great desire was to awaken the real and deep sense of need, knowing that then "three-fourths of the battle would be won." The love of God was pictured in words wondrously simple, and hearers were still further helped by the use of homely illustration and anecdote.

The audience was good, and about two-thirds of the people remained behind to pray or to seek for further light. Several showed a determination to bring their spiritual unrest to an end there and then, among them a strong-looking young man and a well-dressed woman in middle life. The week had begun well with six professions of conversion on the Sabbath evening, and, as the "droppings of blessing" continued evening by evening, an assurance was borne in on the hearts of the Christians that a precious time of reaping was being graciously granted to them. Workers from Bethany Hall and Sister Street Baptist Church are joining hands with the local band in most effective fashion.

Our readers will be glad to know that at another East-End centre—London Road United Presbyterian Church—a good and successful mission is being held, the preacher being Mr. James Shields.

MR. M'NEILL'S MEETINGS.

The people of the district came out in large numbers all through Mr. MCNEILL'S fortnight of evening services in Langside Free Church. We heard the minister (Rev. D. F. Mackenzie) return fervent thanks for the way in which the Spirit of God had been arousing some and quickening others, while Mr. McNeill bore public testimony to the sympathy and co-operation of the ministers uniting in the effort.

In intimating that he proposed to go straight on with the mission, only changing the place of meeting to the neighbouring Shawlands Parish Church (Rev. John Sloan), Mr. McNeill appealed to the people to see that there should be no break in the continuity of the work. Referring to some who had been attending, he said, "I know you are prejudiced. I see the look on your faces, and know quite well what it means." He was assured that garbled accounts in newspapers had wrought much harm in this way, but that now prejudice was breaking down, and many were ready to hear and obey.

The closing address at Langside (text Phil. ii. 12) was a stirring call to God's people in no way to slacken their efforts, but rather to go on with greater earnestness and zeal. In a searching word on the temptations of social life, Mr. McNeill said, "If you follow the Lord Jesus, why ask your minister if you may go to a ball, or to the theatre, or if you may indulge in a social glass? Will they put you into better fettle for a quiet time, with your Saviour and your Bible? If not, you have your answer."

A determined effort was made to enlist every professing Christian in the ranks of aggressive workers. No after-meeting was held, but the impression made had been too deep for all to go away. The preacher was met as soon as he reached the vestry by the old cry, "What must I do to be saved?"

AMONG THE STUDENTS.

A student writing about the University services says: "'Have you heard John McNeill?' And the answer is usually 'Yes. Next comes, 'What do you think of him?' Then there is a pause. But someone then has the courage to state that he has been surprised, and forthwith all cordially agree that John McNeill is a remarkable man. His only affectation is lack of that quality; but this is an amiable fault. And when you see the man standing there in his rugged intensity, frowning and smiling with his varying passion, slinging those plain Saxon words which Spurgeon said could best pelt sinners, you feel what our age too often despises—the joy of conviction and enthusiasm." The striking fact brought out is that with the students—whom we believe he has never addressed in the same fashion before—as with every other class, the preacher has at once won the hearts of his hearers, and disarmed any lurking or open antagonism to evangelistic methods.

A Malagasy Warrior.

PEOPLE who have never lived in heathen lands have no idea how much they owe to the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Once our own country was heathen, and our ancestors no better than the native of Madagascar whose photograph is printed below. He is a strong man, and thinks that he can make himself stronger by wearing charms tied about his head, his neck, arms, and body. In these he puts his trust, expecting them to render him bullet-proof and victorious.

Dressed up in these charms, and armed with guns and spears, he and his companions have been the terror of the border country of Imérina. They would come up suddenly some moonlight night and attack a village, setting fire to the thatched roofs, and shooting down the first men who ran out to try and protect their families. Then they would tie the women and children and the weakest of the men together by their necks, making them carry their own household goods, fowls, ducks, &c., in baskets on their heads. Gathering up all the cattle they could find, these robbers drove all in front of them—men, women, children, cows, and oxen—to be sold or killed, leaving a desolate heap of ruins where the smiling village had been. Well, now, that is heathenism—terror and misery on the one hand, cruelty and oppression on the other.

When God's messengers sow the seed of the Gospel in such a land, gradually the whole state of things is changed. The good get stronger and stronger, and the bad people get fewer and weaker. Those who hear about Jesus and believe in Him become brave through trusting Him. Those who lived by robbery begin to work instead of stealing; and, although some bad people still remain, the good ones who have learnt that God is their Father begin to help one another, and stand together to resist the wrong. And then these men who trusted in charms come to find out that their charms are really no good at all.

Already a great number have thrown the charms away, and have come to the missionaries or teachers to learn to follow Him who is the true strength of those that put their trust in Him. Thank God, dear boys and girls, that you belong to a Christian land, and ask Him every day to send out more messengers of his Gospel to the heathen lands, where still there are so many thousands who have never heard his name! A. P.

Hindu Children and Dolls.

WRITING to the secretary of a Watchers' Band acknowledging a present of dolls, Rev. Otto Stursberg, of the London Mission, Gora Bazaar, Berhampur district, North India, says:—

"You will be pleased to hear that the dollies and everything else arrived in good condition. One of the dolls you sent would have been of quite special value if they had come a short time earlier. You may remember that amongst all the girl-dolls there was just one boy. Now at prize day, at one of my wife's girls' schools, the girls were coming up in order of merit to choose their dollies, when one little damsel came up, looked, and took none. On being asked whether she didn't see one she liked, she said no; she wanted a Sahib.

"You see, all the dolls having fair complexions, they are Europeans to these childrens; so the girl-dollies would be Mem Sahibs, and any boy-dollies would be Sahibs. The little maid was told there were no others, only what she saw, and she was urged to take one of those. This she was at last prevailed upon to do, still, however, protesting that she wanted a Sahib, and that her mother had told her to be sure and pick a Sahib. I wonder whether, in a few years' time, that little maid will be as anxious to annex a young man as she was that day? So if your party of dolls had arrived before, we should have been able to gratify that little woman's wish.

"I must tell you something else about dolls. Miss Robinson had two little blackies sent her—regular little Kaffir dolls. She was going to give them away at Christmas; but not a child would so much as touch them, and some cried in fear of them. The ridiculous thing about this is that, of course, the skin of all these children is very far from white, and some of them have very dark skin indeed. But at last a little girl was found willing to take a black dollie to her heart, and I saw her only yesterday in the Khagra mission compound carrying it about with her. The other blackie is, so far as I know, still an 'unclaimed treasure.'"

Ivy Sherwin.—Thank you for your little letter. I am glad you were successful in winning the prize.

Willie Hooper, Hugh Mather.—Many happy returns of your birthday.

Doris Hodgkinson.—I am sorry you cannot be included in the list this week. Chapter and verse must be given whenever possible.

Agatha Ward, Francie and Florence Hoyte.—Thank you for your letters. I was interested in reading about your various pets.

Mary Hill.—You had nine words for seven o'clock.

Lionel and Bernard Studd.—No chapter and verse were given. (Lionel).—The same mistake made your paper wrong in 211.

Alice Truelove, Gladys Clark, Daisy Iredell, Penelope Roberts, Pringle Wilson, Marjorie Tracey, Fanny Blackman.—You each gave the wrong answer to b of question 6. See answers to searcher 212.

Cicely Craven.—Your answer to question 5 (212) was incorrect.

I am glad to receive so many little letters acknowledging prizes and certificates and expressing so much satisfaction; but there are so many, it would be almost impossible to answer all personally.

Uncle Tom.

"Acceptable Words."

OUR friend, Mr. George Hatton, reminds us what a valuable service may be done by Christians who can use the pen. The death of Rev. P. B. Power, the author of "The Oiled Feather," and numerous other useful stories, recalls an instance of a man who was debarred from much use of his voice at an early period of his career as a clergyman, and who therefore employed his pen with probably far more influence than would have attended his labours in a parish. Mr. Hatton writes:—

"Forty years ago, when little more than a lad, I attended a meeting at St. James's Hall, at which Brownlow North delivered one of his soul-stirring Gospel addresses, which moved all hearts. The gathering was under the auspices of the Great Marlborough Street Branch of the Y.M.C.A., and collecting forms were placed on the seats inviting subscriptions on behalf of the funds of the Association. A trifling sum, with name and address, was placed by me in the collection-box. Two or three days afterwards, to my surprise, not only an acknowledgment, but a most kindly letter, inquiring after our spiritual interests came from the pen of the dearly-beloved H. F. Bowker. He not only dealt faithfully with the soul, but invited me to go and see him, fixing the day and hour.

"That interview, following upon Mr. North's powerful words, produced deep anxiety, and soon led to a complete surrender to God. Since the receipt of that timely letter, which influenced me for life, I have been most deeply impressed with the striking value of letter-writing as a means of winning souls, and as an ever-living source in the Holy Spirit's hands of comfort and blessing to weary workers and sick and suffering saints."

The Y.W.C.A.

THERE are twenty-one branches of the Y.W.C.A. in North London; of these fifteen are undenominational. The return forms give a membership of 2,430, an increase on last year of 167. Of these 1,170 are Prayer Union members, an increase of 134 on last year. Bible classes are held in seventeen branches, with an average weekly attendance of 686. Prayer meetings are also held weekly in nearly all the branches. Missionary work is well supported: most of the branches either have working parties for some special mission, or they collect for the same, and have missionary meetings. Highbury has a missionary library; Mildmay has two members in the mission field, and last year subscribed over £64 for the support of their own missionary.

In the South-east district there are nineteen branches. In every branch but three the Prayer Union members have increased, and there are 1,029 this year, as against 855 last year. The Prayer Union members in every branch are engaged in either Home Mission work, Sunday school teaching, visiting, or in helping the work of their own branch, and in nearly all the branches an interest is taken in foreign missions. Hatcham supports a Bible-woman in India and two Chinese boys. Beckenham supports a Chinese girl, and has collected over £14 for Home and Foreign Mission work. Penge has sent £5 to the China Inland Mission, besides raising £10 for other work.

The Torquay Branch reports a numerous membership. Among the many and various departments of wholesome influence the Bible class stands first, it being considered that whatever tends to stimulate closer study of the Holy Scriptures must of necessity be of high importance. The attendances at the classes are large. Great interest is evinced in foreign missionary work, support being accorded to the Zenana Bible and Medical Mission and other agencies.

Letters to the Editor.

"The Idea of a Personal God."

DEAR SIR,—One of our leading newspapers says: "We are now got beyond the idea of a personal God!" Are there amongst Christians reasons for fear that there is truth in the statement?

1. Is there not a growing aversion to united prayer? According to Acts iv., when the early Christians were suffering, they assembled for prayer, and they were relieved. There are many instances to the same effect contained in the same records. But now calls for prayer are met by counter calls for the exercise of common sense and practicality. Men like Mr. D. L. Moody and Mr. Geo. Müller seemed to find unfailing guidance in communion with God. It is now the exception to find a large company of earnest Christians meeting together to breathe out their desires to a God who hears and answers.

2. Is there not considerable irreverence—a tendency, even when speaking of the Supreme Being, to do so with lightness, as if we were considering laws and philosophy, and not that we are in the presence of Him who liveth and judgeth?

3. Is there not a grave disregard of divine authority? Take such points as (a) Living to ourselves. (b) The command to give the Gospel to every creature—neglected entirely by multitudes of Christians. (c) A going forward even in Christ's service without certainty as to his guidance, so that great mistakes are made and valuable resources wasted.

4. Is not fervour often lost in formality? It is so easy to exhaust ourselves in secondary matters, even when we complain of ritualism. Instead of laboured brilliance, should there not be the setting forth of the Saviour as coming amongst us now with all his old power, so that wrongs may be righted and our hearts made to burn within us? Why should the old moral weight of the ministry, the appeals, the conversions, be neglected? There is proof that God is doing a saving work all around; but might it not be greatly increased?

5. Is there not a tendency to discountenance spiritual life? A mother will send her daughter away to balls with the deliberate intention of crushing out the germs of divine life in the soul.

6. Is not activity often fruitless through want of faith? It is said by those able to judge, "Never was there more activity, but corresponding result is lacking through lack of faith." If judgment is to begin at the house of God, let us judge ourselves that we be not judged.—Yours faithfully, J. S.

The Churches and the Drink Traffic.

DEAR SIR,—It is universally admitted that the drink traffic is the greatest hindrance to the work of the Christian Church. It is also generally admitted that if the Christian churches would exert their power they could crush the traffic. There is a large section of Christians—ministers and laymen—who earnestly desire to see the work accomplished. Much effort has been put forth by the churches to promote the temperance cause, and so undermine the traffic. And yet it must be admitted that (as you said recently in an article on the subject) "the Christian Church seems powerless to deal with the calamity, or even to arrest the increase of desolation."

Will you allow me to indicate what I believe to be the cause of the unsatisfactory result of the efforts of the Christian Church of to-day in its warfare against the traffic? In doing so I shall simply be reiterating that which I have been saying publicly for the past five years.

I maintain that the failure of the Christian Church to deal an effective blow at the liquor traffic is the lack of definiteness in its work. Of vague denunciation and condemnation in general terms of the evils of the traffic we have had enough, but of attempts by actions on the part of the Churches to show their hostility to the traffic we have had comparatively little. Indeed, it is painful to have to assert that any attempt to give practical effect to the declarations of hostility to the traffic made by the churches has been bitterly opposed by the churches in conference, and by many of their leaders.

More than four years ago an agitation was started to induce the churches of all denominations to give practical evidence of their antagonism to the drink traffic by refusing to allow men engaged in this soul-destroying business to be elected to office in the Church. Surely a mild proposal! And yet this suggestion, that the Church should be true to its own declarations, has been met with fiercer opposition and more definite attack than has ever been shown towards the traffic!

If the Christian churches really mean what they say when they declare that the drink traffic is the greatest foe of Christianity, let them do something to prove the sincerity of their utterances. Let them act consistently by, at any rate, refusing to allow those who are carrying on the business to officiate in the Temple of the Lord.—Yours heartily,

E. Tennyson Smith.

A Vision:

CAN WE REALIZE IT?

"Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty; they shall behold the land that is very far off (a far-stretching land," R.V.)—Isa. xxxiii. 17.

LIFE must have an aim; youth its castles in the air, middle life its ambitions, old age its hope more or less wistful. These may fail unless supported by one thing. "One thing, I desired of the Lord." "But one thing is needful." "Seek ye first the kingdom of God."

The Kingdom of Heaven.—Where? "The kingdom of heaven is within you." I look within. No, all is not right here yet. Who shall subdue this wayward spirit, these moods? The King; and He shall bring in the kingdom of peace.

The King.—The first step in regeneration is to "see the King in his beauty." "The pure in heart shall see God." "We all with open face beholding—as in a mirror—are changed into the same image."

The King is seen in the Gospel story. The Babe of Bethlehem, the little child at Nazareth, the boy earnest about his "Father's business," the youth "subject unto his parents," the Teacher, Healer, Friend of sinners, One with power over death, the persecuted, the crucified, the risen and ascended Saviour. "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." "Lo, I am with you alway." "Thine eyes"—yours and mine—may now "see the King in his beauty," who says "Thy sin be forgiven thee;" "Go, and sin no more."

His name is Counsellor; He is the Truth. Do we long to know about God and his kingdom? "He that doeth his will shall know."

"Thine eyes shall behold the land." People's doubts and fears about the future, about death, the way thither.

To those who walk with Jesus—

> Death seems but a covered way
> That leadeth unto light.

Not a far-off land to such, but "a far-stretching land," reaching even to where we now are.

(1) The spirit land all around us. (Cf. the prophet and his servant whose eyes were opened.) World of holy influence—"Are they not all ministering spirits?"—the holy angels. (2) The home of those gone before—"Be ye followers." (3), Christ is there, interceding "Our great High Priest;"—preparing, "I go to prepare a place." The land where they need no light of the sun nor of the moon; where there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, "where his servants shall serve Him, and they shall see his face."

Pan-African Conference.—In view of the lack of information which is prevalent regarding the treatment of native races under European and American rule, the African Association, which consists of members of the race, resident in England, has resolved to hold a Conference in Westminster Town Hall London, in July of this year, during the Paris Exhibition. It is hoped by this means to influence public opinion on existing proceedings and conditions affecting the welfare of natives in South Africa, West Africa, the West Indies, and the United States. The hon. secretary will be pleased to hear from representatives who are desirous of attending. Communications should be addressed to the Common Room, Gray's Inn, London, W.C.

About Books.

A CHRISTIAN MERCHANT.

IT is a great pleasure to call attention to a biography which, while calculated to interest all readers, is sure to prove edifying to earnest Christian people. A volume of sterling worth and peculiar charm is that now before us—Memorials of Hugh M. Matheson: Edited by his Wife, with a Prefatory Note by the Rev. J. Oswald Dykes, M.A., D.D., Principal of Westminster College, Cambridge. (6s. Hodder & Stoughton.) The worth and charm will be admitted by all who enter into the story, with its light and shade, its joy and sorrow, its high purpose and noble activity; while to those who enjoyed a personal acquaintance with the subject of the narrative—so humble and tender-hearted, so manly and devoted, so faithful and true—the pages will have a more intense ministry, as they bring to mind the sayings and doings of one who was greatly beloved, and whose work for God was much blessed, both at home and in the foreign field.

As will be remembered, Mr. Matheson departed this life just two years ago, aged seventy-seven. His was a distinguished career in the world of commerce, and quite exceptional in religious usefulness, for he was privileged to hold office in the Presbyterian Church for over fifty years. The memorials are largely autobiographical. Beginning with early life in Scotland, they describe a tour in the East—while yet a young man. Passing on, they present a beautiful outline of family life, for the most part constructed from letters to friends, also the story of activities in connection with the Presbyterian Church of England. Other chapters give particulars of work in the promotion of foreign missions, especially in China, and deal with Christian effort at home, in which Mr. Matheson rendered important service in many directions; he was deservedly held in high esteem for his wise and energetic help on the occasion of the first and second visits of Messrs. Moody and Sankey to the United Kingdom. The story of the Rio Tinto mines in Spain reveals the evangelical Christian as well as the enterprising man of business. There is also some account of the Highland home at Strathpeffer; and then the end—all peace and rest.

To read such a book as this, is a means of grace. A man of principle, cultivating love and patience, stayed upon God both in days of prosperity and adversity, Mr. Matheson was "a succourer of many." With him nothing was secular or profane; he was a servant of Christ, and everything that was placed in his charge received a steward's care. His courtesy was apparent to all, and his sincerity could not be hid. Once, when he had presided over a meeting at Inverness, a man was heard to remark to a fellow concerning him: "Yon's a man! He's gotten a' the ten commandments written on his face." The book presents a word-picture of a man who enjoyed God; and the pages are calculated to carry comfort and blessing to the hearts of merchants who have not the same trust in God and the same resource in times of anxiety and difficulty. There are excellent portraits and other engravings.

The well-known temperance tale Driven into the Ranks, by Rev. Rabson Vennell, has reached its third edition. (1s. Sunday School Union.)

His First Day's Work, by G. J. Bridges, is a railway story (1s. Nisbet) and tells of a lad who paid a great penalty for courage in the performance of duty.

Messrs. Weekes & Co. issue: The Union of the Two Flags. Words by Mrs. Shorey (author of "My Lord and I,") music by Frederic Arthur. A song which is sure to become popular.

One and All Gardening is a popular annual for amateurs, allotment holders, and working gardeners. The issue for 1900 is fully illustrated, and rich in practical contents. (2d. Agricultural and Horticultural Association, 92, Long Acre, W.C.)

The labours of a Methodist minister on the fringe of Australian civilization, among aboriginals and bush-rangers and stockmen, are depicted with force and unconventionality in The Backblocks Parson, by T. Bluegum. (2s. 6d. C. H. Kelly.)

The address delivered lately by the Earl of Rosebery, on the unveiling of the statue to the Great Protector, has been issued in booklet form (with portrait) by Andrew Melrose, with the title, Oliver Cromwell: A Eulogy and an Appreciation. (6d. nett.)

Band of Hope workers will find in Temperance Readings (1s. 6d.) and Chats with Children on Temperance Topics (1s.) many forcible and pointed talks on the principles and benefits of total abstinence. (Church of England Temperance Society.)

Comfort and Help for Common Days is a choice booklet by Dr. J. R. Miller. The cover is golden, and poetical selections for every day are given by lithography in gold and colours. "A thing of beauty" properly describes the booklet. (1s. S.S.U.)

The timely address on Experimental Religion, delivered at the Church Congress by Mr. Eugene Stock, has been issued in booklet form. Earnest in tone and direct in expression, it should command, as it deserves, a wide circulation. (2d. Marshall Bros.)

Boers or English: Who are in the Right? is an English translation of a pamphlet by Edmond Demolins, author of the well-known work on "Anglo-Saxon Superiority." The pages claim to be "a scientific vindication of British Colonial policy." (1s. The Leadenhall Press.)

Fugitive Verses, by Rev. Robert J. Golding-Bird, D.D. (Elliot Stock), contains poems on many topics. The first part is confined to compositions on times and seasons, civil and ecclesiastical; the second to domestic, patriotic, and religious sentiments, with thoughts on natural charms and wonders.

Those who follow the progress of thought in the Quaker community will read with interest Mr. William Tallack's pamphlet, The Scriptural Limitations of the Friends' Doctrine of the Sacraments. Reprinted from the Friends' Quarterly Examiner, the pages are characterized by an excellent spirit. (2d. Headley Bros.)

A little volume that will be welcome in many a home is Round the Hearth, a selection of true stories told in easy words, with some original verses. By Charles Tylor and Gordon Hargrave. (2s. Headley Brothers.) The readings are in simple words, and easy of comprehension. There are some highly-finished illustrations.

Mr. Elliot Stock has issued a cheap edition (1s.) of The Anglican Sister of Mercy, originally edited by the late Miss Whately. It tells the story of one who left the Devonport Sisterhood in 1852, and was at first entitled "Maude." The lady who wrote what Miss Whately edited, has lived to prepare this issue for the press.

The Starless Crown and Other Poems, by J. L. H., have now been reissued. During the years of its circulation the book has been a source of untold blessing to believers—strengthening trust, ministering spiritual and holy comfort, and inspiring and bracing them for the stress of every-day life and duty. (2s. 6d. Elliot Stock.)

Laura L. McL. Backler is a spiritual and graceful writer. Her recently-published little volume of verse, Voices of Christian Love and War, includes some brief poems characterized by simplicity and directness. The proceeds of the book are to be mainly devoted to charitable purposes. (1s. The Author, "Norland," Champion Park, Denmark Hill, S.E.)

Mark Hamilton's Daughters, by A. Fraser Robertson, is a brightly-written story of country life. Occasionally the dialogue deals somewhat in trivialities; but, taken as a whole, the book will be read with profit as well as interest. The two sisters, one selfish and worldly, the other dutiful and self-sacrificing, are admirably contrasted. (2s. Nelson & Sons.)

Those who are interested, either theoretically or practically, in the Open-air Treatment of Tuberculosis, will be glad to peruse an illustrated pamphlet, entitled British Sanatoria, issued by John Bale, Sons, & Danielsson, 83-89, Great Titchfield Street, W. (1s. 6d. nett). The chapters have been reprinted with additions from the "West London Medical Journal."

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons have issued a small work entitled Approximate Chronology of the Life of Our Lord Jesus Christ, by Rev. W. H. Yarrington, M.A., LL.B., rector of St. Luke's Church, Burwood and Concord. Some notes are added on salient points of Old Testament chronology. The work is specially designed for the use of students of small resources in the way of books. (1s. 6d.)

The latest production of Rev. Charles Bullock's facile pen is Courtship and Marriage, a bright little book which contains sage and timely counsel, as well as many apt quotations from various authors. The volume need not be regarded as exclusively designed for those who contemplate entering the married state; it may be read with profit by others. (1s. 6d. Home Words Office.)

Trusting and Toiling, the organ of the Mildmay Mission to the Jews, has completed another year. We welcome the volume containing last year's parts, as a repository of information regarding God's ancient people, and evangelistic work carried on among them in many lands. Whether in monthly or volume form, this magazine is sure of the sympathetic interest of many of our readers. (Marshall Bros., Paternoster Row.)

Messrs. Cassell have begun a new serial, to be completed in about twenty-four monthly parts, entitled Britain's Sea Kings and Sea Fights. The exploits of the navy, from the days of Drake to the present time, will be narrated and illustrated. The contributors will include B. Fletcher Robinson, Angus Evan Abbott, Commander Claud Harding, Major G. Le Gretton, and others. Famous paintings will be reproduced, also interesting old prints, maps, plans, &c. (6d. each part.)

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. have issued in a handsome form David Livingstone's Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa, including a sketch of Sixteen Years' Residence in the Interior of Africa. (2s.) It is the first volume of a reissue of the Minerva Library; and there is a striking portrait, also many excellent full-page illustrations. What Dr. Livingstone wrote of the Boers will be read with special interest at the present time. The volume is furnished with a full index.

Jack and Jill's Journal is the record of a tour through the plant kingdom. It has been written by Phœbe Allen, who is well known as the author of "Playing at Botany," and illustrated by Dr. Henry Godfrey. (3s. 6d. Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.) The book is a work of art,—written in the language of the young, and printed in blue. With such volumes available, there is little excuse for intelligent children being left ignorant of one of the most fascinating departments of scientific research and recreation.

The Gardening Year Book has appeared for the forty-second time, and it is more than ever worthy the designation of "The Garden Oracle." The records of new plants, fruits and flowers are retained, but in addition are included essays on the culture of a variety of popular plants, lists of the horticultural societies and of the public parks and gardens of the United Kingdom, and many other helpful articles. (1s. Gardeners' Magazine Office, 4, Ave Maria Lane, E.C.)

A Voice for Christ is a volume of sermons and outlines by Rev. W. E. Chapman, rector of Freshford, Bath. (John F. Shaw & Co.) The title describes the object of the preacher-author. The subjects are varied and of supreme importance. For those who like the reference after the quoted passage, and the tracing of truth to its sources and through its channels in the Written Word, this will be a welcome book. The outlines, as well as the fuller discourses, will be of real service to many a hard-pressed worker. The pages are expository and practical, and vital with the spirit and substance of Holy Scripture.

Dr. J. Rutter Williamson, late chairman of the British Student Volunteer Missionary Union, has written a striking treatise on medical missions, entitled The Healing of the Nations (2s. S. V. M. Union, 22, Warwick Lane). Designed to meet the needs of students and young people in missionary study classes, it is a powerful statement and appeal on a subject of pressing importance. The pages bear evidence of wide reading, and a bibliography is given for the help of those who would follow up the subject. Manner and matter combine to make this a book that should perform a very useful ministry in the great missionary cause.

Dr. Maclaren's published sermons are a literary extension of a singularly powerful and blessed ministry. All the qualities that belong to volumes of his discourses issued during past years are found in useful combination in Leaves From the Tree of Life. (5s. Isbister & Co.) There is nothing of the nature of verbiage here. The sermons, or studies, are about fifty in number, and not too long for reading by an invalid. For vigour of style and spirituality of substance, these "leaves" come in no degree behind the best of the author's work. That is saying much—and assuredly enough; for Dr. Maclaren's sermons are to be read and enjoyed, not to be criticised or even described by those who admire loyalty to Scripture teaching and sincerity in the application of Divine truth.

The February number of FOOTSTEPS OF TRUTH is largely of a missionary character. It contains verbatim reports of the addresses given at the Missionary Conference at Eccleston Hall. (1d. 164, Alexandra Road, N.W.)

THE JESUITS: WHAT ARE THEY? is a pamphlet for the present day. It asks what the order has done and is doing, and unfolds a tale of blackness and horror. Rev. F. A. C. Lillingston writes an introduction, and the publication is now in its fifth edition. (1d. R. Banks & Son.)

A MEDITATION ON GOD'S COVENANT OF GRACE, by the late Rev. Marcus Rainsford, minister of Belgrave Chapel (1d. Partridge & Co.), is a booklet convenient for use as a tract. The attributes of God are impersonated in conference with the Son of God, at which the requirements of justice are met by Christ offering to suffer in man's stead.

A TALK ABOUT MY WORK IN PRISON is the title of an address, issued in pamphlet form, by Rev. John Alexander, Chaplain of H.M. prison, Glasgow. The author gives some vivid and pathetic accounts of prison life, and expresses his views as to the causes of crime and the effects of imprisonment. (1d. C. Glass & Co., 43, Mitchell Street, Glasgow.)

Appropriately clothed in a cover of the popular khaki colour is the ILLUSTRATED SOUVENIR OF THE CITY OF LONDON IMPERIAL VOLUNTEERS, just published at the offices of the City Press, 148 and 149, Aldersgate Street, London (2d.). It is illustrated with portraits of the officers and men, and includes pictures of many incidents connected with the formation and departure of the regiment.

Many who read with profit Mrs. W. E. Legg's booklet, "A Gift: Will you take it?" will be glad to know that its sequel, THE GIFT ACCEPTED is now issued. There is here a message of loving admonition to those who have rejected the offered mercy, and are content to remain in sin, with many touching incidents. (1d. Partridge, or The Author, 7, Woodville Gardens, Ealing.)

Obituary.

MISS K. QUARME.

A DEVOTED worker has passed away in the person of Miss Kate Quarme, of Scotforth, Lancaster, in which village she, with her deceased sister, had for many years, carried on a fruitful mission in a room lent for the purpose by the Society of Friends. Miss Quarme, who had attained the age of sixty-three, was well known for her unremitting labours in various branches of aggressive work, and many owed their conversion, under God, to her earnest endeavours to lead them to Christ.

MRS. SHERIFF HILL.

The death of Mrs. Hill, of Dingwall, removes an earnest and gracious Christian lady. Her position lent influence, which a consecrated Christian character fully utilized for the glory of God and the good of her fellows. Indeed, it might well be said that whatever tended to bless and benefit others was of the deepest interest to Mrs. Hill. She delighted in Gospel work, and the humblest missioners who visited the town, as well as Mr. Moody, Major Whittle, and other honoured evangelists, were certain of her sympathy and co-operation. Her wide and intelligent knowledge of the Scriptures has added interest to many a Bible reading; and she also laboured devotedly in the Y.W.C.A. In many Christian circles her death will be sincerely mourned.

MISS A. T. PATON.

Not eleven months ago we recorded the death of Mr. W. T. Paton, and shortly afterwards gave a portrait and biographical sketch of him. In October last Mrs. Paton followed him into the presence of the Lord; and now their only child, Miss Alice Turnley Paton, has also been called away. Both Mrs. and Miss Paton were, like the husband and father, devoted workers for Christ. They carried on, with much blessing, the Cloudesley Institute for young women in Barnsbury, a branch of the Y.W.C.A. On Saturday last the mortal remains of Miss Paton were laid to rest at Abney Park, after a service at St. Mary Magdalene's, Holloway, conducted by Revs. A. Mercer and M. Rainsford. A great number of the young women and girls connected with the Cloudesley Institute assembled round the grave, and sweetly sang "Good Night" in farewell to the friend they so dearly loved. The Institute, which was originally a fruit of Mr. Moody's great campaign at the Agricultural Hall in 1875, is now, in its thrice bereaved condition, humbly committed to the care of Him in whose name it was begun and continued.

MR. W. A. KINGSCOTE, LATE R.N.

By the death, on Sunday morning, the 11th inst., of Mr. W. A. Kingscote, of Pigeonsford, Llangranog, South Wales, the Open-air Mission has lost one of its most devoted and earnest preachers. As a valiant soldier in the army of the Lord, and a truly noble, yet humble, witness to the power of the Gospel, his manly presence will be greatly missed on Epsom Downs, on Ascot Racecourse, on Doncaster Town Moor, and at many other places, where last season his cheery talk and faithful example were such an inspiration to his comrades. Once a gambler and owner of race-horses, his testimony on these "high places of the field" was always practical and scriptural.

Mr. Kingscote commenced life as an officer in H.M. Navy; and, although his conversion took place only six years ago, there have been crowded into that brief space labours indeed abundant. In October last, at the three great Midland fairs—Peterborough, Nottingham, and Leicester—he was much used by his Master, and enjoyed the work immensely. His beaming face was an inspiration to see. I parted with him at Leicester, when he was in excellent health. However, a few weeks since, at his home in Wales (where he will be greatly missed), he was seized with congestion of the lungs, with heart complications. He passed away triumphantly with the repeated exclamation: "Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!"

The Churches.

Church of England.

The Bishop of Bangor is confined to his house at Aberdovey by laryngeal catarrh, and, acting under medical advice, he has given directions for postponing his visitation, which had been fixed for various centres during the present week.

Rev. W. H. Griffith Thomas is announced to deliver lectures on "English Church Teaching" at St. Phillip's, Bristol, on seven Wednesday evenings, February 21 to April 4, and in Christ Church, Clifton, on seven successive Thursday mornings, February 22 to April 5.

Rev. H. S. Pigot, vicar of Horwich, proposes to erect a new iron church to provide for the spiritual wants of about 900 persons. The building will hold 300. All the seats will be free, and as the site, which is valued at £200, has been given, it is estimated that the cost of erection will not exceed £400.

The trustees have appointed to the vicarage of St. George's, Tufnell Park, Rev. G. E. Asker, Vicar of St. Andrew's, Lambeth. Mr. Asker has shown conspicuous ability as a preacher and organizer, and has won the esteem of his parishioners, while he is also well known in connection with the work of the Children's Special Service Mission.

At the annual meeting of the Liverpool Diocesan branch of the Church Pastoral Aid Society it was resolved, the gathering expressed "its sincere regret at the approaching departure of Rt. Rev. John Ryle, Lord Bishop of Liverpool, who during his episcopate has always been the warm and sympathetic friend and supporter of this Society, and the firm and consistent champion of Evangelical truth."

Mr. Colin F. Campbell, the Hon. Social Secretary of the Church Army, is sending out regularly large parcels of woollen underclothing, flannel shirts, socks, &c., for the troops in South Africa. The whole of the material so far has been provided by friends of the Society, and the articles themselves have been made by the female dependents of soldiers serving at the front, full trade prices being paid to the women for their work.

During the time that Bishop Ryle has been at Liverpool, he has seen the number of parochial clergy increased from 255 to 431; forty-four new churches have been consecrated, and seventeen smaller churches have been licensed. Furthermore, fifty-one new mission halls and church rooms have been erected; there has been church restoration and improvement over the whole diocese; and by means of the scheme which Dr. Ryle instituted for the augmentation of poor livings, the income of every clergyman in the diocese has been increased to £250.

Congregational.

Rev. C. W. Cliffe, who has accepted the pastorate of Queen's Park, Manchester, will begin his ministry there on March 18.

The manual of the Dulwich Grove Church, over which Rev. Albert Swift recently settled with so much promise, gives account of many well-directed agencies. The church is free from debt, and bent upon aggressive evangelization.

The church at St. Ann's Well Road, Nottingham (Rev. J. D. Allan), has been pewed throughout, and galleries for organ and choir are in course of erection. At the re-opening services, which also memorized the anniversary of the pastor's settlement, a number of leading ministers took part.

Baptist.

Meetings on behalf of the Century Fund have been held in Bloomsbury Chapel (Rev. B. J. Gibbon). Revs. A. F. Riley and J. H. Shakespeare were present as a deputation, and promises were received amounting to £280.

The annual meeting of Bow Road Church, E., has been held, Pastor Fred H. King presiding. The reports showed a healthy condition in every branch of the work. During the afternoon the pastor sat in his vestry to receive thankofferings, which amounted to nearly £80.

The annual meeting of the Baptist Sunday-school Union of Wales was recently held at Tredegarville Chapel, Cardiff, under the presidency of Rev. T. Jones (Aberdare). There was a large attendance of ministers and delegates from the districts included in the Union, and the reports showed that important work had been done during the year.

At Cavendish Church, Ramsgate (Rev. T. Hancocks) progress continues to be made with the efforts to secure new schools. Memorial stones were laid on February 8 by the Mayor of Ramsgate (Mr. J. B. Hodgson), Mr. Henry Wood, treasurer of the Baptist Union, and other friends. At the subsequent meeting Mr. G. H. Deane, presided, and spirited addresses were given. All the local Free Church ministers took part during the day. The pastor's statement showed about £450 as the day's proceeds, £1,500 more being required in order that the schools may be opened free of debt. Mr. Hancock's address is 3, Ellington Terrace, Ramsgate.

Methodist.

The Liverpool district of the United Methodist Free Churches numbers 2,215 members. It has already promised nearly 5,000 guineas to the Twentieth Century Fund.

The executive of the Wesleyan Methodist Twentieth Century Fund, the object of which is to raise a sum of one million guineas for connexional purposes, have already £250,000 in hand, and contributions are being received from all parts of British Methodism at an average of more than £1,000 per day.

Rev. Charles Ogden, superintendent of the Baillie Street Circuit (Rochdale) of the United Methodist Free Churches, is intending to retire from active circuit work at the annual assembly of 1901. Mr. Ogden will then have been a minister forty-one years, having been accepted in 1860 from the Todmorden Circuit.

Dr. Fitchett has informed the President of the South Australian Conference that he has Rev. H. Price Hughes' permission to announce that he hopes to visit Australia next year, accompanied by Mrs. Hughes. It is his intention to spend four months in the colonies, preaching, holding conventions similar to those of last year in this country, and addressing united meetings of the Free Churches.

The Primitive Methodist College at Manchester will benefit to some extent by the sale, for £5,000, of the old Theological Institute at Sunderland, which has now passed into the hands of the Roman Catholics, the first purchaser having thus disposed of it. For thirty years it has rendered good denominational service. Rev. Dr. William Antliff was first principal, and a number of men who now lead in connexional matters were trained within its walls.

Presbyterian.

At the annual meeting of the Plymouth Church, a large and representative gathering was presided over by the minister, Rev. W. Harvey-Jellie, and reports of a highly encouraging nature were presented.

At the forthcoming great missionary demonstration in Queen's Hall, on May 15, Rev. Dr. Watson ("Ian Maclaren"), who by that time is expected to be Moderator of the Synod, will preside, and Rev. Dr. Paton, of the New Hebrides, has been invited to be one of the speakers. He has already reached America, and will probably stay over the International Missionary Congress, which assembles in New York in April.

Salvation Army.

A Shelter for women has been established in Paris.

Breakfasts for poor children are being supplied at eight London Slum Corps, at the charge of ½d. per meal.

Sir Charles Warren speaks warmly of the Army's work amongst the troops in his column at the front in South Africa.

Twenty-seven additional village banks have been established in India, to which country ten additional English officers are proceeding this week.

Society of Friends.

Richard Lamb, with minute of Richhill Monthly Meeting, has visited Limerick. In the evening a social meeting was held at the house of Joseph Bennis, at which most Friends were present, and Richard Lamb had a message of cheer and encouragement.

At Westminster and Longford monthly meeting, held at Westminster on the 15th inst., Wm. Hobson expressed the concern, that for many years had been on his mind, to pay a visit, in Gospel love, to Friends in the United States, especially of the Middle and Western States, and in Canada. After careful and prayerful deliberation, and the expression of hearty sympathy, the monthly meeting gave a minute of unity and encouragement for the prosecution of the undertaking. Such visits used to be more frequent than during recent years.

Ellwood Brockbank has had valuable service in a visit to Gloucester, visiting Sherborne Street Adult School, and addressing the Friends' meeting for worship at Grey Friars. In the afternoon he gave a Bible reading to the largest adult Bible Class held for a long time, and preached at Sherborne Street the same evening. The Sherborne Street Mothers' Meeting on Monday afternoon and a meeting for workers in the evening completed his service in the city. In all the gatherings the Lord's power was manifestly present, and the visit has left happy memories and promising results.

Fallen Asleep.

Mrs. Charles Keen, only surviving daughter of Mr. John Jones, of 64, Godolphin Road, Shepherd's Bush, the well-known evangelist and tract writer. Mrs. Keen died after only a brief illness, borne with Christian fortitude.—Rev. W. Spensley, pastor of St. George Street Congregational Chapel, Sunderland.—Mr. William Francis, of the Willows, North Bradley, connected with Back Street Baptist Church, Trowbridge, nearly fifty years. For many years he was deacon of the Church and treasurer of the Sunday-school. Mr. George Henshall, of Sandbach, who had for many years rendered valuable service in many capacities as a Wesleyan Methodist. —Wesleyan Methodism at High Green, in Sheffield (Thorncliffe) Circuit, has sustained a great loss in the death of Mr. Robert H. Fletcher. He was of a retiring disposition, but his sound judgment made him sought for.—Birmingham has suffered the loss of one of its most eminent Evangelical Churchmen in the death, last Sunday, of Mr. J. D. Goodman, at the ripe age of eighty-three. Mr. Goodman was a trustee of four of the town parishes.—At Winchester, Rev. William Lambert, late of Woodmansterne, Surrey, and late vicar of Pennington, Hants, aged eighty-five.—At the Rectory, Buxted Sussex, Rev. George Purves Pownall, late vicar of St. John's, Hoxton, and formerly Dean of Perth, Western Australia, aged seventy-seven.—Mr. Andrew Coats, of Perth, One of the most philanthropic gentlemen in Perth, Mr. Coats was associated with every charitable organization and institution in the city. He was a strong supporter of the Free Church.—Sir Kenneth S. Mackenzie, of Gairloch, Bart. This esteemed public man was an elder of the Free Church, Maryburgh, Ross-shire.—On the 9th inst., Mr. Isaac P. Dickerson, ex-slave and original jubilee singer. Mr. Dickerson had of late been conducting evangelistic services by speech and song, with marked blessing.—Mr. J. C. Parker, a London City Missionary, who had for many years laboured with great blessing in the visitation of public-houses.

Notices.

A correspondent would like to find some lines beginning:—

"Immanuel's orphan cry was heard,
'My God, I am forsaken,'
That of the lost no soul might use,
Those words of desolation."

Another reader inquires for the first line and author of a hymn ending:—

"Heir of glory
That shall be for me and Thee."

A third desires: "Where can I find a tract, entitled 'A Flower and a Mourner?'"

A reader would like to know the publisher's name of a leaflet. "Only a year since she died."

Notes & Comments

A FAMOUS preacher, whose years of service cover half a century, writes: "The work never seemed so great as it does now—now as the shadow lengthens on the plain, and the day wears on to evensong." In no other work is there the same feeling of the immense field of labour still to be covered. The scientist often realizes how little he has discovered, the astronomer knows how much is still hidden from his gaze, the scholar understands the ever-growing scope of literature; but in a peculiar way it is left for the Christian worker to feel how vast is the task which he is privileged to attempt.

And it is right to be conscious of our own weakness. If a preacher or teacher were to feel at the close of his career that he had done all he could, that the work committed to his hands had been carried out to its full extent, we might well doubt the sincerity of his heart. The greatest worker realizes how little he is doing, and as the day of life wanes he is most conscious of the honour he has had in being a co-worker with God.

"The sense of grace bestowed upon the unworthy is the living pulse of all working and joyful Christianity." So said a Christian who abounded in labours, and "brought forth fruit in old age." The truth of it is seen in the life of every real Christian. The power and impulse to move, the strength to endure, the patience and faith to be ready to every good work, no matter what the discouragement, is, in this sense, of grace. We need a richer enjoyment of the love of God in Christ, rather than urgent entreaties and admonitions to do our duty. Duty really never lags behind grace—welcomed with thanksgiving into the heart.

There is a thought for some Christians in an incident which has recently been reported. A cyclist was tried by court-martial for "circulating reports calculated to cause despondency amongst Her Majesty's troops." The trial took place in beleaguered Ladysmith, and ended in a sentence of twelve months' hard labour. Dangerous as such a crime would be in a town surrounded by the enemy, and in dire straits, it is not less dangerous for "reports calculated to cause despondency" to be circulated among Christian workers. If they fail to retain hope, then indeed is their position a sad one. God cannot use a faithless man, and the worst service anyone can perform in a church or a mission is to spread despondency.

The past few days have brought news of desperate fighting in South Africa, attended in various directions with success to British arms. Many incidents have enforced the appeal to humane instincts and Christian feeling; and it was a great relief to learn on Tuesday morning that General Cronje had surrendered with the force under his command. All will hope and pray that the conflict may soon end, and that peace may speedily reign in South Africa and throughout the world.

The fact that during the last two centuries our country has expended over £200,000,000 upon war, and that we are paying over £20,000,000 a year as interest, may well give rise to painful reflections, especially as in regard to many of the wars in which we have unfortunately been engaged perhaps only few of us know what they were about or what was the result. Yet our rulers continue to speak glibly about war, and the possibilities of war, instead of crying day and night to Him, to whom all power in heaven and on earth has been given, to grant us peace in our time—peace to allow us to labour for the salvation of the heathen races, and for the spread of his kingdom who is the Prince of Peace.

Although responsible members of the Government have declined to use the word compulsion or conscription in connection with the proposed military changes, we are not out of danger. Other men have announced their wish to see our young men compelled to enter the army, and they mean to use every opportunity to carry their point. It will require strenuous effort to avert this calamity, which will be worse than losing many South Africas. The whole tone and manner of British life will be altered. New ideals, and lower, will be placed before us. Home life will be broken up. The barracks will supersede the cricket-ground. Military exercises will draw young men away from our places of worship. Parades will extinguish prayer meetings. Business will suffer, but the Church will suffer most of all. And the nation will enter on another path from that which she has trodden for hundreds of years. Appealing to the sword, she will perish with the sword.

Notwithstanding the fact that the Mansion House Fund for the relief of the Transvaal sufferers from the war has reached about £720,000, it speaks volumes for the generosity of the British public that the Indian Famine contributions amount to about £100,000 already. A recent telegram from the Viceroy to the Secretary of State for India gives the total number of persons in receipt of assistance as 3,913,000. The widespread nature of the famine makes it extremely difficult to deal adequately with the appalling distress. One sure channel of relief should be through missionaries on the spot. Many of them are in the closest touch with the most destitute sufferers. On Friday, March 2, at 3.30 and 7.30, Revs. I. F. Row and Dennis Osborne speak on the subject at Mildmay Conference Hall, and they may be relied upon for impartiality in the succour they give.

The Commissioner of a daily contemporary has given to the world a pathetic summary of a "Stroll through Netley Hospital." Just now such a visit is brimful of the deepest interest. Some of the inmates, invalided home from South Africa, are eager to return to the front. With many, however, there is a reticence on the general subject of the war. Their experiences of the battle-field, with its untold horrors, have been totally different from their dreams of martial glory. All have passed through scenes of danger, death, and suffering that can never be forgotten. To not a few hospital life has been a season of serious thought. So near they have been to the gates of death that the need of a personal interest in the atonement of God's dear Son has been brought close home to them. To many the day of battle may prove to have been the day of spiritual victory through the power of a living faith.

Professor Handley Moule's recent sermon at Cambridge on "Be zealous, therefore, and repent," contains remarkably apt reference to the present crisis through which our country is passing. He says:

> God has a controversy with us for our declining reverence for his revelation, for his day, for the worship of his most sacred Name. He has a controversy with us for a national self-confidence far different from grave self-reliance—rather its parody, expressing itself not often loudly, but often crudely, and as if our destinies lay in our own right hands. He has a controversy with us for extremes of luxury here, and for wild lust of sport and pleasure there, and for the ineffable wrong of more than tolerated intemperance, and of regulated vice, and for the soulless excitement of the gambler.

Multitudes will read these words with sincere thankfulness that one whose spiritual influence is so powerful has spoken in this faithful manner on the sins and iniquities of our time. We are drawn to earnest prayer as we read them that the whole nation may "be zealous, therefore, and repent."

The crisis in the Church of England is having at least one beneficent result, in that it is forcing the bishops to declare themselves definitely on some disputed points of ritual and doctrine. Dr. Creighton, in his charge to the London Diocese, clearly affirms that the great boon of the Reformation was the gift of spiritual liberty to England, and any attempt to entangle us back to the old bondage must therefore be resisted. On the other hand, the clergy must loyally abide by the Prayer Book, which, the bishop affirms, allows no place in the Church of England for the "Mass," and for private confession in the sense now insisted upon by many Anglicans.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has been inundated with letters relative to the prayer for the dead which was included in the recently published form of intercession. We cannot say that his reply, through his chaplain, is very creditable either to his ingenuity or his exegesis of Scripture. His chaplain writes:—

> The prayer is not for all the dead, but only for the faithful. To them the Lord has promised entrance into his kingdom in heaven, and just as we pray for that kingdom to come, knowing that it certainly will come, so we may pray that the faithful departed may be admitted there, knowing that they certainly will.

The idea of praying for certain established results, according to the Archbishop's letter, hardly commends itself to our belief in what Christ intended by prayer. The introduction of prayers for the dead is absolutely unjustified by Scripture. The following sentence of one protest should be carefully studied:—

> The committee of the National Club desire most strongly to protest against any such idea being allowed to prevail, and they cannot but fear that the introduction of the clause referred to is likely to have very dangerous results, emphasizing, as it does, those points of disagreement which tend to promote the disruption and disestablishment of the Church!

The Liverpool Diocesan Calendar gives a remarkable account of what Dr. Ryle has achieved during the years of his episcopate. The material work, of course, is tangible; the spiritual is of another sort, and cannot be scheduled. Two remarks are noteworthy; one of them says that the improvement is seen in the spiritual advancement of the Church, as witnessed in the growth of its Sunday-schools, number of confirmees, increase of men's services, and the large additional interest in the work of Home and Foreign Missions.

This is the highest standard of efficiency. But on this again the report goes on to say:—

Here we would call attention to an important conclusion, which, after twenty-five years' close observation, appears to be an indisputable fact—viz., that Nonconformity does not flourish in an Evangelical Diocese like that of Liverpool.

We wonder whether the Nonconformists of Liverpool will admit this conclusion, or whether they will affirm that there are other determining factors in the question. No doubt hungry souls will go where their spiritual needs are best supplied.

We are glad to learn that the tentative concession of reduced fares, granted last year by Railway Companies to representatives at the provincial meetings of the great religious denominations and societies, will be permanent. Return tickets will therefore be issued at a fare and a quarter. This will facilitate the attendance of delegates in much larger numbers than heretofore, and will help to enhance interest in the gatherings. At last religious bodies have been granted similar privileges to those enjoyed by racing and kindred fraternities.

The United Parliamentary Council of the liquor trade has stated that all measures for the limitation of the Sunday trade in drink must be "strenuously resisted," adding that nothing has occurred to indicate that the majority of the people would be willing to relinquish "a right that has existed for centuries." The duty of the Christian elector is, therefore, as urgent as it is clear.

It is more noteworthy, however, to find the Council in a state of alarm in regard to the Bill to prohibit the sale or delivery of intoxicating liquor to any person under the age of sixteen for consumption on or off the premises. The public mind appears to be pretty well made up in regard to that point, and it goes without saying that a trade which, by the admission of its own representatives, profits largely by the demoralization of children, is an enemy to the best interests of the State.

Birmingham, which has so often taken the leadership in great public movements, among others in the promotion of adult Sunday-schools, is now making a still bolder step forward in the establishment of a Training College for Sunday-school Teachers. The plan is to provide accommodation and tuition at a very reasonable rate in the evenings for twenty resident students, who must be young men of approved Christian character, with teaching provision for non-resident students of both sexes. If carried out in the right spirit, this idea should have excellent results. It is too often taken for granted that zeal and willingness are all that are demanded in Sunday-school teaching, with lamentable results later on in the revolt of scholars from the ignorance and incapacity of teachers to deal with their difficulties. It would be an immense service to the church of the future if, to the devotion that has characterized Sunday-school teaching, is added a true and adequate knowledge of teaching methods and of Biblical truth, such as is provided for in the Bible Institutes of Chicago and Glasgow, described in this issue of our paper.

"Pass a friend to meet a stranger," said an American pastor recently to his congregation, to guide them in their treatment of casual visitors to his church. This principle might appropriately be commended to churches in our own country. Many officials and more members are, to say the least, never demonstrative in their welcome of strangers. Cordiality is not always a distinguishing grace with them. At the close of public worship, opportunities not unfrequently occur for the interchange of those Christian amenities that go a long way to make the "stranger within the gates" feel that he is welcome.

Dr. G. S. Barrett (of Norwich), in a recent sermon on "Hallowed be thy Name," made an earnest plea for the cultivation of a more reverent spirit in our religious life. True reverence would show itself in manner as well as feeling. It would promote such frequently neglected habits as punctuality. The man who bounced into his seat just as service commenced, who sat bolt upright during prayer, who was only singing the words of the hymns oblivious of their meaning, and who was thinking of last week's business during the sermon, was not worshipping. Reverence for the name of God also promoted reverence for his book. In this respect a great deal of the higher criticism seemed irreverent; some of the critics treated the Bible like a Greek play or a Chinese classic. Without laying down artificial limits to the critic's function, he claimed that it was better to be a little less wise about some matters if the heart but retained its reverence and sense of solemnity at the thought of God.

Mrs. Humphry Ward is again hard at work proclaiming her scheme for a "new and powerful" Broad Church wide enough to include all those who desire to gather round the Lord's Table, and yet to retain their antagonistic views in regard to a number of the vital doctrines of the Christian belief. Apparently, Mrs. Ward cannot find comfort or strength in the invertebrate anomalies of Socinianism, and yet is unwilling to exchange what she terms the "conclusions of history and criticism" for the simple truth as it is in Jesus. There is only one effective remedy for the restlessness of latitudinarianism, and it does not lie in the direction of extending the boundaries of that barren land.

Most modern innovations in religion are exploded ancient heresies revived. It is not generally known that this is the case with Christian Science. It is simply a phase of ancient Alexandrian Gnosticism modernized. The old and the new teaching are strangely alike in that they both posit the essential non-existence of matter, and pain, and evil generally—these are but shadows, the only reality is spirit. We have, therefore, but to believe that we are well, to be well; and good, to be good; and holy, to be holy; it is all a matter of will. Gnosticism began, like "Christian" Science, with the deification of faith as the one principle of the true life. But it is the wrong kind of faith in both cases, being faith in the resources of the self. The danger is that the same ultimate catastrophe be repeated, and what began with an appeal to faith should end in the enthronement of licence.

The question raised by Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson in the Contemporary is of vital importance, viz.: Is a strong nation like ours justified in handing over to another nation a weak people, such as the Samoans, without consulting their wishes? True, no doubt, that the Germans, to whom the Samoans have been given as we might have given a piece of land, may treat them well; but what are we but dealers in men when we act in this way? And can we do violence to sacred principles without injuring our moral sense as a nation and our moral prestige among the nations of the earth? It is always by their treatment of the feeble and helpless that the strong reveal themselves. In the case of the Samoans we handed over, not only without their consent but against their wish, a great body of fellow Christians.

We are very slow at admitting any appeal to the secular power on account of a man's religion, but at the least he ought to be allowed to worship God without being persecuted or placed under any disability. In South India, in the native states of Travancore, Cochin, and Mysore, native Christians are deprived of their rights "on the ground of their religious connection." With these states our Government has great influence, but it refuses to advise them to alter their procedure. Our missionaries think that its reasons are unsound and unworthy. It recalls the original British policy in India which discouraged Christianity and fostered heathenism. By all means, let there be no favoritism: we only plead for freedom from persecution, and surely every man has a right to that.

Rev. J. B. Turner, of Tientsin, North China, now home on furlough, makes some startling statements in a contemporary regarding the progress of the opium traffic in China. As the statements of missionaries and religious workers are very much at a discount with Government officials and a large section of the public, the evidence of the Viceroy Chang Chih Tung, one of the foremost ministers of the Emperor, in his recent book on "Siam," is not likely to be controverted. He says:—

The Customs returns for the past few years give the value of our imports at 80,000,000 ounces of silver (about £11,500,000), and the exports at 50,000,000 (about £7,000,000); the balance of 30,000,000 ounces of silver (about £4,500,000) represents what has been consumed in smoking the pernicious opium. Assuredly it is not foreign intercourse that is ruining China, but this dreadful poison. Oh, the grief and desolation it has wrought to our people! A hundred years ago the curse came upon us more blasting and deadly than the great Flood or the scourge of the Fierce Beasts, for the waters assuaged after nine years, and the ravages of the man-eaters were confined to one place.

A new effort is being made to suppress gambling in the United States. As in this country, so in America there are important companies which become sureties for the honesty of employés. These companies have intimated lately that the moment an employer becomes aware that the employé has been gambling the surety for his honesty becomes void. Perhaps such a stern rule, if introduced into this country—with the addition that the moment an employé is found to be gambling he shall be dismissed—would have as wholesome results. It is a tribute to Christianity that employers who do not profess to be religious should often make a point of being served by men and women who are known to be religious. We have even heard of brewers insisting on nearly all their staff being pledged teetotalers, and bringing up their families upon total abstinence principles.

The Force of a Personal Plea.

MR. MOODY had good reason to believe in the value of personal dealing with individuals, for he never forgot the ffectionate interest shown by his teacher in is soul's welfare. He used to say that he ways felt the touch of that good man's hand n his shoulder.

Many Christian workers beside Mr. Moody ould bear testimony to the enormous impor- nce of a personal appeal to the unsaved. Ien and women may be impressed in the rowd, they may weep and pray in a throng, ut it is the heart-to-heart work which leaves ie most abiding impression.

Andrew is sometimes called "the Intro- ucer," a title which any man might be proud bear in the cause of Christ. It was he who oke to his brother Philip and led him to hrist; it was his alert intelligence that rought the boy with the loaves and fishes to esus, when the multitude hungered. Doubtless, e spoke to many another on the fringe of each udience, and though not a prominent disciple, e may have been one of the most useful. Oh, r more Andrews in the Church to-day! In the fe-long experience of a famous evangelist, he ould only recall one case where tactful con- ersation on religious matters was resented. Ien and women are often only too ready to espond to the slightest advance, if they can el that the speaker is sincere. The world ust be our Holy Land. Up and down the usty roads of life we must walk, diffusing hrist-like sympathy and love. On its lakes nd mountains, in its crowded towns, we must peak the good news to our fellow-men. Only small minority of Christians can ever expect address the crowds, but we may all speak to lividuals.

n this work we shall do well to remember proximity to Christians, and constant course with them, may be helpful to a which is yet outside of Christ; but it ot not save it. Every link on a gold chain ust be stamped separately to ensure the enuineness of the chain. It is not enough to le[illegible]hat on either side of one little link ere ... one that is stamped; proximity will ot make the unstamped link equal to its ompanions. So, in family life and church fe, each member must come individually to hrist, and not rest on the vain belief that, ecause he or she is in the midst of Christians, herefore there is no need for personal anxiety. ach group of acquaintances, each family rcle, contains probably someone who has not ade peace with God. Let us seek to have ach link in the beloved chain stamped with he hall-mark, "Saved."

This dealing with individuals is no easy sk. It involves careful consideration of every- ody's idiosyncrasies and methods of thought. here must be a loving realization of each one's ifficulties, but at the same time a deep-set onviction that in Christ all difficulties can be et. Some people hug their unbelief, and re almost impervious to any argument which ould rob them of their doubts. They dispute bout various minor matters with a skill nd verbosity which tell of long practice. hey could not explain to you the mplest facts of life—the methods by hich we digest our food, travel by steam, peak through the telephone—yet they refuse believe the Bible because they cannot entally grasp how certain miracles were per- rmed. It will be wasted time to argue upon uch matters; the best way is to make men ealize, not their own supposed wisdom, but eir sinfulness before God. By the side of nsolved problems, the certainty of their sin will stand out as a great undeniable fact. We shall be wise to emphasize the sense of sin.

If Christians set themselves the duty of dealing with individuals, they would find in the work not only a great joy, but an added strength to their own spiritual life. We know so little of one another; there is a hedge between even the most friendly. Nothing will add to our powers of sympathy like a personal acquaintance due to religious conversation. If the courage to speak to friends and relatives be lacking at first, begin with utter strangers.

But go to the task fresh from communion with Christ; realize his infinite compassion, his yearning over the multitude, and covet the glorious title of "Introducer."

Thoughts on Prayer.

By Dr. ALEX. WHYTE.

PREACHING in Carr's Lane Chapel, Birmingham, in connection with the P.S.A. National Conference, Dr. Alexander Whyte took for his text, "It came to pass that as He was praying in a certain place, when He ceased, one of his disciples said unto Him, Lord, teach us to pray" (Luke xi. 1). After referring to the indications which were given in his text of Christ's habits of appealing to his Heavenly Father in prayer, the preacher reminded his hearers of an old Scotch minister who used to say, "God delights in adverbs much more than verbs," meaning that it was not so much the perfunctory performance of an act of worship which was appreciated by God, as the quality of the act, the spirit in which it was performed. He had jotted down a few adverbs for the consideration of his audience, and the first of them he would take from the Master's own lips. Christ had said,

PRAY SECRETLY.

Christ was very strong upon secret praying, and as all his teaching was experience, it had about it a note of reality and authority. It was not necessary to shut oneself up and lock a wooden door in order pray secretly. Secrecy was in the heart. It was sometimes a great help to a man to secure himself against intrusion and pray until he brought himself sensibly into the presence of God. Prayer was, he thought, as much a duty as a splendid and indispensable privilege. Family prayer, social and congregational prayer, was great; but secret prayer had in it a delight, a refuge, and a solace peculiar to itself.

PRAY DELIBERATELY.

Let us not only pray by ejaculation on our way to business; not only when the bell rings, or when we feel some stab of conscience, some pang of a broken heart. We must pray as we perform our daily work—putting our hearts into it. "Praying," said the preacher, "is a thing that has often dislocated men's bodies. It has sometimes brought blood to a man's handkerchief by the sweat of his brow. You will need to mend your manners before you make much progress in prayers. You will never be saved in your sleep. Take your coat off to your prayers." Just as people consider their business seriously, they should consider their prayers to God.

PRAY IMAGINATIVELY.

Prayer could often be more real and earnest if the gift of imagination were brought into action. William Law said, "Don't be in a hurry when you kneel down; wait and shut your eyes and open the eyes of your soul, and don't begin till you have fairly got a hold of God. Wait until you are quite sure you have seen the mercy seat, and the Lamb standing beyond it, and the multitude that no man can number. And you will see them letting down the censer to your very lips and your very heart, and you will begin to pray without any effort. Your heart will sure to be there. Make a picture of the heavenly country." Men would pray with more innerness, more tenderness, if they prayed imaginatively. The picture-making power is a divine power lodged in the human heart for impressing the understanding and the conscience. We should pray pictorially, pray imaginatively, pray ourselves into sympathy with those with and for whom we pray.

And further, prayer should be undertaken "sacramentally;" we should get into the way of bringing the Word into everything we do, and then every action of our daily lives would be made sacramental—a means of grace.

PRAY IMPORTUNATELY,

pray particularly. Generalities never pierce a man's conscience, and in prayer we must not lose ourselves in dead generalities. Pray vicariously for all people, for your children. Devote a day of prayer to each, and when you have learned to pray for your own, pray for other people's children.

It is not so much the act of praying that God looks for, but the kind of man who prays and the way he prays.

The Hardening of Pharaoh's Heart.

By Rev. A. S. COOK, M.A.

THE Scripture informs us of a double action in this:—1. Pharaoh hardened his heart (Ex. viii. 15, &c.) 2. God hardened Pharaoh's heart (Ex. iv. 21; x. 20, &c.) Both of these statements are true and consistent. It is noticeable that Pharaoh, after each of the first five plagues, persisted in his obstinate unwillingness to be influenced by the wondrous miracles sent with a gracious purpose, and refused to let the children of Israel go. Any apparent relenting on his part only endured so long as he lay under the ban of the plague. It is said in Ex. viii. 15, that, "when Pharaoh saw there was respite he hardened his heart." It is plain, therefore, that it was but an unwilling consent which was wrung from him, and he had no intention of fulfilling his promise. His conduct, after those first five plagues, exhibits a progressive insensibility to the Divine message of each miracle, and shows how free-will may be exercised wrongfully, in spite of the most striking attempts to induce its possessor to exercise it aright.

After the sixth miraculous plague a change is apparent. It is not Pharaoh now who is said to harden his heart—his day of grace seems over; it is God who has intervened in a very special manner, and after each of the remaining plagues it is said the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart. Note.—Ex. ix. 34 must be viewed in the light of what is said in Ex. x. 1. Thus, from the narrative itself, the position of Pharaoh, as an active agent at first, and then as a doomed object of Divine wrath, is clearly seen, an awful object-lesson of the folly of trifling with a long suffering, much-enduring God.

The question will naturally arise, Does there not seem to be in Rom. ix. 17, an evidence of the pre-ordained doom of this wicked man, to the extent that he was powerless to have acted otherwise? Apparently, yes; actually, no. The abundant manifestations of Divine power which would otherwise have been a mockery, were given to Pharaoh to profit thereby, but because he wilfully set himself to disregard the Divine admonitions, his fore-known heart-obduracy brought upon him a fore-ordained fate. "Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world" (Acts xv. 18).

The Almighty made him a monument of judgment. In that passage of Rom. ix. 17, the Divine side only appears, whilst the history of Pharaoh in the book of Exodus shews the double picture of human action arousing Divine condemnation. Men are "raised up" to different elevations; some like David and Daniel use their positions for God's glory, others like Pharaoh and Saul, use them for their own selfish ends, and falling from their high estate, exhibit the justice of God, after despising and rejecting his long continued goodness and mercy.

Mr. Gladstone wrote an excellent article on this subject in the Nineteenth Century some years ago from which I will quote. Writing of Homeric accounts of Olympian deities interfering in human affairs, especially in setting "divinely interposed hindrances to the repentance of offenders," he says:—

The hardening of Pharaoh's heart is predicted in Exodus iv., but nothing of the kind takes place, until a solemn demand has been made upon him and contumeliously refused. From the beginning of chap. v. down to chap. ix. 34 we have two forms of statement intermixed; the one, that the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, and the other that he hardened his own heart. From this stage onward, Pharaoh seems to have fallen into an incurable obstinacy; and we are told in another place only that God hardened his heart. And so it is that would not ever passes into could not; that under the stern law of mental habits grounded in nature, the evil we have chosen takes deeper and deeper root, and at last passes beyond our power to recall. There are gradations of impenitence marked; an opportunity of free pardon is offered, and lighter punishments foreshadow the greater. When it is said that Pharaoh hardened his heart, we are viewing the voluntary and human side; when it is said that God hardened his heart, we see the judicial and penal side.

On this ground an appeal is made to sinners: "Harden not your hearts." The consequence of not obeying this injunction is seen in the action of God in taking off restraint from the powers of evil, and allowing Satan to exercise full influence, which he is able to do when softening grace is withdrawn, and the Holy Spirit no longer performs his gracious, pleading work. In this sense God indirectly hardens man's heart, for being left to himself he is given over to a reprobate mind (Rom. i. 28), and even to idolatry itself (Acts vii. 42).

THE BELLS.

ALMOST everything about bells illustrates some feature of Divine truth. The bells' sound, call, and warnings are like varied notes of the Gospel, warning men to flee from the wrath to come, calling men to the blessings of Divine grace, and cheering men with sounds of song and praise.

The bell-bearer, the bell-hanger, and bell-ringer are also pictures of active Christian workers, teaching the truth, preaching the Gospel, leading the flock, and holding forth the Word of Life in this dark world of sin and death. Let us note a few useful bells:—

1. The Warning Bell (out at sea) says, "Be Awake" (Acts xxvii. 31; Rom. xiii. 11; Eph. v. 14; Jonah i. 6).

2. The Call Bell (at the factory) says, "Be Active" (Matt. xxi. 28; Mark v. 19; Acts v. 20; Mark xvi. 15).

3. The Sheep Bell (in the field) says, "Be Obedient" (John x. 27; John viii. 12; John xiii. 17).

4. The Door Bell (at home) says, "Be Prayerful" (Matt. vii. 7; Phil. iv. 6; 1 Thess. v. 17).

5. The Time Bell (at the station) says, "Be in Time." "Be in time for salvation" (Heb. ii. 3); "Be ready to travel" (Ex. xii. 11); and "Be ready to change" (Matt. xxiv. 44; 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52).

Bells are used for many purposes. They call us to school, invite us to dinner, remind us of work, ask us to church, warn us of danger, and tell us of death.

The passing bell of death may soon be tolling for us (Heb. ix. 27). C. Edwards.

Winchester.

Newton Abbot Convention, held February 13-15, was remarkable for a "record" in weather. During the three days we had a snowstorm, followed by torrents of rain, culminating on the last evening in a flood, which mounted right up to the door of the hall! The chairman and speakers had given up all thought of holding the meeting, but went down town to see the sight. On the former looking in at the room, he found it lit up and some thirty people waiting, the water meantime rapidly falling. Thereupon the speakers entered, walking through water, and a good meeting was held. Though cold without, we had the fire of the Holy Ghost within. Glory be to Jesus! Many are praising God for a fuller revelation of his love and the gift to his people. The speakers were Messrs. Robt. Atkins and G. H. Dymock, of Brighton, and on the platform were Messrs. H. G. C. Bishop and T. J. Joce, Revs. S. Lyne and J. Payne. B.

The Open Door.

By Mrs. HARVEY-JELLIE.

STUART GLENDON had thrown himself languidly on the sofa in his father's surgery. He lay watching the steady glow of the fire, musing the while over what he had been hearing that evening.

"A fine speech that, and from a man who is neither a humbug nor a cant," the voice within was saying. "For any other than Colonel Maber I wouldn't have crossed the threshold."

At this moment the doctor entered.

"Don't move, my son. You are home early."

"I have been to hear the Colonel's address to young men, and I lay down to keep your lonely fire company, father."

"You are welcome to the help and rest it can give, for I am off to a serious case at once;" and, selecting sundry necessary things, Dr. Glendon closed the door behind him, and Stuart's thoughts again framed themselves in words.

"'An open door.' That was it. What a stirring speech! 'I have set before thee an open door.'" (Rev. iii. 8). And then for an hour he was led by the mysterious hand of imagination to see the "open door" of which thrilling discourse had been made. He saw it there before him in the mirror of the fire; and steps were broad and easy, yet no one entered.

His thoughts grew strong and eager, and he rose and paced the room till the large bell told him that his father had returned and the day's work was ended.

"An open door"—its massive portals stood before the young man's gaze, turn anywhere he might. Its silent invitation spoke with alluring eloquence, and lay beyond. Fain would he enter, but was he prepared for all it might entail? According to the Colonel's speech, it meant a life of nobility, fidelity, a growth of grace and goodness, a life of usefulness. It seemed as if he was struggling to ascend those steps, and walk within the doorway of his vision; but a weight retarded him, and with all his seeming efforts he got no further.

Through the duties of the following day Stuart never lost sight of that "open door," and a strong resolution sent him out in the evening to walk off his restlessness.

At the crossing of the streets he was faced by one he knew. "What did you think of the Colonel last night? I saw you there," said Lieutenant Moorfield.

"No waste words, certainly; he lays hold of his audience. I'm wondering if it's all quite practicable, though. How does that kind of thing look to you in your line of life?"

"That's a straight question, Glendon. You know, in the Service it's all up with a fellow if he shams.

ONE'S LIFE IS AN OPEN PARADE,

as it were; yet the men respect sincerity." And the bright young lieutenant halted in his speech, and Stuart added: "So do I; it is the awful amount of 'goodyism' that doesn't mean real goodness that knocks a young man off the beat when he would be better."

"Look here, Glendon, this is how it seems to me. Some of our men fail to keep rank; but the others step out just as firmly, obeying orders on their own account, and the Commander knows who's who. I heard my directions last night when Colonel Maber was speaking, and I mean it, honour bright. I'll march through the open door, and RISK WHAT LIES AHEAD."

"You're right, I know. I wish the wrongs and slips of others did not affect me so much. There's plenty of aimless living. The sight of the open door inspires the wish to seize the opportunity presented," said Stuart Glendon, surprised at his own courage; but he felt his companion was honest.

"If 'tis true 'the golden opportunity is never offered twice' we must let side questions be, and march straight on. I'll be bound for it that to me the way will be harder; but he who hugs his weights isn't worthy for the race. The Colonel could answer to that. Hear him again on Wednesday; he is to give another evening, I heard," said the Lieutenant.

They parted. One was on the danger side of life, seeing the way to goodness, usefulness, and boundless possibilities; the other bravely stepping forth in obedience to the heavenly King.

* * * * *

A noisy company filled the room, where some were busy at the billiard table, some at cards. One of the number sat back in his chair. Evidently to him the game was over, and he had gained no cheer therefrom.

"You've had your turn, old fellow; you needn't look so glum," said one. But Stuart Glendon remained uncomforted. Alas! the fear of others, the procrastination, the wavering thoughts had slackened his resolutions, and leaving Lieutenant Moorfield that evening a year before he failed to enter the open door.

Once, after leaving home, he recalled the Colonel's rallying words. Twice he had allowed his mind to dwell on the subject of that address. Several times the sterling conduct of that frank Lieutenant had commended itself to his admiration, but other forces were too strong.

"Doctor, I am grieved," said Lieutenant Moorfield as he sat in the surgery one night; "I would do much to put Stuart on his feet again. What can he mean?"

"Mean! he means nothing; there lies the wrong. He lost all power to rule himself, and it was all up with him," said Doctor Glendon with a dark shadow over his face. "If you can reinstate him, you'll have my blessing. This bitterness of heart

ROBS MY LIFE OF ALL SUNSHINE."

Having at last found out where Stuart was living, Moorfield took a first chance to get at him. A run to London was easily accomplished, and the place where his father thought he was staying soon discovered; but the one he wanted to see was out. To pass the time Lieutenant Moorfield walked along the busy streets. Turning into the more public thoroughfare, he was getting nearer than he knew to him he sought.

Through all the maze of sinful company, and evil associations, Stuart still saw in the distance some vision of upleading steps, and a door that had not altogether closed; but it was far away now. A few minutes before he reached the highway some such thoughts had crossed his mind, to be banished again, had he not encountered a familiar person.

"Where on earth are you going?" he said gaily to Moorfield.

"That's the very question I came to ask you, Glendon. Where are you going? Have you no remembrance of our talk a year ago?"

"I didn't see the need of out-and-out marching, as you had been drilled to, and I faltered just a little, that's all; and yet I sometimes seem to see the way still, as the Colonel said."

"True, 'no man can shut it.' Glendon, pull yourself together, and play the man before it's too late. It all seemed too easy to you, and you made no effort. To me it was struggle, fight, and pray—or I knew defeat was certain; but had you forgotten Christ is the door, no right step can be taken, no door to a beautiful life be entered, but through Him?"

"I'd give all the world to enter," said Stuart as they sat in the little room later on.

"Do the more possible thing, Glendon. Give yourself to it, and through Christ it will be done surely and for ever."

Again they parted, the soldier to pray, and the other to kneel in penitence, and that night by faith the young man mounted the steps and entered the open door.

Walton-on-the-Naze.—The Home of Rest at Walton has continued during the past year to be a means of restoring health, both physical and spiritual, to the many women and girls who have stayed there. The visitors consisted chiefly of Biblewomen, mechanics' wives, needlewomen, shop assistants, dressmakers, &c., who could only afford to pay 8s. per week in addition to the railway fare. Day by Day.

SUNDAY, March 4. Psa. xix.

THE glory and handiwork of God speak to us from the blue tapestry of the skies, if we have eyes to see. The splendour of the midnight skies, the depths of space, the rocession of the seasons, sunset as you see it a stormy sky, the aurora as you see it in the rctic circle, sunrise as it flushes the mountain eaks—all are evidence of the glory of God, his taste for beautiful things, and power to roduce them endlessly. The days "pour rth" speech of this; yet there is no speech. No speech, no words; unheard is their voice." Their line" may be the string of a musical inrument, for so the LXX. and Rom. x. 18 treat ; but if so, there is music in the spheres, though ncaught by ear of man. Whilst David comses his psalm, the sun comes forth as a brideroom to wed the earth.

But the influence of the Word of God is escribed in words almost as striking. In point fact, what the objects of nature are in the ater world, the Word of God is within. It the sun of the spiritual sphere. Six different ames are given to it, because it is too manyded for one; and many different effects are tributed to it, because, in the varying exeriences of the inner life, it is always equally, ough variously, appropriate. Restored vigour, isdom for our simplicity, gladness for our eart, enlightenment for our eyes, enrichment r our poverty, warning for our mistakes, ewards for our obedience, are amongst the enefits of a devout reading of the Word of od; and if David found this true of the small olume of Scripture which he possessed, how uch more should we find it so!

Alas, we cannot think of the pure heavens nd the holy Word without being reminded of ur sins, secret and open, inadvertent and highanded! What a comfort to turn from them One who is able to cleanse and redeem!

MONDAY, March 5. Psa. xx.

Suggested by war, this psalm has often been the hearts and on the lips of those who fight gainst oppression and wrong. In all lives ays of trouble come, when these words, comosed probably at a time that David was cononted with a coalition of his foes, are pecuarly appropriate.

In the earlier verses (1-5) the combatant, suing forth to the battle, is met by a procesion of well-wishers and friends — priests, erhaps, issuing from the Holy Place, and omen, with their clear, sweet voices. It is ood to have such a send-off. Hard as it is to ithstand the onset of battalions of evil, it is uch harder to stand alone. The soldier on ie battlefield is greatly nerved to the fight by ie thought of an expectant and sympathetic atherland. And let not the soldiers of Christ rget, amid the ugly knocks they are certain receive, that they are compassed about with great a cloud of witnesses, and that they are ghting beneath the eye of the Lord.

In the words of the warrior (6) we may now that the Lord saveth his anointed. here the oil of the sanctuary has descended, id the Divine plan is being fulfilled, there ving strength may always be counted upon.

Hark to the chorus of all the ages of the ints (7)! "Some of chariots, and some of orses make mention, but we of the name of ur God." It is so easy to go down into Egypt r help, as Israel in the days of Isaiah, but ch expeditions invariably end in disaster. In turning and rest is salvation; in quietness id confidence is strength.

TUESDAY, March 6. Psa. xxi.

The preceding psalm was a prayer for success war; this is a thanksgiving for victory, and erhaps refers to the same campaign. There ie warrior went forth to war, amid the ncouragements of his people; here he returns triumph. But the psalmist is clearly carried beyond the immediate occasion of the historical incident which suggested the psalm, to the kingdom of the Messiah, when He shall be exalted to the universal throne, all enemies being made his footstool.

Perhaps, also, there is a sense in which we may appropriate its blessings to ourselves and our dear ones, in proportion as there is any measure of fulfilment of the royal nature which we have in union with the Lord Jesus. They who are made kings and priests unto God, may claim the realization of these blessed promises.

They will have their heart's desire, because their will and God's are identical. Their requests will not be withholden, because they will only ask such prayers as God can answer. The blessings of God's goodness will prevent or go before them. Theirs will be crowns of honour, theirs the eternal life, theirs blessedness and goodness, theirs the immovable steadfastness which comes to simple-hearted trust. Of how many of our sainted dead may we not say that, in answer to their faithful prayers, God has made them most blessed for ever, making them glad with his countenance!

But as the fire which ripens fruit consumes straw, so the same love which deals so tenderly with the saints is stern to punish all who oppose themselves. Beware, O hardened sinner, lest in a moment thou be plunged into irretrievable ruin! Be thou exalted, O blessed Christ, in all coming ages, for thy reign means joy and song to thy saints.

WEDNESDAY, March 7. Psa. xxii.

We may well say with the Ethiopian statesman, "Of whom speaketh the prophet this? Of himself or of some other?" Whatever may have been its immediate occasion in David's life, it is clear that he was borne along by prophetic impulse, and said things which he must have questioned after he had written them, searching what the Spirit of Christ that was in him did signify, when it testified of the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow.

The anguish of the Crucifixion throbs through every sentence—the cry of forsakenness, the consciousness of being the reproach of men, the scorning laughter of the bystanders, the taunting challenge, the melted heart, the dislocated limbs, the fever thirst, the pierced hands and feet, the parted garments, the breaking cloud, the final shout of triumph. There is an aggregate of resemblances between the predictions and the reality which cannot be accounted for by coincidence. How could all these details have been suggested to the psalmist so long before, except by the Spirit of inspiration? The shadow of the cross fell backward over those previous centuries, as it falls forward over our own, and o'er the wrecks of time it towers. It is impossible for us to fathom the mysterious silence which our Lord maintained during the midday-midnight; but this psalm gives us some clue.

You who bear the cross with Christ shall share the glory of the closing paragraphs. In the great congregation of the glorified you shall stand to declare his Name and praise Him; you will be able to attest that He does not despise nor abhor the affliction of the afflicted; you will be able to vindicate his righteous dealings.

THURSDAY, March 8. Psa. xxiii.

The sweetest singer this in all the choir. It is the child-chorister amid the hundred and fifty voices that sound from the psalter through the ages. We hear its sweet, clear treble above all the rest, as from the liquid voice of the boy shepherd carolling to himself as he drives his flock slowly over the dewy pasture-lands of Bethlehem. No trace even of sin: it was as though no blemish or stain had as yet soiled the stainless garment of that soul which was destined one day to indite the Fifty-first Psalm, but not yet—not yet.

The dewy pastures of the morning, through which the shepherd precedes the flock, give place at noon to the verdant meadows that line the slow-moving stream; and then, as the heat of the day is passed, and strength is restored, there is guidance along the open road until it dips down into the valley, where the shadows of the night begin to cast their darksome shade, and the roar of the wild beast is heard. The way lies up the glen; and beyond the fold, where the sheep are safely penned, gleam the lights of home with spread table, and the preparations for the feast with its anointing and the overflowing cup; whilst goodness and mercy, the twin-angels who had followed the soul through the day of its life, stand sentry to ward off sorrow and sighing, and all other pain and grief. Thus the psalm is a complete delineation of the successive stages of our life, from dawn till eve.

Notice its present tenses, for the care which is specific for one stage is diffused through all. Mark also how life is one long colloquy and conversation with God. Notice that the soul speaks as though there were no one but God and itself in the world. God makes all the arrangements, and it enters upon them with the certainty that He who prepares for to-day will not do less for all the morrows that shall succeed.

FRIDAY, March 9. Psa. xxiv.

This psalm is a piece of tapestry wrought in gold. Though all the earth is the Lord's, He has his holy place, and though all that dwell in the world belong to Him, some are permitted to ascend and stand there. The question of verse 3 is evidently parallel with the words of Isaiah, "Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire! Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings?" because in each case the answer is the same. Thus we learn that the devouring fire, and everlasting burnings of the prophet, are those of the presence of God. For us, I suppose the question is, Who may have access with confidence into the presence of God, to enjoy the daily consciousness of his care and love, and to be treated on terms of confidential intimacy. How absolutely important it is that the hands be clean, and the heart pure, that we be separate from vanity, and filled with transparent truth!

By universal consent the closing verses are applied to the ascension of Christ, when—mighty in battle, Conqueror over death and the grave, He drew near the ancient doors of heaven, which were summoned to uplift their heads to admit Him. But surely also the words may be applied equally to the challenge which Jesus gives to us all, to lift up the head of gate and door which oppose his entrance to the citadel of our soul. How secure you will be, if the King of Glory, instead of being without, is within!—if the strong and mighty Lord holds the key of your inner life, and garrisons you by his own presence against all the power of the enemy! You have only to lift up the door, and the King of Glory shall come in.

SATURDAY, March 10. Psa. xxv.

"Unto Thee do I lift up my soul;" "on Thee do I wait all the day;" "I put my trust in Thee;" "I wait on Thee"—such is the attitude for the tried and harried leader. From such an one there goes up, first, the cry for guidance (4, 5, 8, 9, 12); next, for pardon (11); and lastly, for deliverance from the net laid by the enemy and avenger (15).

The main burden of the psalm, therefore, is the cry for direction, and the certainty that it will be vouchsafed. Even though we be sinners, God will instruct us in the way for his goodness' sake. If we were more holy and wise, we might not have so strong a claim on Him as we have now. It is just because we are so unworthy and helpless that we can plead with Him to make a plain path before our feet.

The R.V. gives an exquisitely beautiful rendering for verse 14, in [the alternative reading of "friendship" for "secret." So that the psalmist is made to say, "the friendship of the Lord is with them that fear Him," recalling the name which was given to Abraham, known as the friend, and anticipating the words of our Lord, "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you." Be sure that there is a secret between you and God, a secrecy of communion, a secret understanding, passages of holy intimacy and intercourse, and hours of joy in which strangers cannot intermingle, depths around the margin of which no feet but yours shall stray, and into whose crystal depths no eyes but yours shall gaze.

Other Lands.

The Bible in Japan.—II.

THE one method that has proved to be the most interesting and successful is the sale of portions and Testaments on board the railway trains. Wherever this has been tried the same results have followed.

Mr. Snyder's plan is to board the train with his supply of books, and as it begins to move he takes his station near the centre of the car. He speaks to the occupants to this effect:—"The country has now been admitted to the comity of nations, and as a result you will come more and more in contact with people from other lands. A large portion of them will come from countries where the Bible is their guide in matters of religion. In fact, in all enlightened countries this is the basis of civilization. Now, it is important that you should know what kind of a book this Bible is, and whether its teachings are good and useful or not. Here are some samples that you can purchase at one sen (half a cent) per copy. Just look at them and see what they are like."

Then he usually hands to each passenger who will receive them three of the Gospels, and when all are supplied he goes back to the first who has received, and asks if he wishes to keep them. If so, he takes the money; if not, he gets back the books.

NEARLY ALL RETAIN THE BOOKS, and some ask to have Testaments instead; when he shows them that for ten sen (five cents) they can have the larger and more complete book. The trains generally stop about every ten minutes. In that time he goes through an entire car; and when the next station is reached, he enters another car and repeats the same thing. In a few instances objection has been made on the part of the conductor, but generally there is entire liberty to carry on this work. If asked what authority he has, he at once shows a Government licence to sell such books that he obtained of the local officials at a cost of 5½ sen (about 2½ cents).

One thing has been a most agreeable surprise, and that is the eagerness of so many people to procure copies of the Scriptures. All classes are alike ready to buy when the opportunity is thus given. Among the purchasers are a considerable number of Buddhist priests, who very frequently purchase New Testaments. In one case, a Buddhist priest had not the money, and from his neighbour. Most of the work on this plan has been done on the trains between Yokohama and Tokyo. The usual time occupied by the trip is fifty-five minutes. During that time, on one occasion, Mr. Snyder sold 155 volumes on the same train, and a total of 639 in a day! His largest sales in one day were between Kyoto and Kobe, when he sold 651, and during the week 2,285 books, including fifty-two New Testaments.

About the middle of September the transport Sherman reached here with a body of soldiers on board, en route to Manila. Learning that some of them wished to have a copy of the Bible to carry with them, Mr. Snyder went on board, and in a very short time he sold 411 Bibles and Testaments on this one ship. No doubt they will be a great comfort to these men, who were afterwards sent to the front, some of them probably laying down their lives on the battle field.

Since September 1 Mr. Snyder has given the most of his time to this work alone. The result to date (December 16), is the distribution of 22,066 portions, 795 Testaments, and 138 Bibles. This is practically the beginning of a revolution in bible work in Japan. It is thus demonstrated that the foreigner has here a most remarkable opportunity to spread a knowledge of God and the way of life to great numbers of the people, through the distribution of the Word.

The success that Mr. Snyder has met with has encouraged many others to undertake the same thing. As one after another finds out how ready the people are to buy, they become more and more interested, and gladly devote whatever time they can spare to this work. It is probable that the most important results of Mr. Snyder's efforts will be the introduction of a more general effort to circulate God's Holy Word all over Japan.

Mr. Moody's Organizations.

THE departure of Mr. Moody has very naturally brought before the minds of Christians throughout the world the numerous institutions with which his name must for all time be identified. Varied as these organizations may be, there is a unity of spirit and purpose in the grand object for which one and all exist—the extension of the kingdom of God amongst men.

The Moody Bible Institute at Chicago has during the past year made exceptional progress. When showed the summarized report of the work of the last decade, Mr. Moody himself remarked, "I did not realize we had done that well." The Institute was opened in September, 1889. During Mr. Moody's wide experience and keen observation, he marked the absence of general training in the English Bible. There was an evident need of men and women who should understand the Word of God, and know how to use it in bringing others to Christ. All over the land he met those who would, with a little well-directed study and training, become efficient workers in the cause of Christ, and who would prove valuable assistants to their pastors.

Several preliminary institutes, lasting from a few weeks to three months each, were organized in the Chicago Avenue Church—which is the outcome of Mr. Moody's labours among Sunday-school children during his earlier years in Chicago. The attendance at these institutes was so large, and the results so encouraging, that it was determined to found on a permanent basis which is the direct result of this movement. The institution is cosmopolitan in character, receiving students of many tribes and nations, and sending out men and women with the message of the Gospel to all lands.

The Bible Institute has been called the "West Point" of Christian work. It endeavours to embody all the principles which characterize a successful Christian worker. Study and work go hand in hand. A portion of every day (except Monday) is spent in actual work in the needy parts of the city and suburbs, the object being to teach the students not only the theory, but also the practice of evangelistic work. This course has proved to be a means of testing and training for the students, many of whom did not know the gifts they possessed until they were put on trial.

During the ten years the Institute has been built, over

THREE THOUSAND MEN AND WOMEN have studied there. It is often the case that work to which graduates of schools and colleges devote their life, has little or no connection whatever with what they learned in the class-room. The following particulars, however, indicate that this is not the case with the students who have passed through the Institute. Over 200 are in home, city, or rescue missions. The combination of study and practical effort through which the students pass fits them especially for this kind of Christian work. Some 180 are engaged in evangelistic work as

PREACHERS AND SINGERS;

368 are pastors' assistants and church visitors; 186 are preaching the Gospel in foreign lands, and the Institute has representatives in nearly every part of heathendom where missionaries have penetrated. In addition to these 58 are Sunday school missionaries, 25 are Christian Association secretaries, 32 are colporteurs, 38 are in educational and philanthropic work, and 64 are superintendents of city missions and similar institutions.

The advantages of the Institute are not confined to its own students, but are enjoyed by or theological seminaries who wish to supplement their education by a thorough study of the English Bible and methods of aggressive Christian work.

Many college and seminary students spend their vacations at the Institute. The late Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, said that "without intending it, the Bible Institute is really supplying a post-graduate course to many candidates for the regular ministry." Ministers, evangelists, returned missionaries, and Christian workers in general, who have had actual experience in the field, and who wish to give some time to further study and preparation for larger usefulness, also study at the Institute; as well as those who do not intend to devote their entire time to Gospel work, but who desire a larger acquaintance with the Bible and methods of Christian effort in order that, while pursuing their secular callings, they may more intelligently and successfully labour in winning others to Christ.

Ten Turkish Prisoners.

IN October last we called attention to the imprisonment of ten Christian brethren in remote Asia Minor. Rev. W. A. Essery, of the Bible Lands Missions Aid Society, has just received most interesting information concerning the whole ten, who are still in prison.

The first is the pastor of a little church in the heart of Kurdistan, and a man of no mean ability. He is the strongest man on the committee which has in hand the translation of the New Testament and preparation of the hymn-book in the Kurdish language. He can preach in three languages besides Kurdish.

The second is a theological student, a successful teacher preparing for the ministry. Over a year ago he was arrested, and his friends have not been able to see him since. His father was a Chaldean priest, killed in the late massacres.

The third is the son of an old Christian helper, and (like the second) a graduate of the High School. He was preparing to depart with his family, to labour in the Arabian Mission, when he was seized in his own house and hurried off to prison a year ago.

The fourth is a brother of the last. His only guilt is that he is the brother of the other, and was mentioned in one of the letters seized. He is a church member, an earnest young man, and by trade a weaver.

The fifth is son of the first, a student in the High School, and working to pay his way. A letter in pencil to his brother, though a short and ordinary one, was the starting-point of all the trouble which has gathered round him. The letter was seized by the police, and being in Armenian had to be translated into Turkish. The translator, a renegade to Islam, added political colouring to the letter. Accordingly, the bearer of the note was imprisoned, together with those whose names were found in it.

The sixth person is the bearer of the harmless note just named. He is accused of carrying incriminating documents, and was arrested eighteen months ago.

The seventh and eighth are two villagers named in the letter seized in the house of the third prisoner. The word "eggs," in the letter, the Government regarded as a cypher referring to the Ulemas! This is their offence.

Prisoners nine and ten are excellent brethren, members of a native church in Kurdistan. Since the massacres, having been plundered of all they possessed, they have been obliged to work for a morsel of bread. Their offence is that they served as "house-fathers" in certain mission orphanages in Eastern Turkey.

The correspondent concludes: "We are almost despairing of any release for these innocent people. We need more assistance to keep them in food and clothing." Communications to Mr. Essery may be addressed Bible Lands Missions Aid Society, 7, Adam Street, Strand, W.C.

The Indian Famine.

MUCH and pathetic information respecting the famine was imparted by Rev. Dennis Osborne at the noon prayer meeting at Aldersgate Street Y.M.C.A. n Monday. At the outset, he reviewed the sitations of late years; first, the famine of 897, in which five millions of people perished; ien the scourge of bubonic plague; and now ie unexampled famine which, unless prompt d be afforded, must result in the death of vast ultitudes. Mr. Osborne went on to picture the evastation which has overtaken the homes of ie natives, both Christian and heathen, and oved many hearts by his account of an tempted murder of a child, of which he was ie eye-witness. The deed was wrought by a poor arving mother who, nursing a babe at her breast id with a little son walking by her side, was amping through the country in search of food. a frenzy she suddenly dashed the lad to the round, evidently intending to end his sufferngs in death. Mr. Osborne went to the rescue, id the woman replied, in a state of anguish. He has not tasted food for three days; would ou have him die by inches before my eyes?"

NUMBERS OF ORPHAN CHILDREN

e now wandering at large, and men of incredible ickedness are endeavouring to obtain possession of the girls, for evil purposes. Mr. sborne concluded with a fervent appeal for elp, which melted the audience to tears; and a ollection for famine relief was spontaneously ken up by Messrs. Inglis, Ned Wright, id other well-known workers. In the course the meeting, which was throughout of a llowed character, Mr. M. H. Hodder exressed the hope that Mr. Osborne's short ission to this country would create the wideread sympathy with India which the position emands; and Mr. Robert Scott urged that fts should be generously offered in the spirit, under the circumstances, recorded of the rly disciples in Acts xi. 28-30. Mr. Musa HAI, a native evangelist, added a final and ffecting word as to the national responsibilities England towards her great dependency.

Mr. John Lampard, of the Balaghat Mission, entioned that, as an additional measure, ork was being given to the aboriginal tribes, it was found that many elected to die at ome rather than go to the Government relief orks. Evangelistic meetings were being onducted on Sundays at the Government orks. At a recent gathering, great numbers natives the Gospel message, many securing positions vantage in the branches of the trees in order hear the speakers better.

Rev. J. C. Lawson writes from Aligarh, .W.P., India: "This famine includes fiveths of the Central Provinces, nearly the hole of the Berars, North Deccan and Gujarat, id South-east and Central Punjab; also many ative states in Central and Western India, rge groups in North Bombay, the Baroda tate, nearly all of Indore, all of Rajputana, id minor states in Central India. There are January 25) 3,000,000 people on relief works, id the number is increasing very rapidly. ut what are even 3,000,000 people among the 0,000,000 or more, where the famine is the everest?

"The more pastor-teachers we can place in ie villages, the better will these poor people e helped. This is but the beginning of the amine. Two or three months hence the great istress will come. £5 a year will support one f these pastor-teachers."

With reference to the descriptions of famine fferings by Mr. Isu Churran, of the Raj-i-Masih Mission, which appeared in our last ssue, it should be understood that, although ated from Almora, N.W.P., the scenes referred were were witnessed in Gujarat.

Pray Often, for prayer is a shield to the soul, a crifice to God, and a scourge for Satan.—Bunyan.

Evangelical Church of Italy.

THE Evangelical Church of Italy, as a native organized mission amongst Roman Catholics, came into being with the movement of the unification of Italy. At the time of the Grand Duke and of the Bourbons, the Bible was secretly read and believed in by many families in the fair peninsula. Favoured by the granting of liberty of conscience, the isolated and secret converts felt the need of becoming organized amongst themselves. Amongst these the first place was occupied by Friar Barnabita and the celebrated Alexander Gavazzi.

When the ideal of the unity of Italy had become a concrete fact, began to give himself entirely to the preaching of the Gospel. "After having helped to give his country civil liberty," writes Dr. Robertson, of Venice, "he was anxious to see it possess that better liberty wherewith Christ makes his people free." During his long and active ministry he was often constrained by the needs of the work to come to Great Britain to plead the cause of "my little church," and "my children," as he loved to call the children he represented.

The work of which Gavazzi was the leading spirit has had during the last thirty years, and up till the present time, as its great friend and supporter, Rev. Dr. McDougall, of Florence, whom God has just now taken to his rest. He made the ideal of Father Gavazzi his own, and for many years collected the greater part of our funds himself. Notwithstanding all sorts of difficulties, the Evangelical Church has gradually consolidated itself, to the point that lately, especially through the energy of Rev. S. Fera, it has been by King Humbert and the Italian Government as a moral and religious administration, with the right of legally holding property, and governing itself under the name of the Evangelical Church of Italy.

The towns or missionary centres of our work are forty-four in number. In many cases keen persecution has been faced, and here and there it has been overcome by consistency and devotion to Gospel principles and work. In Rome we have two congregations, the Church of Porta S. Angelo, with 174 communicants, and the Church of Porta Pia, with twenty-eight communicants. Fourteen new members were last year added to this first congregation. Amongst those that seek for truth there is a man employed who comes amongst us like Nicodemus. Another is a certain Cesare Sornaga, who, after an illness and commercial misfortunes for seventeen months, one day in despair went to Ponte S. Angelo, with the intention of throwing himself into the river. It was Sunday. Looking round, he saw our church open, and to pass away the time he entered. What he heard moved him deeply; the prayers and the hymns acted as a balm to his heart and conveyed to his soul a new idea of religion. This was his first step towards Christ, and from that day Sornaga never missed a service, and after trial he has been accepted as a member of our church. We also have in Rome an evangelical club, by means of which were sold last year 1,050 Bibles and portions of the Scripture.

The same encouraging results can be narrated more or less of the other forty parts of the field. We had last year about 500 converts attending our Bible classes, more than 15,000 adherents, and attending more or less regularly our services. The converts under instruction which were accepted as communicants last year were 289. We have also, in connection with the forty-four main centres, evangelistic work carried on in 138 small towns and villages.

SCATTERED ALL OVER THE COUNTRY

The schools (Sunday, day and evening schools) are forty-two in number; they constitute a most important part of our work. In general they suffer from want of means; but in all places we find that liberal Roman Catholics prefer them, for they say: "We do not care to send our children to the schools of the priests, where they are taught to hate patriotism and every principle of liberty, while in the schools of the Government and municipality they are educated without religion and morals." We receive from all quarters requests to start others.

Communications regarding the work may be addressed to the organizing secretary for England and Wales, Rev. O. Golia Mauro, 57 Callcott Road, Kilburn, N.W.

Soldiers in South Africa.

CHEERING news reaches us from all the Soldiers' Homes. There is an earnest spirit of inquiry, and souls are being brought to Christ. We ourselves have for some weeks been with the third column in the forward camp at Sterkstroom, and have been enabled to open Homes in the camps, which are six miles apart. Five or six men are giving all their time and strength to the work; and, like our twenty-four other helpers, are receiving no remuneration beyond their maintenance.

The expenses, nevertheless, are great in providing tents and camp equipment for workers, marquees with lighting, and the many necessary things connected with the sale of refreshments. As everything is sold to the soldiers at the lowest price possible, even the working expenses are not covered by the sales.

Our permanent address for letters is care of Mr. J. Storrdister, King Williamstown. Boxes of literature will be conveyed freight free, if marked for the use of the troops and addressed to us, care of Messrs. Donald Currie's Agent, Cape Town, or East London.

G. B. and M. S. Osborn Howe.

From Naauw Poort.

In a letter written from Naauw Poort, on January 29, Corporal J. V. Woodey sends cheering accounts of the services which are held in the camps. "We had a glorious meeting last night in a shed made of a few pieces of wood and a canvas cover thrown over it. I there met some of the brethren of the Gloucester Regiment, and we had some hearty singing and praise to God for his wonderful mercy towards us. The Gloucesters had nine converts on their voyage coming here."

Books for the Troops.

Miss Agnes Weston writes:—"I am sending every month to the Naval Brigade, but I am making a special effort to benefit the soldiers as well. I have issued a 'War Edition' of my magazine, Ashore and Afloat, and of my 'Monthly Letters,' of which I am just beginning to send large consignments. I should be glad if friends would help me to circulate 100,000 of our own publications; I shall also be glad of Bibles or Testaments (small) for pocket of khaki jacket, Sankey's Hymn Books (small, limp cloth), and Text Cards prettily illuminated (small, the size of a court envelope). I am forwarding to South Africa almost every week, and any of the books named in this letter will be gratefully received, if sent to me at the Royal Sailors' Rest, Portsmouth."

The Poor of Spitalfields.

THE annual report of the King Edward Ragged Schools, Youths' Institute, and Christian Mission marks the completion of fifty-four years' successful endeavour to improve the spiritual and temporal status of a neighbourhood steeped in poverty and distress. The winter season is always a trying time for the poor, and necessarily means heavier expenditure for clothing and domestic requirements at a time when work is less abundant and sickness invariably more prevalent. Such are some of the difficulties which these institutions help to solve for the poor and needy.

Coming to individual agencies, it is pleasing to learn that the continued prosperity of the Sunday-school has again been manifest. The limit of the accommodation has been reached, the attendance now numbering 1,500. The seed sown in the junior class is bearing fruit in the senior departments, and the drifting away of elder scholars—often a source of anxiety and discouragement to numbers of earnest and devoted workers—has not been found to follow the Sunday-school effort; but the Bible-classes and reading associations are largely sustained by those who are young in Christian life and experience.

In the various classes for girls—needlework, dressmaking, knitting, cooking, &c.—the same interest has been manifest, and the instruction imparted has been of a permanently useful character. The technical training of the boys in carpentering, cabinet-making, fretwork, &c., has been attended with exceptional success, and has brought to light much hidden genius.

The beneficence of the institution is not, however, confined to the Ragged Schools and Mission.

During the winter the free dinners for the poor have been provided three times a week, a total of 12,000 meals being given during the season.

In the summer time the children are sent away to various parts of the country to seaside homes. The visitation and nursing of the sick in the homes of the poor have been extensively appreciated.

Further particulars of the Mission and Ragged Schools may be obtained of the secretary, Mr. Charles Montague, 16, Addington Road, Bow.

The "King's Own" Mission.

ONE of the chief features of the King's Own Mission, Kennington, S.E., is the vigour and persistence with which it seeks to reach the unevangelized masses.

The report of work accomplished during the past year contains much good news. At the open-air meetings large crowds have gathered to hear the Gospel, and times of spiritual power have been experienced. While the meetings are in progress, workers are told off to engage in conversation with those who appear to be impressed, and in this way some have been led to seek Christ, and subsequently to become workers in the mission.

The visitation work has also had an especially gracious influence. The lady visitors are able to record many instances of lasting good. Encouragement has come, too, from the weekly Bible readings conducted by Mr. William Green. As to the evangelistic meetings held in the capacious hall, attendances at the Sunday services have increased, and a most pleasing feature is that so many of those who attend are recruited from the class who seldom or never attend a place of worship.

Many other departments of religious and temperance work are carried on, and the Mission fulfils a position of high usefulness in a needy district of the metropolis. The treasurer is Mr. William Green, Moorlands, Bickley, Kent.

Have a special care to sanctify the Lord's Day; for as thou keepest it, so will it be with thee all the week long.—Bunyan.

Marylebone Medical Mission.

EVEN amongst those who are most hardened against the Gospel, a medical mission, it is ofttimes found, will exercise a beneficent influence when other aggressive agencies are either positively ignored or at least regarded with dislike. Especially among slum populations the exercise of the healing art, combined with an earnest Christian testimony and the maintenance of various good works of relief and of witness, has again and again proved a wonderful method of reaching the masses. So it has proved in the case of the Marylebone Medical Mission, an admirable work which is just entering upon the twenty-fourth year of its existence in the squalid and densely-populated district adjacent to Lisson Grove, in the West End of London.

Many of the very poorest class are found attending which is held at one o'clock on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, prior to the distribution of medicine. By this simple means people are reached who never attend any regular place of worship. Poor mothers with sick babes, street-hawkers smitten with bronchitis or pneumonia, as a result of exposure, old men, worn out with toil and yielding to the grip of some epidemic—all kinds and conditions of the suffering poor are found in the dispensary. Evidently, too, they enjoy the bright Gospel service, and arrive at the conclusion that Christianity improves upon acquaintance. Once drawn to the Mission Hall, they not infrequently attend the Sunday services also. In this way many have been brought to seek and confess Christ.

The work continues to make good progress under the guidance of Dr. Robert Chambers, whose devoted labours have done so much to enlighten one of the darkest districts of the great metropolis. In addition to the dispensary and the mission services, a Bible class for women, conducted by one of the three deaconesses connected with the movement, has been used in attracting many to the Saviour, and in building up the faith of a large number of humble disciples of the Lord, whose lot is cast in most difficult and trying circumstances.

The chief strength of the work lies, perhaps, in its visitation system. The Gospel is taken to the slum, garret, or cellar, to the inhabitants of those one-rooomed houses which are such a reproach to the land, where every vice is easy and every virtue difficult, where, in circumstances of the deepest degradation, the rising generation grows up familiar with iniquity even in childhood. How can we wonder that from such plague-spots there come criminals and harlots? And how could we fail to uphold, by sympathy and prayer and practical aid, those consecrated people whose lives are devoted to rescuing the perishing amid such sordid and melancholy surroundings?

Here is a sample case of misery, visited by Dr. Chambers:

It was a bitterly cold day in winter. In a small room lay a poor old man afflicted with cancer, and lately discharged from the hospital as incurable. By his side, on the wretched bed, lay his wife seriously ill with bronchitis. It was a miserable apartment, quite bare of furniture but for the bed. Two hours after my last visit the old man died, and his wife lay there, willing but unable to help him, for she could not move. A few days later she also died.

In many cases the sufferers are cured, even when the circumstances seem almost hopeless.

It was a foggy, frosty day. In one of the slum-homes—a dreadful place—a woman lay suffering from pneumonia. To add to the danger of the case, her head rested close to the window, of which three panes were broken. We could but advise her to seek refuge in the workhouse, but she objected that such a course would break up her home! The "home," alas! consisted of what we should call "a few sticks." However, we supplied her with medicines and nourishment, and she made a good recovery, and came round to the mission hall to express her gratitude.

The question of "How the Poor Live" receives additional illustration from the following incidents:—

We were called to see three children who were suffering from whooping-cough and bronchitis. The father was, it appeared, out of work; the room was in a filthy condition, and the unhappy little ones were starving. We provided milk and other nourishment and tended the children until they were convalescent.

A young woman of respectable appearance told us that her husband had beaten and deserted her. She had gone to live with her father, and it was there we found her, suffering from a serious attack of bronchitis. Her father, too, was ill, but there was only one bed in the room, so they took turns in resting their sick and weary bodies.

Many branches of work are carried on in connection with the Marylebone Medical Mission, but the chief aim of each is to point sinners to the Saviour. Communications may be addressed Dr. Chambers, 12, Bell Street, Lisson Grove, N.W.

A Plea for the Villages.

WRITING from Ross, Herefordshire, Mr. John Coates, of the Ross Bible Carriage Tent and Evangelistic Mission, appeals for the prayerful and earnest sympathy on behalf of village populations. "I am fully persuaded that there are hundreds of villages in Great Britain where the sound of God's glorious Gospel is never heard.

"During a recent mission to one of these dark villages, with a population of 390 souls, we only met with one Christian in our visitation, which extended over a month. Recalling my long period of work, I may mention that one village in which we held a mission had not had a visit from an evangelist for fully eleven years. A deep interest was manifested, and night after night the building was crowded with attentive listeners. The Gospel seemed like a new story to them. Doors are opening on every hand, but in all new fields of pioneering work there is, of course, much expense associated." Mr. John Coates' address is: Northleigh, Ross, Herefordshire.

Folkestone.—The mission work undertaken in some Folkestone slums by Miss Moore, of the Y.W.C.A., needs sympathetic assistance. "In 1894," writes Mrs. M. E. Thompson, of Pelham House, West Folkestone, "when the mission hall was opened, the Narrows was so sinful a place that the police hardly dared to venture there alone; but the work grew, and Miss Moore, toiling with courage and devotion, purchased the land, and, as money came in, built the hall." The work has been blessed to the poor, but a debt of £100 seriously hampers Miss Moore's efforts. Communications may be sent to Mrs. Thompson as above, or to Mrs. Murray Macgregor, 18, Millfields, Folkestone.

Mr. John Anderson,

BIBLE TRAINING INSTITUTE, GLASGOW.

HOW frequently do our biographical notices carry us back to the great Revival of 1859! In that year there arrived in Ardrossan a worker who had visited the North of Ireland to learn something of what the Lord was doing there, and also two shipmasters from America who had come under the influence of the same wave of blessing, as it passed over their own land on its course eastward. One of the first to be aroused by the story they had to tell was Mr. John Anderson, who was led into the light after a struggle lasting some weeks; and he was soon engaged in aggressive work for his new Master.

A mission which had been carried on for some years among the sailors visiting the port was given up about the year 1863, and it was then laid upon Mr. Anderson's heart to attempt something definite in the shape of Gospel work among these men. His business brought him into daily contact with the harbour authorities, as well as with the shipping; but an application for accommodation to hold meetings was firmly declined. The only place then available in the vicinity was an old loft, which had been used as a store for petroleum; and with all its drawbacks, this was taken advantage of for a year and a half.

With a grateful heart Mr. Anderson still speaks of the goodness of the Lord in these early days. Many times he went out absolutely alone to bear his testimony in the open air; but, as seals were granted to the ministry, a small group gathered round. When it came to be noised abroad that real and lasting good was being done, a hint received from an official led to another application to the Harbour Company; and on this occasion the best space available—capable of seating an audience of 250—was freely placed at Mr. Anderson's disposal. Blessing came among the people of the town, as well as on the strangers; and as the work developed it was found advisable to secure entire possession of the largest hall in the town (holding 600 persons), and after a time that was not more than sufficient to meet the requirements.

By-and-by the workers went out, by invitation, to different places throughout the county to help in beginning similar efforts. These, too, were richly blessed; and as bands of workers were formed, it came to be felt that some organization was desirable to afford opportunities for the scattered brethren to meet and talk about the things of the Kingdom. The outcome of this was the establishment of the Ayrshire Christian Union—mother and leader of the county unions now so well known in Scotland—formed in the year 1877, of which Mr. Anderson was president for the first dozen years.

Another step, taken mainly with a view to the consolidation of the evangelistic work, was the starting of The Reaper, in 1881. The pressure of other engagements has led Mr. Anderson more than once to contemplate the discontinuance of the magazine; but, whenever such a proposal has been mooted, friends who know its value have protested so vigorously that it is still with us—holding out the hand of fellowship to many a weary, lonely worker, and standing ever true to its aim as "a magazine for the promotion of spiritual life, Scriptural doctrine, and consecrated service." The paper fills a useful place as the organ of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association; and, by means of localized editions, of the various county Christian Unions.

Round the Ayrshire Christian Union and The Reaper there has grown up also the South Morocco Mission. It would be difficult, we fear impossible, to allocate the shares taken by each, but the central figure in all three was that of Mr. Anderson. The thought of sending workers from Ayrshire to that benighted Mohammedan country came to him during a visit he was obliged to make to the North of Africa on account of the state of his health in 1887-8. For the first time he was brought face to face with the horrors of such a life as the people in that country were living; and, though he only arrived home in April with health far from completely restored, two missionaries left before the year closed. At the outset there was no formal organization, the idea being to associate with other labourers; but in 1890 the state of affairs led to another visit from Mr. Anderson, when the Mission was formally constituted on its present basis, with twelve missionaries in the field, a number which has since grown to twenty-one.

From Photograph by Messrs. Maclure, Macdonald and Co., 2, Bothwell Circus, Glasgow.

The work with which Mr. Anderson is most closely identified is that of the Bible Training Institute in Glasgow; and the steps which led to the opening of that building, as well as to his connection with it, tell a heart-stirring story of the gracious leading of God. At an early stage in his career he had made local beginnings in this direction by organizing training classes for evangelistic workers at Kilmarnock, Kilwinning, and Ayr, with membership varying up to 150, but young men only were admitted. One of the first to propose to him the attempting of such an effort on a national scale was Rev. James Banks, formerly minister of the United Presbyterian Church in Paisley, who fully recognized the need for the better equipment of Christian workers not seeking the office of the regular ministry, but were handicapped in the doing of lowlier service through lack of such guidance and direction as might be given by a wise and experienced leader of a consecrated spirit.

On returning from his second visit to Morocco, Mr. Anderson found himself physically unable to continue the old active life, and had planned a restriction of his public Christian work mainly to such training classes as those mentioned. The next link in the chain was provided when Mr. D. L. Moody, at the annual meeting of the Glasgow United Evangelistic Association, on March 10, 1892, publicly urged the directors to make a new departure, by establishing a Training Institute for Christian workers offering themselves for home or foreign service, for which he felt there was a great need in Scotland; and recommended them to invite Mr. John Anderson, of Ardrossan, to be superintendent. Mr. Anderson's first intimation of the fact was obtained from the newspapers of the following morning.

The idea was at once taken up, and it may not be out of place to mention that the two men most deeply interested had each received a dying charge to carry through such a scheme. Mr. Anderson had been pledged by the death-bed of Mr. Banks not to turn away from it, should a proposal of this nature be made to him; and Mr. J. Campbell White (now Lord Overtoun) had received a charge from his sister, the late Mrs. J. E. Somerville, to help forward a scheme with the same end in view, while she left in the hands of her trustees a large sum of money as the nucleus of a building fund.

Before six weeks had elapsed from the making of the proposal by Mr. Moody, the directors had formally agreed to undertake the responsibility, with two principal aims in view: "(1) The training of Christian workers, carefully sifted, who, for the time being, should be resident in the Institute, and under the eye of the superintendent; and (2) the establishment in the Institute of classes, which might be attended not only by residents, but by others desirous of availing themselves of the training so provided." They had further entered into an agreement with Mr. Anderson, by which he was to give up his business, and to set about making such preliminary inquiries as might be necessary before the establishment of the Institute. In the course of the summer he visited various institutions in this country and America, notably that at Northfield, and prepared a report which became the basis of the scheme under which a beginning was made in January of the following year.

The course of study extends over two years. During that time the students are carefully taken through the entire Old and New Testaments—the great aim being to give them a thorough working acquaintance with the English Bible, without the teaching of Greek or Hebrew. Other courses include the outlines of Christian doctrine, homiletics, Christian evidences, and church history. The particular qualifications of the worker are strongly insisted on, and then he is well grounded in the classification and treatment of subjects and texts, being taught how to divide and apply them along textual, typical, topical, and other lines, with practical class exercises. Close attention is also given to proper methods of conducting various kinds of meetings—such as those in the open air, for general Gospel preaching, for fellowship, and for children—as well as of dealing with inquirers. The young men undertake no medical study, except such as they may do on their own account on Saturdays; but the young women go in turn for training at the dispensaries of the Glasgow Medical Mission, where they receive lessons in the diagnosis of disease, medical and surgical treatment, and dispensing.

Men and women alike receive from the life of the Institute an impress which is at least as valuable as the theoretical instruction. Mr. Anderson stands to all the inmates more in the relation of a father than that of a teacher. His strong character and devout spirit have placed the Bible Training Institute in its present high position in the estimation of the Christian world. The dominant note of the house is the practice of the presence of God. Prayer meetings are neither regarded as formal, nor given a secondary place. The atmosphere is that of the fellowship of God.

The basis of the Institute is thoroughly undenominational; but one rule has been made which will be widely appreciated—namely, that students must, during their course, remain loyal to the Church from which they were received. It is desired that candidates for admission should have had a fair elementary English education, but "it is indispensable that they give satisfactory evidence of conversion and of genuine Christian character. They must also give proof of their sincerity, and of some degree of fitness by having been engaged in some form of Christian work."

During the first winter the number of students residing in the house was twelve, while twenty-three outsiders were enrolled for attendance at the day classes, and 360 for those meeting in the evening. For the current session, 1899-1900, there are seventy-three resident (men fifty-three, women twenty), but evening classes are suspended on account of the Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign. Of those who have gone forth already, rather more than one-half are in the foreign mission field, while the remainder are engaged in home mission work, or have gone back to business—using the time at their own disposal in Christian service.

The staff and students are now recognized as one of the most potent forces for aggressive Christian work in Glasgow. Great crowds of people gather round their open-air demonstrations, and they are ever ready to afford help to any cause. Last year the number of meetings conducted was 1,493, with an aggregate attendance of over 160,000, and no fewer than 3,618 inquirers were personally dealt with. Visitation in connection with the police courts and Glasgow Prison has so commended itself to the authorities, that Bible classes are now organized among the prisoners, under the official recognition of H.M. Commissioners.

Increasingly churches and missionary societies are seeking the workers. From one Scottish Presbyterian Church letters have been received speaking in the highest terms of men sent to them for service at home. A sister Church, which had taken a student for service abroad, is now applying for other two, in the hope of obtaining men of like spirit and capacity. It has been noticed that societies which have sent candidates for training are yearly doing so in increasing numbers. During the present winter it has been noted that three of the most successful evangelists in connection with the Glasgow Campaign have been men trained in the Institute.

Woman's Christian Temperance Union.—A convention is to be held in Edinburgh next June, under the auspices of this union. The names and addresses of delegates intending to be present should be sent to the secretary, Miss Agnes E. Slack, Ripley, Derbyshire.

Oxford Letter.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

OXFORD and District Christian Endeavour Union held a series of meetings on Tuesday week. There was a service in the afternoon at which Rev. F. B. Meyer preached, followed by a conference and a meeting in the evening. The Union gave an enthusiastic welcome to Mr. Meyer, and his visit will doubtless do much to stimulate the movement.

At the evening meeting, Mr. Meyer spoke of the consecration pledge as "the hub of the movement." Perhaps the most interesting part of the address was that in which he showed that Christianity was to sanctify every department of life. Consecration was consistent with a perfectly natural life.

The annual meeting in aid of the Universities' Mission to Central Africa was held in the hall of Hertford College on Monday, under the presidency of Dr. Ince, Regius Professor of Divinity. The claims of the mission are that it was the response of the University to Dr. Livingstone's appeal to carry out the work in Africa that he had begun. Its sphere of work has two centres, viz., the island of Zanzibar and Lake Nyassa. Among the special features of its work is the building up of a native church with a native ministry, and the gradual abolition of the slave trade in this part of Africa has been largely due to the work of the Mission.

The Bishop of Zanzibar, in his address on Monday, pleaded specially for the educational part of the work. They wished to train a native ministry who would carry on the work of the Church themselves, and so set them free to pass on to other races. As God guided events in South Africa, there would be an immense field opened out for Christian work, and he hoped the University of Oxford would take a share in that work.

Irish Notes.

IN view of the successful evangelistic work which has been carried on in the wooden hall, which was built last year at Nenagh, it has been decided to erect another, which is now being constructed. The workers associated with the mission have been much encouraged by the large numbers attending their unconventional place of worship, and the blessings with which the work has been fraught since its inception. Communications respecting the movement may be addressed to Mr. John Carroll, 47, Castle Street, Nenagh.

The Evangelistic and Missionary Alliance has accomplished much in the service of the Gospel in Ireland. There has been much real progress in the face of circumstances often discouraging. Christian workers who have conducted evangelistic services in the South of Ireland have experienced much difficulty in securing places for holding meetings. This has been the case with the Evangelistic and Missionary Alliance, and friends who know of any places—schools, halls, barns, or empty houses—will confer a benefit upon the Society by communicating with Messrs. R. and J. M. Todd, Manor House, Enniscorthy, co. Wexford.

The After-Care Association, for Poor Persons discharged recovered from Asylums for the Insane, held its annual meeting at 48, Wimpole Street, W., on Monday last week, at the house of Dr. Blandford. The report, which was read by the secretary (Mr. Thornhill Roxby), showed that in 1899 there were 222 cases before the council.

Christian Endeavour.

TOPIC FOR MARCH 4.

How God Pays Men (Matt. xix. 30; xx. 1-16).

GOD is always going out to call labourers into his harvest. Some are hired early in the morning of life when the dew is on the grass and the fresh breeze of the opening day fans the face; glad hours of service are these, when work is a luxury! We have no thought of reward, because it is so blessed to handle the young vines, or train the long arms over the trellis-work, or use the pruning knife, standing knee-deep in fronds. He comes again to those who have passed the hours of early youth, and in the third hour, calls young men and maidens to enter his service before their best energies have been dissipated in the business or pleasure of the world. Are you standing idle in the world's great market-place, waiting a summons from the highest bidder? Have you seen hour succeed to hour, and though many have passed, you have as yet been unattracted by any face or proposal? I pray you idle no more, when the precious hours are passing so quickly, and opportunities for work are dwindling, and vines are spoiling, and Jesus waits to give you employment worthy of your powers. Do not barter with Him about payment, He will give what is right, and surely that will satisfy. See the door stands ajar, and through the aperture you hear the happy voices of the vineyard workers. Go your way.

The sixth hour may stand for the meridian of life, when we reach the thirties; whilst the ninth may represent the late forties and the fifties; the eleventh, the call to the aged.

Perhaps a truer rendering of the parable would treat the early called, who bear the burden and heat of the day, as representing the martyrs, those who have suffered and sacrificed most, those who have shed their blood for the Gospel. The third hour may represent such as have not actually laid down their lives, but have wrought for God with untiring heroism, as Luther or John Knox; while the later hours may represent efforts in the cause of Christ which have taxed in less degrees the strength and resource of God's servants. You and I, probably, unless some awful age of persecution is at hand, will not be able to rank with the first or second, but our light exertions may rather be depicted in the last labours of the sunset hour, when the stress of the day is over.

Now as to payment. It seems at first sight unfair that those who wrought at so small cost should receive as much as the others, but remember (1) That no wrong is done to the earliest comers, they get all that was promised, and as much as they need, according to the computation of the value of a penny, for the maintainence of themselves and their homes. (2) All is of grace, and there is no reason why the householder should not add as much as he chose to the money that was actually earned, so as to bring it up to a penny. (3) The consciousness of having done efficient work through the long day, is itself a vast addition to the actual wage. (4) But, lastly, and chiefly, it is very beautiful that those whose circumstances have forbidden them doing as much for God as they would wish to have done, or that others have accomplished, will not at last come off worse than they, if only they did their best during the one brief hour of opportunity.

The young clerk who is tied to the office desk for the maintenance of his mother, but who longs to be a foreign missionary, who can only do some small service when his other work is over, will find that at last he will be rewarded for what he did, equally as his friend who went out to the mission-field, and died for God at the hands of savages; because the motive that prompted him was equally lofty as that of his companion.

C. E. NOTES.

An American prison society has a temperance committee that has secured fifty-two signers to a strong temperance pledge. The society numbers only twenty-five.

When a contingent of Australian troops for the Transvaal were leaving Melbourne, the Christian Endeavourers supplied the ship with a case of books for the use of the soldiers on their long voyage.

The Convention lately held in Bengal showed the power that Christian Endeavour is becoming in the evangelization of India. One society reported that it was supporting a colporteur who preaches to the pilgrims. Another carries on four Sunday schools. "Our fathers did mission work for pay," said one Bengali Christian. "Christian Endeavour is teaching us to work freely and gladly."

The Glasgow Evangelistic Campaign.

EIGHTEENTH WEEK OF MEETINGS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

ON Saturday, February 17, a special united prayer meeting was held in the Christian Institute, when the deep interest taken in the Campaign work by many of God's people was abundantly manifested. Confession was mingled with yearnings for true searching of heart, as districts were remembered where the work has been seemingly fruitless; while much praise was rendered for the goodness of the Lord in other localities. The spirit of prayer was so evident that, by general consent, the time was extended beyond the original intention, and a desire was expressed that a similar meeting might be held on the following Saturday for intercession on behalf of the services still to be held.

At the conclusion of the Students' Mission, Rev. Dr. Hastie (professor of theology in the University) publicly thanked Mr. McNeill for his addresses. He and his colleagues were assured that much good had been accomplished, and that further blessing would yet follow. In reply, Mr. McNeill expressed the gratification he felt at having the support of the recognised professors of theology in his evangelistic work, and at having during these weeks added largely to the number of his true friends.

Many touching letters have been coming in from persons who have been blessed at the various missions. One of the most striking that has come under our notice was by a man whose wife, himself, and several members of his family, have been led into the truth all at different centres, and under the preaching of different evangelists.

THE NORTH-WESTERN DISTRICT.

At few centres have the "missions" been so truly "united" as was the case with one just concluded in Free St. Stephen's Church (Rev. Hugh Ross), New City Road, where, during the opening week, the meetings were conducted by the Brothers WEAVER, followed by Mr. JOHN ANDERSON (of the Bible Training Institute). In the absence of Mr. Ross (on account of health), the Rev. John Pollock (Shamrock Street United Presbyterian Church) presided. Besides the Shamrock Street and local friends, the workers from St. George's Cross Tabernacle and Grove Street Institute were throwing all their strength and energy into the campaign, their own week-evening services having been suspended during the continuance of the mission.

The very wintry weather experienced day after day told severely on the audiences and workers alike, but the people continued to come out in surprising numbers, and a deep spirit of prayer was manifest among the Christians. Among other leading workers whom we found lending a helping hand were Mr. Richard H. Boyd, Rev. John Torrance, Mr. Robert Logan, Mr. Daniel Walker, and Mr. Walter Miller.

Mr. Frank Weaver's voicing of the Gospel in song, night after night, and Mr. Bewley Weaver's addresses, were much used of God to the conviction of sinners. The truth about the true condition of even the most respectable and outwardly correct persons, if still in an unconverted state, was faithfully presented. As the brothers go from place to place in the city many memories are revived of the blessed work which God used their father to do in former years. The other evening a man, who had been living a life of terrible sin for many years, sought out the sons because he remembered that long ago his sainted mother had spoken much of their father. He remembered also that his mother had told of a terrible experience at her conversion, and could with difficulty be assured that it was not necessary to show the same great excitement and outward evidence. In the end he seemed to receive the gift of God simply as a little child.

Mr. POLLOCK (who is editor of Scottish Endeavour) remarked on Thursday, "This is our Endeavour night, and they are all here." The badge of the C.E. movement was much in evidence, and men and women with divers talents found full scope for the use of them in connection with the meetings. Several falls of snow put to a severe test those whose duty it was to go through the district from house to house inviting the people; but the arrangements were carried through in a thorough manner.

POSSILPARK DISTRICT.

Mr. JOHN CLIMIE has taken up work in Possilpark District, where the Rev. D. M. Cameron was labouring some weeks ago. On this occasion the meetings are being held in the United Presbyterian Church (Rev. M. Bruce Meikleham, minister). The mission made a promising beginning on Sabbath evening, the audience being large, and about sixty Christians remaining behind for a special time of prayer and consecration. Mr. Climie spoke earnestly on the call to service and the opportunity presented. Mr. Meikleham is an enthusiast in open-air work, and is well supported in it by his congregation. Cold and stormy weather did not deter the helpers on Monday night, and they had a good time at Saracen Cross—looking and speaking, said a visitor, "as if they meant business for God."

The subject of address was "The healing of the woman with the issue of blood" (Luke viii. 47). Looking at the preceding verses, Mr. Climie showed that the neighbours of the man out of whom the legion of devils were cast might have been expected to burst out in praise, but instead they asked Jesus to go away. The question involved was that of an unclean trade, such things leaving no room for Him, and the men who carry them on resenting even yet the advent of spiritual work into their neighbourhood. This woman was one of a crowd who showed a great contrast, receiving Him gladly. A graphic description was given of the manner in which Jesus led her to confess Him publicly.

At the close a number of young people showed a disposition to be spoken with, and a workman who remained behind seemed to realise the truth before he went away.

VARIED EXPERIENCES.

Mr. JAMES SHIELDS (of the London Evangelization Society) is at present spending six weeks at the work of the Campaign, and has already experienced something of the way in which the attendances vary in different districts. Beginning in London Road United Presbyterian Church, he found himself in the midst of a splendid band of workers. Led by the minister (Rev. J. Anderson Watt), and the missionary (Mr. Edgar), the people from the outset took up the open-air work vigorously, as many as sixty helpers gathering round on several evenings. The distribution of the intimation cards from door to door was so thoroughly done that the whole of the customary supply was exhausted within the first three days.

The preaching was a simple presentation of the Gospel. No personal pressure was applied, but the Spirit of God was left to work, and He honoured the faith of his servants. A noteworthy feature of the mission was that more than one-half of the persons who were converted were enabled to trust the Saviour in the course of the services, and came forward at the close, not to seek guidance, but to tell what the Lord had done for their souls. One of the workers, an earnest, devoted young lady, had been at four gatherings on the opening Sabbath, and was suddenly called to the higher service on Tuesday morning. The news of her death made a deep impression on the audience, and it was observed that, on that evening, only one man left the church before the after-meeting. The mission was reported at the preachers' meeting as the best attended of those held in East-End churches.

On removing to Whitevale United Presbyterian Church—still in the East End—Mr. Shields found himself in a field stiff and unresponsive. An excellent spirit pervaded the services, but the attendances were not large. We met the minister (Rev. W. H. Kellock) and a faithful band bearing witness on the street, when snow was falling. The evangelist addressed himself to the church members in a sympathetic and tactful manner, pointing out from his past experience how an unpromising beginning might lead to much fruit in the end. Earnestly did he lay before them the invitation to be workers together with God, and workers together through prayer. Though now hailing from the south, Mr. Shields is a native of the West of Scotland, well acquainted with the local needs and opportunities of Gospel work.

The address we heard was on the invitation to the Laodicean Church (Rev. iii. 20), and the subject was treated in a fresh and deeply interesting manner. A friend of Mr. Shields' early days (Miss Mounts) presented the Gospel call in song. True liberty in prayer was experienced, an earnest spirit pervaded the whole gathering.

Mr. Shields expects, during his closing fortnight, to be located in the Tent Hall.

WORKING LADS AND GIRLS.

At White Memorial Free Church, Paisley Road, we found Mr. WILLIAM THOMSON, jun., in the middle of a mission which has so far been crowned with success. Meetings were arranged at half-past five o'clock for boys at school, and during the current week for girls. We were informed that there was a rowdy element in the afternoons, but in the evening we found none. For these later gatherings the qualifying age is fourteen years, the intention being to reach working lads and girls. Like Mr. Mackeith's experiments in the Anderston and Gallowgate districts, this mission has shown the greatness of a field to which special attention has seldom been turned. The rigid exclusion of school-children is hard to do, but experience proves the necessity of it if the special class aimed at is to be reached.

We were impressed with the fine staff of workers, led by the minister (Rev. James Paterson) and the missionary (Mr. Edward Gillespie). The male portion of the audience was composed of lads ranging up to seventeen or eighteen years, and a reverent and quiet spirit dominated the entire service. Mr. Thomson's lesson was on the human heart, illustrated by a series of eight pictures—the first four representing in allegorical fashion the descent to perdition, while the remainder showed the renewing of the Holy Spirit upward to sanctification. The passions were represented by different animals. Deep interest was aroused, and the hymns were sung with great earnestness—especially one in the Lowland Scottish doric.

During the singing of the closing hymn—"Just as I am"—Mr. Thomson invited all who were seeking the Saviour to come out to the front, and the unusual fact appeared that three times as many lads as girls were in the company. Possibly this may be partly accounted for by the way in which their confidence was won through the use of many homely phrases and references to topics in which they were interested. An appeal was made for all young Christians to speak to their neighbours, and offer to accompany them to the front. Seated in the middle of the audience, it was pleasant to overhear snatches of the conversation which then sprang up on every hand. In boyish terms we heard frank yet affectionate inquiries made into the spiritual condition of a number, and in at least one case the result was hearty congratulation on the facts thus revealed.

In the course of the week, including afternoon and evening meetings, not fewer than three hundred and seventy young people were personally dealt with, and took away covenant cards. In many of the cases cautious workers gladly testified that there was good evidence of a change of heart, but all the names and addresses have been recorded, and the work will be followed up.

Looking Up.

EVERYTHING Jesus did is full of meaning, and his look often meant more than the words of most people. We are often told of his look of pity on the sick and of compassion on the multitude, his look of displeasure on the Pharisees and his look of reproof on Peter, and four times the Gospels mention that Jesus "looked up to heaven." It was natural and beautiful Jesus should look up to his own home, the Father's house, that He should turn his face to where his treasure was and his heart abode.

The first mention of Christ's up-look is made in Matt. xiv. 19; Mark vi. 41; Luke ix. 16, when He took the five barley loaves and two small fishes, and, "looking up to heaven, He blessed and gave." This was the up-look for blessing on what seemed like very small mercies. It expressed thankfulness for the boy's offering, though it appeared so inadequate for the great need. Christ teaches us to be grateful for the least mercies. The blessings that come to the thankful hearts who look up when others would look down, and complain that "there is not enough," will help us to make the most of what we have; and the little, when carefully used, will go a long way.

The next time we are told that Christ "looked up" was when He sighed and said to the deaf and dumb man, "Ephphatha—be opened" (Mark vii. 34). Jesus sighed or groaned because of the sin and suffering in human life, because there were so many all round Him who were deaf to his words and would not hear or heed God's truth; and though they had ears to hear, they would not listen to his message. Midst all the hardness of men's hearts and the disappointment and discouragement of his work, He looked up to heaven for help and healing for this poor man who could not hear a word Christ said.

Thus Jesus teaches us to look up when we are troubled and burdened, and when sighs are in our hearts. If we are ever to do good to others and help to heal their woes, we must look up. Afterwards, when the man heard and spoke, the people said of Jesus, "He hath done all things well."

Our well-doing in life largely depends on our looking up. Many a life would be more useful if there was more up-looking. Many words of cheer, many deeds of mercy, many works of love will flow from the life that can look up when the heart is full of sighs.

The third time is when Jesus stood by the grave of Lazarus (John xi. 41). Then, in the presence of death and sorrow, "Jesus lifted up his eyes and said, Father, I thank Thee that Thou hast heard me." We are told (verse 33) when Jesus saw Mary weeping, and the Jews also weeping, He groaned in spirit, and was troubled and wept; and then, coming to the grave, Jesus again groaned as He ordered the stone to be rolled away, "He lifted up his eyes" and prayed. The sorrow that made Christ weep was not only sympathy for the sister, but grief over the unbelief of those around Him; and yet with eyes dim with tears, the Master looks up in thankful confidence to the Father. From the dark tomb that typifies the world's sin and sorrow, Jesus looks up to the bright home of peace and joy. Past answers to prayer give new hope for the present and fresh expectations for the future. This up-look from the grave is in thankfulness for comfort and life.

Lastly (John xvii. 1), when Jesus knew that his hour was come—the hour of agony and death, and of the perfect fulfilment of the Father's will—He lifted up his eyes and said: "Father, glorify thy Son." This was the up-look of resignation and submission, of prayer for the disciples, of victory over sin, and triumph over death and hell. It was night, and He looked up beyond the shining of the Pascal moon and the clear light of stars to God, in whom there is "no darkness at all."

What Jesus did he bade his disciples to do. Let us look up for others. Look up in days of darkness and sorrow, in work and play, look up to the light for help and grace.

It Is Time.

It is time to be brave. It is time to be true.
It is time to be finding the thing you can do.
It is time to put by the dream and the sigh,
And work for the cause that is holy and high.

It is time to be kind. It is time to be sweet,
To be scattering roses for somebody's feet.
It is time to be sowing. It is time to be growing.
It is time for the flowers of life to be blowing.

It is time to be lowly and humble of heart.
It is time for the lilies of meekness to start;
For the heart to be white, and the steps to be right,
And the hands to be weaving a garment of light.
